UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY
AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN
STACKS

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2021 with funding from University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign

https://archive.org/details/nation3190unse

The Nation

VOLUME III

April 4th, 1908, to September 26th, 1908.

LONDON: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

052
N
J.3

LONDON:
PRINTED BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, E.C.

The Nation

INDEX.

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS.

	PAGE
A Free Hand for the State	146
American Parties, The Break-up of	39
American Radicalism, The Growth in	560
A Moral from Hops	262
An American Labor Party	147
A New Political Development	367
A New Triple Alliance?	296
Anglicanism, The Weakness of	407
Anglo-German Agreement, The Way to an	694
An Invasion of Liberty	373
An Olive Branch	5
An Untoward Incident	476
A Vision of New Toryism	111
A Word to the Labor Party	177
Back to the Lords	213
Balkans, The Peril in the	112
Campbell-Bannerman in the Abbey. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley	264
Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Henry	108
Catholic Church and Modern Life, The	822
Civic Volunteer, The	761
Club Life, Some Abuses of	114
Continent, The Waste of a	263
Co-operators and Politics	371
Crisis in Coffee, A	730
Crisis in the Cotton Trade, The	826
Dark Side, The	760
Democracy and the Peace Movement	628
Destruction of a Myth, The	478
Development in the Church	442
Disorganised Labor	890
Doctrine of Tolerance, The	854
Eastern '48, The	728
Empire, The Mood of	297
England, The Wealth of	298
Entente of America and Australia, The	791
Fiscal Fallacies:—
II. The Single Trade Tests	47
Free Trade as an International Policy	663
Free Trade Finance, The Victory of	7
Free Trade, The Triumph of	176
Frontier War, The	179
Germany, A Message from	757
Government and the Suffrage, The	259
Government, The "Main Duty" of the	590
Government, The New	71
Government, The Peril of the	332
Haggerston, A Lesson from	662
Harvest of London Reaction, The	629
Home Rule, The Inevitability of	4
How to Regain the Liberty of the Road	696
Idealism in Politics	109
India, Our Opportunity in	370
Indian Portent, The	178
Industrial Arbitration, The Limits of	855
Kings as Politicians	790
Liberalism, The Vision of	144
Liberal Europe, The Growth of a	627
London Police, The Character of the	479
Lord Morley's Indian Reforms, III.:— The Mischief of Over-Centralisation. By Sir William Wedderburn	481
Lords, The Danger with the	626
Lost Liberty of the Road, The	337
Macedonia, The New Hope for	6
Message of Liberalism to the East, The	824
Morocco, The Future of	758
Mr. Hearst's Revelations	891
Mutiny of the Expert, The	558
Natal and the Native Question	216
National Insurance, The Policy of	823
Navy, The Quarrel in the	514
New Railway Situation, The	516
Peace, Further Steps to	726
Peace, The Strenuous	215
Peers and the Poor, The	591
Penal Policy, The Reversal of Our	594
Pensions Bill, The Blot on the	333
Pensions Bill, The Final Form of the	515
Pensions Bill, The Limitations of the	405
Persia, Our Policy in	892

186702

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS (continued).

	PAGE
Persian Revolution, The Plight of the	443
Poor Law and the Family, The	727
Portuguese Slavery	301
Position of the Monarch, The	72
Poverty and Pauperism	212
Poverty and the State	477
Power of a Modern Newspaper, The	517
Prime Minister and Home Rule, The Late. By John Redmond, M.P.	217
Prime Minister, The Late	36
Prime Minister, The New	37
Prison Population, The	893
Protection, The "Broad" Road to	334
Protection, The Party of	75
Railway Policy, The Revolution in	695
Religion, The History of	858
Remitted to the Churches	261
Road and the People, The	859
Roosevelt Intervention, The	408
Socialism, Two Schools of	856
South Africa, The Next Phase in	73
South Africa, The Saving of	441
South American Ruler, A	792
Speculative Revival, The	335
Tradition of the Barricade, The	664
Triple Entente, The Basis of the	368
Tomlinson of Manchester, and Elsewhere	145
Turkish Reform, The Problem of	592
Turkey, The New Spirit in	559
Use of the Lash, The	38
Wanted, A New Scheme of Culture	561
Wanted, An Understanding with Germany ...	404
West, The Problem of the	299
What Does "Votes for Women" Mean?	409
What Votes for Women Should Mean	440

LIFE AND LETTERS.

	PAGE
A Bit of a Philosopher. By the Rev. S. Henry	413
A Child. By John Galsworthy	9
"A Distant Drum"	410
A Green Heaven	668
A Killing Competition	764
American Statesman, An	633
America, The Romance of	666
An Earthly Paradise	182
An Immortal. I. By the Rev. S. Henry ...	800
do. II. do. do. ...	899
An Impeachment of Cathedral Building	595
A Lost Child	484
Another Point of View. By May Kendall ...	566
A Revolutionary. By the Rev. S. Henry ...	702
Are Wild Animals Born Wild?	151
Art of Opening, The	598
A Saint. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham ...	449
A Study in "Overlooking." By W. Hale White (Mark Rutherford)	520
Background of Glory, The	265
Barmecide Feasts	861
Boat Race, The	44
Can Morals be Taught?	860
Can Trout be Educated?	733
Careful Joy	731
Caterpillars, The Year of	898
Child's Fetish, The	116
Christian Dogma and Folklore	897
Churches and the Social Soul, The	304
City of Dead Waters, The	521
Complete Anarchist, The	41
Cuckoo Habit, The	268
Dead March, The	10
Dearth of Genius, The	410
Death of the Rich Man, The. By Padraic Colum	119
Democracy and the Expert	375
Despair of an Intellectual, The	795
Do We Over-Eat?	597
Easter in Seville	40
End of the Land, The	699
English Fiction, The Outlook for	535
Englishman Born	339
Ethiopian's Skin, The	42
Faith of Free Thought, The	219
Fear. By John Galsworthy	76
Fiction, The Trade in	181
Fifty Years of Evolution	828
From Mid-Devon to Manchester. By C. F. G. Masterman, M.P.	150
Garden Primroses	43
Grampians, In the. By C. H. Herford	735
Hope. By John Galsworthy	218
"In His Blindness"	374
Irony	765
Interval, The	522
John Morley as Interpreter	445
Kitchen Garden, The	797
Legend of Faust, The	796
Life and the Poet	303
Little Living Creatures	830
London, The Tyranny of	306
"Los Peares, un Minuto." By R. B. Cunninghame Graham	45
Maelshaughlinn at the Fair. By Padraic Colum	306
Marathon, The	632
Mart, The	152
Meadow of the Dead, The. By Padraic Colum...	634
Mediterranean, In the	667
Men Against Sportsmen	266
"Merrie England"	894
Midsummer Trout, The	376

LIFE AND LETTERS (continued).

	PAGE
Millinery of Murder, The	267
Mind of the Bee, The	412
Mind of the Suburb, The	730
Mob-Mind, The	631
Molière and Modern Drama	520
Name of Gentleman, The	698
Olympia Rediviva. By Professor Gilbert Murray	563
One Point of View. By May Kendall	486
Onlooker's Risk, The	78
Order. By John Galsworthy	149
Over-Delicacy of Speech	485
Paka the Cat. By Captain C. H. Stigand	221
Panic	763
Passing of the Horse, The	829
Pathetic Fallacy, The. By May Kendall	766
Pleasant Land, The	77
Poet of Freedom, The	596
Power of the Voice, The	446
Recruits	564
Rush for the Sun, The	184
Sameness of Fashion, The	482
Samuel Butler, The Case of	483
Scholar's Melancholy, The	896
Science and the Supernatural	794
Sharing. By K.	117
Simple Life, The	12
Single-Flowered Rose, The	447
Surplus of Summer, The	669
The Deformed Transformed	697
The Fair	412
Tipping, The Economics of	115
Tolstoy, The Teaching of	827
Tongues of Pentecost, The	339
Town and Country	183
Tramp World, The	220
Tyranny of the Clock, The	118
Undercurrent, The	11
Unnecessary Brock, The	340
Visitors	862
Water of the Moors, The	565
Wild Bee, The	80

CONTEMPORARIES.

	PAGE
Osman Digna. By H. N. Brailsford	82
President Diaz	865

ART, MUSIC, AND THE DRAMA.

ART.

	PAGE
Pictures at the Artistes Français	271
Pictures at the Paris Salon	120
The Entente in Fine Art	378
The Londoner and His Buildings	601
The New Gallery	154
The Royal Academy	187
The Sorolla Exhibition	223

MUSIC.

	PAGE
An Artist and Some "Stars"	524
The Error of Bayreuth	672
The Significance of Richard Strauss	901
Three Opera Singers	269

THE DRAMA.

	PAGE
A Dramatic "Conversation." By H. W. M.	222
A Parable of Life and Art. By H. W. M.	416
A Revival of Poetic Tragedy. By H. W. M.	309
Mr. Barrie's Failure. By H. W. M.	832
Mr. Pinero's Study of Provincial Life. By H. W. M.	270
The Art of Stage Dancing. By H. W. M.	523
"The Gay Lord Quex." By H. W. M.	186
The Immortal Snob. By H. W. M.	451
The New Shylock. By H. W. M.	49
The Sad Case of Dr. Faust. By H. W. M.	866
The Stage and Modern Life. By H. W. M.	344
"Thrills." By H. W. M.	16

SCIENCE.

	PAGE
The Latest Conception of Matter. By Professor G. M. Minchin	489
The Problem of Flying. By Professor G. M. Minchin	703

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

	PAGE
A New Force in Agriculture	831
Mr. Morley's Indian Reforms. II. By Sir William Wedderburn	13
Naval Expenditure in 1909. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley	635
The Harmsworth Brand. I.	567
do. do. II.	599
do. do. III.	636
do. do. IV.	670
The Harmsworth Brand. V.	701
do. do. VI.	734
do. do. VII.	769
The Prospects of the Territorial Forces. By a Territorial Officer	377
The Reform of Liberal Organisation. By John Griffiths	308
Useless Naval Expenditure. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley	801
Will the Small Holdings Act Fail? By Charles Roden Buxton	414

OPEN QUESTIONS.

	PAGE
Free Trade Betrayed. By Ernest Villiers, M.P.	307
The Use of Public Libraries. By Dr. Ernest Baker	768
The Problem of Rural Housing. By Philip Morrell, M.P.	343

COMMUNICATIONS.

	PAGE
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By J. A. Hobson	902
In the Women's Ranks. By A Provincial Man	417
Mr. Gladstone's New Way with Old Offenders. By Tighe Hopkins	673
Mr. McKenna's Opportunity. By "One Who Knows"	121
The Control of the Upper Thames. By Philip Morrell, M.P.	527
The Crisis in the Publishing Trade. By A Literary Agent	345
The Cult of the Monster Warship. By Admiral Sir Cyprian A. G. Bridge	487
The Defects of the Housing Bill. By George Haw	155
The Dual Policy in India. By S. K. Ratcliffe ...	802
The Hyde Park Demonstration. By H. W. N....	453
The Income-Tax. By George McCrae, M.P. ...	16
The International Peace Congress. By G. H. Perris	602
The Largest of Our National Estates. By Resident	272
The "Messages" from Frederic Myers. By John W. Graham	867
The South American Naval Armaments. By One Who Knows	833
The State of the Daily Press. By A Journalist ...	638
The Sum of British Wealth. By A Fellow of the Royal Statistical Society	312
The Territorial Artillery. By E. Crawshay-Williams	224
"There Is No Conqueror But God." By R. B. Cunninghame Graham	771
Working Wives in Council. By Evelyn Sharp ...	453

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

	PAGE
An Epilogue to an Unfinished Drama. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	637
Austrian Policy in the Balkans. By Dr. Joseph Redlich	48
Is Constitutional Covernment in Turkey Possible?—I. By Edwin Pears	863
II. Do.	900
Parties in the Prussian Elections. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	81
The German War Peril. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	449
The Character of the German Workers' Insurance. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	798
The Merciful Tsar. By An Englishman in Russia	704
The New Attitude of the United States to Canada. By Edward Porritt	415
The Prussian "Urwahlen." By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	341
The Stifling of Freedom. By Ixe	153
The Tactics of M. Clémenceau	568
The Two Heads of the Freisinn. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	185
The Zeppelin Movement and German Nationalism. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein	736
To-morrow in Portugal. By An Old Resident ...	14

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

PAGE

"Fiscal Fallacies" (F. U. Laycock and R. C. Phillimore); The Suffragists and the Peckham Election (A. J. Marriott and J. Marshall Sturge); Tariff Reform and Motor-Cars ("Constant Reader"); Irish Liberalism ("An Irish Nationalist") 18

"Fiscal Fallacies" (J. A. H. and Frank Bowly); Tariff Reform and Motor-Cars (T. Palmer Newbould and G. G. Desmond); "The Victory of Free Trade Finance" ("Cobdenite"); "The Simple Life" ("Home Counties"); Are Armaments Necessary? (Hugh Pennington); The Detection of Fire (Frank Rowley); Protection and Public Plunder (R. Shindler); Hamburg (D. M. Stevenson); Peckham and Mr. Stiggins (C. J. Back); Women and the Suffrage ("A Woman Conservative" and E.P.) 50

The Practical Reconstruction of Country Life (Montague Fordham, M.A.); "Fiscal Fallacies" (R. C. Phillimore); Kangaroo Island ("A Man of the Woods"); The Justice of the Licensing Bill (J. W. F. Gillies, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.); The Problem of Medical Relief (G. C. C.); Hamburg (G. E. Harrison); Women Suffragists and the Government (J. M. Lloyd Thomas, "Yet Another Woman Liberal," and Jane Atkinson); The Use of the Lash ("A Liberal Member" and Carl Heath) 85

Martial Law in Natal (George Greenwood, M.P.); The "Crux" in "The Tempest" (E. W. Lummis); The Garrotting Fallacy ("Criminologist"); "The Practical Reconstruction of Country Life" (J. Frome Wilkinson); "The Merchant of Venice" at His Majesty's Theatre (H.V.R.); Protection and Unemployment (Forrest Hewit); Women and the Suffrage (B. C. S. and A. Kelly) 122

"C.-B." and Church Patronage (the Rt. Hon. George W. E. Russell); The New Policy of the Football Association ("Footballer"); Women and the Suffrage ("A Liberal Woman" and J. S. F.); Armaments and Utility (A. R.); A Shakespeare Memorial ("Observer"); "The Breaking Point" (C. Gasquoine Hartley); The Future of Poor-Law Administration (C. E. Maurice) 156

The Imprisonment of Osman Digna ("An Egyptian Correspondent"); Women and the Suffrage (Emma Hardy); "Are Wild Animals Born Wild?" (G. G. Desmond); What a Colonist Thinks (Thomas Yorath); Beer and the Bible ("A Manchester Man"); Russian Horrors (P. M. G.); A Shakespeare Memorial (L. J. Roberts); The Research Defence Society (Dr. Greville MacDonald); The "Crux" in "The Tempest" (Violet Churchill); The Sugar Convention ("Spectator"); The Problem of Unemployment (Arthur Kitson); Peckham (the Hon. Henry Lygon); The Explanation of the Licensing Bill (J. A. Swanwick); Country Life (J. Marshall Sturge) 188

The Sugar Convention ("Anti-Convention"); The Justice of the Licensing Bill ("Country Brewer"); The British Sunday and the Exhibition (Yves Guyot); Life of Delane (Arthur Irwin Dasent); The Trade in Fiction (Clement Shorter); Pensions and the Sinking Fund (L. Chiozza Money, M.P.); The Dundee Election (F. Hubert Jones) 225

PAGE

Experiments on Animals (Dr. Stephen Paget); The Justice of the Licensing Bill (R. Mortimer Montgomery); The Educational Rapprochement (F. E. Pollard); The Sugar Convention and Italy ("Anti-Convention"); Pensions and the Sinking Fund (T. A. Prest); The Riddle of the Bacchae (G. Norwood); What Does "Votes for Women" Mean? (A. Grimshaw Haywood); Bombs in India (A. St. John); The British Sunday and the Exhibition (Edward Brown); The Problem of Medical Relief (G. C. C.) 273

The Justice of the Licensing Bill (Sir Thomas P. Whittaker, M.P., "Country Brewer," and J. A. Swanwick); "Remitted to the Churches" (Austin Taylor, M.P.); "Simple Bible Teaching" (the Rev. Th. Hill); "The Riddle of the Bacchae" (Professor A. W. Verrall); Experiments on Animals (Dr. Greville MacDonald); What Does "Votes for Women" Mean? (Nancy Lightman); The Russian Visit (R. B. Cunninghame Graham); The Tolstoy Celebration: An Appeal (Edmund Gosse and Dr. C. Hagberg Wright); The Referendum (A. J. Marriott) ... 312

The Justice of the Licensing Bill (R. Mortimer Montgomery); Does the Sugar Convention Betray Free Trade? ("A Free Trader"); The Basis of Educational Peace ("Cheshire Incumbent" and the Rev. Arthur W. Hutton); The Pole Trap (Frank E. Lemon); Experiments on Animals (Dr. Stephen Paget); Dr. Verrall's Euripidean Theory (Professor Gilbert Murray); The Foundation of Christianity (the Rev. Th. Hill); The "Crux" in "The Tempest" (Pfarrer E. W. Lummis); The Russian and Servian Cases (Sir Edmund Verney); To Restore Confidence (Edwin Hill); The Landless Men in the West (Captain Bryan Cooper); Simple Bible Teaching (X.); The Problem of Indian Self-Government (G. F. Abbott); What Does "Votes for Women" Mean? (Florence Travers); Human or Divine? (Ellen Tighe Hopkins) 346

Does the Sugar Convention Betray Free Trade? (Ernest Villiers, M.P.); The Problem of Rural Housing (Philip Morrell, M.P.); Experiments on Animals (Dr. Greville MacDonald); Votes for Women (A. Grimshaw Haywood, Clementina Black, and Emily Tomlinson); "The Peril of the Government" (R. Henderson Smith); The Meaning of "Bande Mataram" (J. D. Rees, M.P.); Jesuits as Murderers ("A Catholic Reader of THE NATION"); Political and Theological Liberalism (C. E. Maurice); Liberal Adullamites (the Rev. Malcolm MacCallum); Trade Returns for May (W. T.); The Gathering of Wild Flowers and Fruit (S.); The Defence of the Licensing Bill (Lieut-Col. D. C. Pedder) ... 379

The Basis of the Triple Entente ("An Englishman in France"); "The Anti-Indian Englishman" (J. D. Rees, M.P.); The Meaning of "Bande Mataram" ("The Reviewer" and A. Porteous); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (A. Shadwell); "An Invasion of Liberty" ("A London Clergyman"); Does the Sugar Convention Betray Free Trade? (James Roberts); What Does "Votes for Women" Mean? (Florence Travers and N. Lightman); The Trade Returns (W. T.); The Pan-Anglican Congress and Divorce (Richard T. Gates); The "Crux" of "The Tempest" (V. Churchill); "The History of the Volunteers" (Major Cecil Sebag-Montefiore) 418

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

PAGE

The Pan-Anglican Congress and Divorce (the Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell); Why Pudsey Was Lost ("A Liberal Worker"); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (Earl Russell); Liberalism and Prison Reform (John M. Robertson, M.P.); Natives in the Indian Civil Service (G. F. Abbott); The Rating of Public Houses (the Hon. A. Holland-Hibbert); What Does "Votes for Women" Mean? (J. Abberley and (Mrs.) C. D. Rackham); "A Distant Drum" (Laurie Magnus); The Pan-Anglican Congress (G. H. Godwin); The Problem of Medical Relief (Francis Buxton); The Policeman's Weekly Day of Rest (J. Fletcher Little) 454

Votes for Women (R. N. H., Frank Bowly, and "A Radical Ex-Soldier"); The Meaning of "Bande Mataram" (J. D. Rees, M.P., and S. M. Mitra); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (Peter Macdonald, H. E. Gribble, Stuart J. Reid, D.C.L., J.P., and "Viator"); "An Invasion of Liberty" ("A London Clergyman"); "A Distant Drum" ("The Writer") 488

"The Lost Liberty of the Road" ("The Writer of the Article," "A Country Dweller," G. M. M., and Henry W. Beater); The Anglican Church and Marriage (Richard T. Gates); Is the Drama Dying? (Euphemia Stevens); "Over-Delicacy of Speech" (B.); The Prevention of Crime Bill (H. S. Salt); What Does "Votes for Women" Mean? ("Manchester School," Emily Tomlinson, A.Z., and T. Wilson); Association of Subscribers to Charities (Lord Avebury) 527

The Reform of the Upper Thames Conservancy (C. H. Cook); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (Peter Macdonald and Charles Robertson); "The Tyranny of London" (Philip J. Dear); Is the Drama Dying? (William Poel, K. S., and Ella Levy); The King and Foreign Policy (Julie Jephson); The Indeterminate Sentence (The Rev. W. D. Morrison); The Future of the Police (J. Fletcher Little); "Suffragette" History (W. A. Jolly); The Outlook for English Fiction (S.) 567

"Wanted—A New Scheme of Culture" (A. E. Z.); The Working of the Small Holdings Act (Alfred Rowntree); Suffragists and the Temperance Cause (Kate A. Hessel); The Indeterminate Sentence (Arthur St. John and B. L.); The New Spirit in Turkey (T. Palmer Newbould); "Is the Drama Dying?" (L. R. and Euphemia Stevens); Goethe's 78th Venetian Epigram (David Wilson); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (R. W. J., Henry Holiday, and S. D. W.); The Court of Criminal Appeal ("A Criminal Lawyer"); The Licensing Bill and Temperance (J. W. Wilson); Politics in a Hurry (Edwin Hill); Imperial Politics of Municipal Elections (Albert Raphael) ... 602

"Wanted—A New Scheme of Culture" (Cloudesley Brereton); The Indeterminate Sentence (The Rev. W. D. Morrison and Henry W. Nevinson); Mrs. Humphry Ward's Battalions (Mrs. Thomas Hardy); "The New Spirit in Turkey" (T. Palmer Newbould); "The Art of Opening" (R. Mudie-Smith); A Seaside Hotel for Working People (Lily H. Montague); Lord Cromer's Speech (The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (G. Cook, Geo. Edgar, J. E. Allan, and Henry S. Clough); Germany and England (Arnold Lupton, M.P.); Do We Overeat? (R. W. J.); Coastguard Service (Charles Sturge) 63

"The Lost Liberty of the Road" (George Calderon, R. W. J., and S. D. W.); The German Gymnastic Fêtes ("Observer"); Mrs. Humphry Ward's Battalions (Mrs. Florence Travers); Another "Marathon Race" (Andre de Bavier); Haggerston and After (F. W. Soutter); "The Tempest" Crux (N. W. Hill) 67

"The Lost Liberty of the Road" ("Cassandra," L. Marshall, Henry S. Clough, J. Colquhoun Reade, and S. Hine); The Art of Opening (the Right Hon. Robert Farquharson); Liberalism and Labor (Arthur Ponsonby, M.P.); Heaven as Town or Country (A. Clutton Brock); Some Fruits of the Free Trade Congress (Charles Hancock); The Indeterminate Sentence (Captain Arthur St. John); The Dilemma of a Liberal Lawyer ("Ignoramus"); Similes (S. Parnell Kerr) 70

The Lost Liberty of the Road (Sir Edmund Verney, Henry Broadhurst, A. M. Anderson, J. H. Chatterton, E. B. M., A. J. Marriott, "Fairplay," C. H., Francis Coutts, and "Cyclist"); Haggerston and After (F. W. Soutter); A Propos de Bottes (Thomas Seccombe); Nursing the Voters (Edwin Hill); The Dilemma of a Liberal Solicitor ("Another Liberal" and "Teetotal Solicitor"); "A Green Heaven" (Richard F. Jupp); The Work of the Industrial Law Committee (Irene Cox); Liberalism and Labor (The Rev. J. E. Hand); The Art of Ending (Max Judge); James II.'s Statue ("Antiquarian") 738

The Lost Liberty of the Road (Douglas Fox Pitt, Charles Hamfeldt, James Tinto, Henry Holiday, W. G. Wickham, "A Lawyer," W. Austen Bolam, "New Forest," J. C. Paget, and "Pro Bono Publico"); "A Crisis in Coffee" (Chas. Evers); "A Propos de Bottes" (G. W. E. R.); "A Green Heaven" (Sir Samuel Wilks and "The Writer of the Article"); Heaven as Seen by Children (John Higgins); Emden and Anglo-German Relations (Arnold White); The Dilemma of a Liberal Lawyer (C.) 772

The Lost Liberty of the Road (H. F. H.); The New Daily Press (P. J. Reid); Concerning the "Imitation of Whitman" (Henry Bryan Binns); Ideas of Heaven and Happiness (W. J. B.); A Green Heaven (J. M. Lloyd-Thomas); A Propos de Bottes (G. W. E. R.); "The Dark Side" (Lawrence Richardson); The Date of George Fox's Death (A. Neave Brayshaw); The Maintenance of "Dreadnoughts" (G.); Officialism in the Channel Islands ("Taxpayer") 804

"A South American Ruler" (the Consul for Venezuela); Taine's Letters (Frederic Harrison); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (John W. Graham, "Active Resister," Sir Jas. B. Smith, and H. Reynolds Brown, M.D.); Women Municipal Voters (J. Smith); England and Germany (A. Clutton Brock); Miss Beale and Women's Suffrage (Mrs. C. D. Rackham) 834

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

PAGE

A Protest (J. L. Balbi); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (T. Wilson, Thomas Howard, Alfred Ollivant, and J. Leng Sturrock); The Cause of Unemployment (J. J. Bisgood); The Trades Union Congress and Electoral Reform (John H. Humphreys); Catholics and Liberalism ("A Knight of St. Gregory" and W. P.); "Moderate and Extremist in India" (V. Chattopadhyaya); Moral Education Congress (St. G. L. Fox Pitt); "The Dilemma of a Liberal Lawyer" ("Ignoramus") 868

PAGE

The Lost Liberty of the Road ("A.," "Balak," John Grubb, Sir Edmund Verney, John Higgins, and T. Wilson); Don Porfirio (R. B. Cunninghame Graham); "Peru" (C. Reginald Enoch, F.R.G.S.); Can Morals be Taught? (F. Kettle); "The Doctrine of Tolerance" ("A Liberal M.P.," W. D., H. W. Francis, Walter Philip High, and M. L.); The "Messages" from Frederick Myers (G. Stafford Whitby); German Foreign Policy (J. H.) 903

DIARY OF THE WEEK.

1, 33, 69, 105, 141, 173, 209, 257, 293, 329, 365, 401, 437, 473, 511, 555, 587, 623, 659, 691, 723, 755, 787, 819, 851, 887.

THE WEEK IN THE CITY. BY "LUCELLUM."

28, 64, 100, 136, 168, 204, 236, 288, 324, 360, 396, 432, 468, 504, 550, 582, 618, 654, 686, 718, 750, 782, 814, 846, 882, 922.

THE WORLD OF BOOKS AND BOOKS TO BE READ.

20, 54, 84, 126, 160, 194, 228, 278, 316, 351, 384, 423, 459, 532, 574, 608, 644, 677, 807, 838, 873, 908.

PAGE

Insurance.—Theatre Risks 28

POETRY.

PAGE

A Boy's Heart. By C. H. Bewley... 272
A Chancery Ward. By Valentine Barlow ... 53
A Connacht Folk Song. By Padraic Colum ... 193
A Dream. By W. B. Yeats 525
A Somerset Lullaby. By Edward S. Tylee ... 742
A Song. By Herbert Trench 223
A Song of Semiramis. By Ethel Talbot 494
At Nightfall. By R. C. K. Ensor 315
Be Not Afraid. By Herbert Trench 607
Companionship. By R. M.... 526
Hoodwinked. By Wilfrid C. Thorley 573
In the Pine Wood. By J. W. Feaver 423
Joy and Pleasure. By W. H. Davies 676
Light o' the Moon. By Edward S. Tylee 872
Love's Birth. By William H. Davies 526
Nature's Moods. By William H. Davies 159
On Your Account I Shall Not Die. By Padraic Colum 776

PAGE

Starlight Distilleth. By Herbert Trench 525
Starlight on the Hill. By W. K. Fleming ... 837
Sonnet, from Pushkin. By C. Garnett 383
Sonnet—To an Empty Room. By J. Marjoram 643
The Dreamers Know. By the Rev. Wilfrid Richmond 526
The Forsaken Room. By J. Marjoram 125
The Gad-Fly. By Padraic Colum 526
The Gypsies' Road. By Dora Sigerson Shorter 83
The Interval. By Herbert Trench 19
The Moor Grave. By John Galsworthy 709
The Old School. By Thomas Burke 806
The Pauper. By Dora Sigerson Shorter 350
The Pine by the Lake. By Edward S. Tylee ... 458
The Ship Siren. Anon. 907
Thoughts. By William Watson 525

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

PAGE

Abbeys of Great Britain, The. By H. Claiborne Dixon 466
Absolution. By Clara Viebig 426
A Century of Political Development. By Hector Macpherson 60
Adam Cast Forth. By Charles M. Doughty ... 90
A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels. Edited by Jas. Hastings, D.D. 745
Admiralty of the Atlantic, The. By Percival Hislam 98
African Nature, Notes, and Reminiscences. By F. C. Selous, F.Z.S. 610
Age of Shakespeare, The. By Algernon Charles Swinburne (Professor Edward Dowden) 909

PAGE

A History of the Volunteer Forces, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1860. By Cecil Sebag-Montefiore 385
A Man of Genius. By M. P. Willcocks 542
American Shrines in England. By Alfred T. Story 652
A Mind that Found Itself. By C. W. Beers ... 24
A Modern Judas and Other Rhymes. By E. Vincent 645
An Apostle of the North. By H. A. Cody ... 96
Ancient Art. Vol. I of a History of Art. By Dr. G. Carotti 540
Ancient Italy. From the Italian of Signor Ettore Pais 202

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

Anglican Liberalism. By Twelve Churchmen (Canon Hensley Henson) 352
An Introductory History of England. By C. R. L. Fletcher. Vol. II. 1485-1660 918
Anne Page. By Netta Syrett 544
A Painter's Pastime. By Margaret Thomas ... 645
Armadin: A Tale of Old Winchester. By Alfred Bowker 546
Art and Artless. By W. D. Howells 200
Art of Singing and Vocal Declamation, The. By Sir Charles Santley 745
A Set of Six. By Joseph Conrad 746
Ashes. By Grazia Deledda... 232
Aspects of George Meredith. By Richard H. P. Curle 26
A Star of the Salons: Julie de Lespinasse. By Camilla Jebb 60
Astronomy of the Bible, The. By E. Walter Maunder 204
A Surburban Scandal. By Gurner Gillmann ... 546
A Tangled Web. By L. G. Moberley 544
Autobiography of Montagu Burrows, Captain R.N. 428
A Woman's Way Through Unknown Labrador. By Mrs. Leonidas Hubbard, Jun. 430

Babees Book, The. By Miss Edith Rickert ... 684
Ballad of a Great City and Other Poems. By David Lowe 645
Ballads and Lyrics of Socialism. By E. Nesbit... 645
Beau Brummell and His Times. By Roger Boutet de Monvel 62
Beaux of the Regency, The. By Lewis Melville... 356
Beloved Physician of Tsang Chou: Dr. Arthur D. Peill 920
Birds and Their Nests and Eggs. By G. H. Vos 814
Bishop's Scapegoat, The. By T. B. Clegg 542
Bonaparte and the Consulate. By A. C. Thibaudeau 609
Bonapartism. Six Lectures delivered in the University of London. By H. A. L. Fisher ... 55
Bond, The. By Neith Boyce 842
Bridge of Fire, The. By James Flecker 388
British Year Book of Agriculture and Who's Who. 394
Budget of Novels, A. (Various) 254
Builders of Florence, The. By J. Wood Brown, M.A. 92
Burden, The. By Anna Scott-Dawson 878
Burning Cresset, The. By Howard Pease ... 94
By Italian Seas. By Ernest C. Peixotto... ... 390

Cambridge History of English Literature, The. Edited by A. W. Ward, the Master of Peterhouse, and A. R. Waller. Vol. I. From the Beginning to the Cycles of Romance 57
Castles and Keeps of Scotland, The. By Frank Roy Frapie 684
Catherine of Bragança, Infanta of Portugal and Queen-Consort of England. By Lillias C. Davidson 96
Captain Margaret: A Romance. By John Masefield 464
Cane Boy, The. By Margaret A. McIntyre ... 136
Centuries of Meditations. By Thomas Traherne. Edited by Bertram Dobell 648
Century of Education, A. By H. Bryan Binns 616
Chats on Violincellos. By Olga Racster 62
Claude Achille Debussy. By Mrs. Franz Liebich 718
Complete Oarsman, The. By R. C. Lehmann ... 840
Complete Shot, The. By G. T. Teasdale-Buckell 680
Concerning Lafcadio Hearn. By George M. Gould, M.D. 877

PAGE

Confessions of a Beachcomber. By E. J. Banfield 920
Colonel Saunderson, M.P. By Reginald Lucas ... 322
Cradle of the Deep: An Account of a Voyage to the West Indies. The. By Sir Frederick Treves, Bart. 354
Crossrigs. By Mary Jane Findlater 134

Dan Riach, Socialist. By the Author of "Miss Molly" 200
Dartmoor Prison. By Basil Thomson 777
Dawn of the Constitution, The. By Sir James H. Ramsay 322
Dominy's Dollars. By B. Paul Neumann ... 546
Dorothea Beale of Cheltenham. By Elizabeth Raikes 810
Dual Heritage, The. By M. Godfrey-Faussett ... 544
Duanaire Finn, the Book of the Lays of Fionn. Part 1. Edited by Eoin MacNeill 808

Easter Eggs. From the German of Christopher von Schmid 26
Easy-go-Luckies, The. By Maud Stepney Rawson 878
Edward Fitzgerald and "Posh," Herring Merchants. By James Blyth 616
Edward Grieg. By E. Markham Lee 780
Elements of Angling, The. By H. T. Sheringham 780
Elizabethan Religious Settlement, The. By H. N. Birt, O.S.B. 577
England in the Seven Years' War. By Julian S. Corbett (J. Holland Rose) 243
English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act. Vols. II. and III. "The Manor and the Borough." By Sidney and Beatrice Webb (Professor Paul Vinogradoff) 162
English People Overseas: A History, The. Vol. I. By A. Wyatt Tilby 548
English Society in the Eleventh Century: Essays in English Medieval History. By Professor Paul Vinogradoff (Sidney and Beatrice Webb) 128

Fifth Queen Crowned, The. By Ford Madox Hueffer 94
Flemings, The. 542
Folk Lore as an Historical Science. By G. L. Gomme (Edward Clodd) 247
Forewarners, The. By Giovanni Cena 842
Fourth Ship, The. By Ethel C. Mayne 540
Fox Hunting, Past and Present 466
Francesca di Rimini: In Legend and in History. From the French of M. Charles Yriarte... ... 580
France in the Twentieth Century. By W. L. George 874
French Novelists of To-day. By Winifred Stephens 428
From a Hertfordshire Garden. By W. Beach Thomas 466
From Edinburgh to India and Burmah. By W. G. Burn Murdoch 358
From Pekin to Sikkim. By the Count de Lesdain 235
From St. Ive's to Land's End. By A. G. Folliot Stokes 750
From the North Foreland to Penzance. By Clive Holland 920

Gandia, The Duke of. By Algernon Charles Swinburne 56
Garcia, the Centenarian, and His Times. By M. Sterling Mackinlay 98
General History of Western Nations. By Emil Reich (Dr. Samuel Dill) 679
George Darley. The Complete Poetical Works of 235

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

George Baxter, Color Printer: His Life and Work. By C. T. Courtney Lewis 430
George Grenfell and the Congo. By Sir Harry Johnston 743
George Ridding, Schoolmaster and Bishop. By his wife, Lady Laura Ridding 130
Germany in the Middle Ages, 476-1250. By William Stubbs, D.D. 876
G. K. Chesterton: A Criticism 880
Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion, The. By J. G. Frazer. Part IV. Studies in Oriental Religion (Edward Clodd) 386
Gospels of Anarchy and Other Contemporary Studies. By Vernon Lee 614
Government of England, The. By A. Lawrence Lowell 496
Granada: Present and Bygone. By A. F. Calvert 779
Great Ralegh. By Hugh de Selincourt 880
Great Schism of the West, The. By L. Salembier 577
Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland 646

Herbert Spencer, The Life and Letters of. By David Duncan, LL.D. 279
Heredity and Selection in Sociology. By George Chatterton-Hill 918
Herodotus. Books VII., VIII., IX. With Introduction by R. W. Macan 713
Hero Lays. By Alice Milligan 462
Hill Rise. By W. B. Maxwell 878
History of Ireland to the Coming of Henry II. By Arthur O'Clery 287
History of Music to the Death of Schubert. By John K. Paine 202
History of Sculpture, A. By Ernest A. Short ... 132
History of Twenty-Five Years, 1856-1880, The. By Sir Spencer Walpole. Vols. III. and IV.... 910
History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England, A. By G. R. Balleine 580
History of the German People. Vols. XI. and XII. By Johannes Janssen 322
History of the Manchester Ship Canal. By Sir Bosdin Leech 58
H. M. I.: Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools. By E. M. Sneyd-Kynnersley 248
Holland. By Edward Penfield 394
Holyoake (George Jacob), Life and Letters of. By Joseph McCabe 460
Hugo Wolf. By Ernest Newman 250
Human Boy Again, The. By Eden Philpotts ... 544
Humors of the Fray. By Charles L. Graves ... 611
Hyde Park: Its History and Romance. By Mrs. Alec Tweedie 163

Ibsen, Copyright edition of. Vol. I. By William Archer and C. H. Herford 26
Impressions of India. By Sir Henry Craik ... 580
India, The Causes of Present Discontents in. By C. J. O'Donnell 280
India, The Real. By J. D. Rees, C.I.E., M.P.... 280
India Through the Ages: A Popular and Picturesque History of Hindustan. By Flora Annie Steel 680
Innocent the Great. By C. H. C. Pirie-Gordon... 577
Insect Book, The. By W. P. Westell 880
In Spain. By John Lomas (Major Martin Hume) 385
Inward Light, The. By H. Fielding Hall ... 196
Irish and English: Portraits and Impressions. By Robert Lynd 204
Irish Poems of Alfred Perceval Graves, The ... 462

PAGE

James Annand, M.P. By J. L. McCallum ... 716
James II. and His Wives. By Allan Fea... ... 844
James Thomson. By G. C. Macaulay 317
Jean Racine. Par Jules Lemaître 230
Jerusalem. The Topography, Economics, and History from the Earliest Times to A.D. 70. By George Adam Smith, D.D. 461
Jewellery. By H. Clifford Smith... 743
Johnson on Shakespeare. Raleigh 711
John Stephenson Rowntree: His Life and Work. Memoir by Phœbe Doncaster 500
John Thadeus Delane: His Life and Correspondence. By Arthur Irwin Dasent 161

"Kaiser Karls Geisel. Ein Legendenspiel." Von Gerhart Hauptmann 245
Keepers of the House. By Cosmo Hamilton ... 544
Kent. By Walter Jerrold 166
Key of the Door, The. By R. Ramsay 544
King's Customs, The. By Henry Alton and H. H. Holland 548
King's General in the West, The. By Rev. Roger Granville 136
Kitty Tailleur. By May Sinclair 500
Knocking at the Door and Other Poems, The. By Alice Maddock 645

Land of Enchantment, The. Illustrated. By Arthur Rackham 390
Land of the Maple Leaf, The. By B. Stewart ... 60
Land's End, The. By W. H. Hudson 576
Last Shore, The. By Vincent Brown 546
Later Years of Catherine de Medici, The. By Edith Sichel 711
Leaf and Tendril. By John Burroughs 844
Leonardo da Vinci. By H. H. Cust 287
Letters from Queer Street. By J. H. M. Abbott 578
Letters of the Wordsworth Family from 1787 to 1855. Collected and edited by William Knight. 3 Vols. (Professor Edward Dowden) 21
Liège and the Ardennes. By G. W. T. Omond and A. Forestier 466
Literary and Historical Essays. By Henry Grey Graham 98
Literary History of the Arabs, A. By R. A. Nicholson 132
Little Brown Brother, The. By Stanley Portal Hyatt 648
Little Dauphin, The. By Catherine Welch ... 839
London Churches: Ancient and Modern. By T. Francis Bumpus... 62
Lord Wantage, V.C., K.C.B. A Memoir. By his Wife 252
Lotus Leaves. By Israfel 718
Love Letters of Mary Wollstonecraft to Gilbert Imlay, The 64
Love's Shadow. By Ada Leverson 546

Magnate, The. By Robert Elson... 811
Making of Ireland and Its Undoing, The. 1200-1600. By Alice Stopford Green 534
Many Junes. By Archibald Marshall 24
Many Mansions. By A. L. Lilly 682
Marie de Médicis and the Court of France in the XVIIth Century. By Louis Batiffol. Translated by Mary King, and Edited by H. W. C. Davies 430
Marotz. By John Ayscough 163
Maurice Guest. By Henry H. Richardson ... 912
Michael Davitt, Revolutionary, Agitator, and Labor Leader. By F. Sheehy-Skeffington ... 610

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

Military Geography of the Balkan Peninsula. By Professor Lionel Lyde and Colonel Mockler-Ferryman 60
Medievalism: A Reply to Cardinal Mercier. By George Tyrrell 710
Memories of Eight Parliaments. By H. W. Lucy ("Toby, M.P.") 164
Memories of London in the 'Forties. By David Masson 426
Memories of Men and Books. By The Rev. A. J. Church 282
Memoir of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake, 1744-1808. By Colonel Hugh Pearse 286
Memoirs of Edward Vaughan Kenealy, LL.D. By Arabella Kenealy 358
Memoirs of Field-Marshall Sir Henry Wylie Norman. By Sir William Lee-Warner ... 196
Mr. Apollo: A Just Possible Story. By Ford Madox Hueffer 779
Mr. Clutterbuck's Election. By Hilaire Belloc ... 612
Mr. Crewe's Career. By Winston Churchill ... 284
Mr. Gladstone at Oxford, 1890. By C. R. L. F.... 546
Mr. Saffery's Disciple. By L. Parry Truscott ... 842
My Devonshire Book. By J. Henry Harris ... 748
My Father: An Aberdeenshire Minister. 1812-1891. By W. Robertson Nicoll (Hector Macpherson) 281
My School and My Gospel. By Sir Hubert Herkomer 98
My Son and I. By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann ... 542
Municipal Lessons from Southern Germany. By Dr. H. S. Lunn 466
Muse in Motley, The. By Hartley Carrick ... 611
Modern Egypt. By the Earl of Cromer. (Second Notice) 89
Modern England: A Record of Opinion and Action, from the Time of the French Revolution to the Present Day. By Alfred William Benn ... 575
Modernism: A Record and a Review. By A. Leslie Lilley 198
Mont St. Michel and Other Poems. By Rowland Thirlmere 645
Moral Instruction and Training in Schools. Edited by Prof. M. E. Sadler 910
More Society Recollections. By English Officer ... 394
Morning of Life, The. By Augustus Ralli ... 645
Mothers in Israel. By J. S. Fletcher 24
Motor Tours in Wales and the Border Counties. By Mrs. Rodolph Stawell... 548

National Idealism and a State Church. By Stanton Coit. (G. K. Chesterton) 245
Nature Rambles in London. By Miss K. M. Hall 652
Nature Studies by Night and Day. By F. C. Snell 652
Never Say Die. By the Grand Duke Michael Michaelowitz 392
New Poems. By St. John Lucas 645
Nineveh. By G. S. Vierick 388
North-West Passage, The. By Roald Amundsen 425
Notable Scottish Trials: The Trial of A. J. Monson. Edited by John W. More 204

Old England: Her Story Mirrored in Her Scenes. By W. Shaw Sparrow and James Orrock ... 650
On Cumbrian and Cambrian Hills. By Henry Salt 684
Opera, The. By R. A. Streatfield... 318
Our Lady in Art. By Mrs. Henry Jenner ... 396
Outposts of Empire. By John Lang 684
Oxford English Dictionary, The. Parts of Vol. VI. and VII. 318

PAGE

Parerga. By Canon Sheehan 62
Passing of Morocco, The. By Frederick Moore ... 204
Peak Country, The. By W. Biscombe Gardner and A. R. Hope Moncrieff 394
Perfect Garden, The. By Walter P. Wright ... 718
Peru. By C. Reginald Enoch, F.R.G.S. (R. B. Cunninghame Graham) 875
Photographic Handbook, The. By C. Harrison and J. C. Douglas 716
Plainer Fare and Less of It. By Miss Alice Braithwaite... 750
Poems of Love and Death. By Lady Lindsay ... 388
Poems Old and New. By Margaret L. Woods ... 388
Portuguese Architecture. By W. C. Watson (L. March Phillipps) 247
Practice and Theory of Navigation, The. By the Earl of Dunraven 91
Principles of Western Civilisation. By Benjamin Kidd 26
Priory-Church of Bartholomew the Great, The. By George Worley 880

Quaker and Courtier: The Life and Work of William Penn. By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant ... 778
Quelques Lettres, sur des questions actuelles et sur des événements récents. Par Alfred Loisy ... 22

Rachel Gurney of the Grove. By Sir Alfred E. Pease 57
Rambles of an Australian Naturalist. By Thomas Ward 250
Raw Edges. By Perceval Landon... 354
Recollections. By David Christie Murray ... 841
Records of Stirring Times, 1726-1822 98
Red Lily, The. By Anatole France. Translated by Winifred Stephens 533
Rhine: Its Valley and History, The 168
Richard Kennoway and His Friends. By Katherine Stewart 62
Richard Wilson. Makers of British Art Series. By Beaumont Fletcher 98
Riddle of the Bacchae, The. By G. Norwood (Gilbert Murray) 244
Romantic Tales from the Panjab, with Indian Nights' Entertainment. By Charles Swynnerton 202
Royal House of Stuart, The. By Samuel Cowan ... 647

Sacred and Profane Love, and Other Poems. By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate 195
Sanity of William Blake, The. By Dr. Greville Macdonald 580
Search for the Western Sea, The. By L. J. Barpee 286
Servitude. By Irene Osgood 713
School Books 914, 916
Shakespeare Apocrypha, The. Edited by E. F. Tucker Brooke 428
Shakespeare Library, The 166
Shakespeare Problem Re-stated, The. By G. G. Greenwood 546
Short History of the English Bar, A. By Bernard W. Kelly 846
Socialist Movement in England, The. By Brougham Villiers... 91
Social Law in the Spiritual World. By Rufus M. Jones 679
Some British Birds 168
Songs of the Uplands. By Alice Law 645
Sorrowful Princess, The. By Eva Gore-Booth ... 645
Soul of Spain, The. By Havelock Ellis (Major Martin Hume) 385

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

South Africa at Home. By Robert H. Fuller ... 394
Speeches by the Hon. G. K. Gokhale, C.I.E. ... 809
Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope. By Horace Annesley Vachell 60
Stained Glass Tours in France. By C. H. Sherrill 358
St. George for Merrie England. By Margaret H. Bulley 202
Stories by Edgar Allen Poe 652
Story of English Diplomacy, The. By T. H. S. Escott 466
Story of the Guides, The. By Colonel Younghusband 844
Studies of Political Thought, from Gerson to Grotius, 1414-1625. By J. N. Figgis 230
Summer Tour in Finland. By Paul Wainemann 748
Swiss Democracy: The Study of a Sovereign People, The. By J. A. Hobson... 714

Tragedy of Korea, The. By F. A. Mackenzie ... 286
Táin, The: An Irish Epic Told in English Verse. By Mary A. Hutton 280
Talmudic Legends: Hymns and Paraphrases. By Alice Lucas 645
Thief on the Cross, The. By Mrs. Harold Gorst 544
Thirteen Colonies of North America, The. By R. W. Jeffery 26
Through a Pier Glass: Winnie's Adventures in Wastemonster. By Arthur Waghorne... ... 166
Through Finland to St. Petersburg. By A. MacCallum Scott 430
Through the Depths of Space: A Primer of Astronomy. By Hector Macpherson, jun. ... 882
Tower of London, The. By John Fulleylove and Arthur Poyser 614
Trout Waters of England, The. By W. M. Gallichan 748
Truth about Port Arthur, The. By M. E. K. Nojine 202
Tryst, The. By L. M. Watt 388
Types of Tragic Drama. By C. E. Vaughan ... 96
Tyrol. By W. A. Baillie-Grohman 548

Vales and Wolds of Yorkshire. By Gordon Home 394
Valladolid, Oviedo, and Segovia. By A. F. Calvert 716
Victorian Chancellors, The. By T. B. Atlay. Vol. II. 498
Victoria the Woman. By Frank Hird 880
Vigil of Brunhild, The. By Frederic Manning ... 645
Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England. By J. Churton Collins 424
Vom Rückgang der deutschen Bühne. Von Paul Goldmann 245

West Country Verses. By Arthur L. Salmon ... 645
White Rose of Weary Leaf. By Violet Hunt ... 134
White Wedding, The. By M. P. Shiel 542
Whistler. By Bernhard Sickert 358
Wild Geese, The. By Stanley J. Weyman ... 680
Wild Honey from Various Thyme 538
William Clarke: A Collection of His Writings. By Herbert Burrows and J. A. Hobson ... 234
Woman Who Vowed, The. By Ellison Harding 546

Short Notices and Reprints 62, 100, 204, 236, 324, 360, 396, 432, 468, 504, 550, 577, 582, 616, 654, 686, 780, 812, 882, 922

AUTHORS' INDEX.

PAGE

Baker, Dr. Ernest:—The Use of Public Libraries 768
Barlow, Valentine:—A Chancery Ward 53
Bernstein, Dr. Edward:—
An Epilogue to an Unfinished Drama ... 637
Parties in the Prussian Elections 81
The Character of the German Workers' Insurance 798
The German War Peril 449
The Prussian "Urwahlen" 341
The Two Heads of the Friesinn 185
The Zeppelin Movement and German Nationalism 736
Bewley, C. H.:—A Boy's Heart 272
Brailsford, H. N.:—Osman Digna... 82
Bridge, Admiral Sir Cyprian A. G.:—The Cult of the Monster Warship 487
Burke, Thomas:—The Old School 806
Buxton, Charles Roden:—Will the Small Holdings Act Fail? 414

Chesterton, G. K.:—An Agnostic Establishment 245
Clodd, Edward:—
The Golden Bough 386
The History of Folk-lore 247
Colum, Padraic:—
A Connacht Folk Song... 193
Maelshaughlinn at the Fair 306
On Your Account I shall not Die 776

PAGE

Colum, Padraic (cont.):—
The Death of the Rich Man 119
The Gad-Fly 526
The Meadow of the Dead 634
Crawshay-Williams, E.:—The Territorial Artillery 224

Davies, William H.:—
Joy and Pleasure 676
Love's Birth 526
Nature's Moods... 159
Dill, Dr. Samuel:—Through Fellowship to Faith 679
Dowden, Professor Edward:—
Mr. Swinburne as Eulogist 909
Wordsworth as a Letter Writer 21

Ensor, R. C. K.:—At Nightfall 315
Eversley, The Right Hon. Lord:—
Campbell-Bannerman in the Abbey 264
Naval Expenditure in 1909 635
Useless Naval Expenditure 801

Feaver, J. W.:—In the Pine Wood 423
Fleming, W. K.:—Starlight on the Hill 837

Galsworthy, John:—
A Child 9
Fear 76
Hope 218
Order 149
The Moor Grave 709

AUTHORS' INDEX (continued).

PAGE

Garnett, Mrs. Constance:—Sonnet, from Pushkin 383
Graham, J. W.:—The "Messages" from Frederic Myers 867
Graham, R. B. Cunninghame:—
A Saint 449
"Los Peares, un Minuto" 45
Peru 875
"There is no Conqueror but God" 771
Griffiths, John:—The Reform of Liberal Organisation 308

Haw, George:—The Defect of the Housing Bill 155
Henry, The Rev. S.:—
A Bit of a Philosopher... 413
A Revolutionary 702
An Immortal. I. 800
Do. do. II. 899
Hensley Henson, Canon H.:—Anglican Liberalism 352
Herford, Professor C. H.:—In the Grampians ... 735
Hobson, J. A.:—Bad Harvests and Unemployment 902
Hopkins, Tighe:—Mr. Gladstone's New Way with Old Offenders 673
Hume, Major Martin:—Spain through English Spectacles 385

Ixe:—The Stifling of Freedom 153

Kendall, Miss May:—
Another Point of View ... ... — 566
One Point of View 486
The Pathetic Fallacy 766

Macpherson, Hector:—A Study in Scottish Character 281
March Phillipps, L.:—The Arab in Architecture 247
Marjoram, J.:—
Sonnet.—To an Empty Room... 643
The Forsaken Room 125
Masterman, C. F. G., M.P.:—From Mid-Devon to Manchester 150
McCrae, George, M.P.:—The Income-Tax ... 17
Minchin, Professor G. M.:—
The Latest Conception of Matter 489
The Problem of Flying... 703
Morrell, Philip, M.P.:—
The Control of the Upper Thames 527
The Problem of Rural Housing 343
Murray, Professor Gilbert:—
Olympia Rediviva 563
The Riddle of the Bacchae 244

Pears, Edwin:—Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible? 863, 900
Perris, G. H.:—The International Peace Congress 602
Porritt, Edward:—The New Attitude of the United States to Canada 415

Ratcliffe, S. K.:—The Dual Policy in India ... 802
Redlich, Dr. Joseph:—Austrian Policy in the Balkans 48
Redmond, John, M.P.:—The Late Prime Minister and Home Rule 217
Richmond, The Rev. Wilfrid:—The Dreamers Know 526
Rose, Professor J. Holland:—The Strategy of Pitt 243
Rutherford, Mark (W. Hale White):—A Study in Overlooking 520

Sharp, Miss Evelyn:—Working Wives in Council 453
Shorter, Mrs. Dora Sigerson:—
The Gypsies' Road 83
The Pauper 350
Stigand, Captain C. H.:—Paka the Cat 221

Talbot, Miss Ethel:—A Song of Semiramis ... 494
Thorley, Wilfrid C.:—Hoodwinked 573
Trench, Herbert:—
A Song 223
Be Not Afraid 607
Starlight Distilleth 525
The Interval 19
Tylee, Edward S.:—
A Somerset Lullaby 742
Light o' the Moon 872
The Pine by the Lake 458

Villiers, Ernest, M.P.:—Free Trade Betrayed ... 307
Vinogradoff, Professor Paul:—A History of Local Government 162

Watson, William:—Thoughts 525
Webb, Sidney and Beatrice:—The England of Domesday 128

Wedderburn, Sir William:—
Mr. Morley's Indian Reforms. II. 13
Do. do. III. 481

Yeats, W. B.:—A Dream 525

J. A. H.:—The Single Trade Test 47

K.:—Sharing 117

R. M.:—Companionship 526

H. W. N.:—The Hyde Park Demonstration ... 453

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 1.] SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
The Diary of the Week ...	1
Politics and Affairs:—
The Inevitability of Home Rule	4
An Olive Branch	5
The New Hope for Macedonia	6
The Victory of Free Trade Finance	7
Life and Letters:—
A Child. By John Galsworthy	9
The Dead March	10
The Undercurrent	11
The Simple Life	12
Present Day Problems:—
Mr. Morley's Indian Reforms. II. By Sir William Wedderburn	13
Letters from Abroad:—
To-morrow in Portugal. By an Old Resident	14
The Drama:—
"Thrills." By H. W. M. ...	15
Communications:—
The Income-Tax. By George McCrae, M.P.	16
Letters to the Editor:—
"Fiscal Fallacies." By F. U. Laycock and R. C. Phillimore	18
The Suffragists and the Peckham Election. By A. J. Marriott and J. Marshall Sturge	19
Tariff Reform and Motor Cars. By Constant Reader	19
Irish Liberalism. By An Irish Nationalist	19
Poetry:—
The Interval. By Herbert Trench	19
The World of Books ...	20
Books to be Read	20
Reviews:—
Wordsworth as a Letter Writer. By Professor Edward Dowden	21
Loisy's Apologia	22
Two Studies in Life	24
Books in Brief	24
Insurance:—
Theatre Risks	28
The Week in the City ...	28

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Mr. John Redmond's resolution, demanding for the Irish people "the legislative and executive control of all purely Irish affairs," was carried in the House of Commons on Monday by a majority of 156, with the addition of a rider by Mr. Simon subjecting an Irish Legislature to the "supreme authority of the Imperial Parliament." A directly negative amendment, moved by Lord Percy, was defeated by a larger majority of 192. A small body of twenty-two Liberal members, including Lord Dalmeny, voted against Home Rule, the majority consisting of a union of Liberals, Labour men, and Nationalists. Mr. Redmond's main object was, as he said, to free the hands of the Liberal Party for the future, and Mr. Balfour pointed this hint by asking the Government, through Mr. Asquith, to say whether, though they were still favourable to Home Rule in principle, they abandoned it in practice, or whether they would make it the first plank in their next electoral platform. Mr. Asquith answered Mr. Balfour's first question, but not his second. The final solution of the Irish problem could only, he said, be found "in self-government in regard to purely local affairs," subject to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Home Rule, however, was part of a still larger change—namely, the general separation of Imperial from local affairs. The reconciling of Imperial supremacy with local autonomy represented the secret of Empire. Mr. Healy received this declaration with cold disdain. "Gladstone was dead, the Prime Minister was stricken, Ireland had now to deal with the Chancellor of the Exchequer." What was to be the leading question at the next General Election? It was the Government's business to produce a plan, not as Mr. Birrell had suggested, a party representing poor peasants. Mr. Healy's speech found no echo in his party, but the "Freeman's Journal" remarks that "if Ireland is to be governed by a Unionist party, it will not be a Liberal Unionist party."

* * *

The Bishop of St. Asaph's olive-branch in education seems likely to take root. The second reading of his Bill was not pressed in the House of Lords on Tuesday owing to Lord Lansdowne's carping speech, which was doubtless inspired by Mr. Balfour, and the opposition of the High Church section, led by Bishop Gore. But the Primate, in what Lord Rosebery called a "brave and noble" speech, gave it a personal and official blessing on the ground that it offered "freedom of religious choice" both to parents and teachers. Dr. Davidson added a still more significant tender of peace to Nonconformity on the ground that the time had come for "men who really care" to stand together. This note has been emphasised in the "British Weekly," and less strongly in the "Methodist Times," the former warning its readers that "simple Bible teaching" cannot be forced on objecting Churchmen. The Government, while of course adhering to Mr. McKenna's proposal, practically accepted the St. Asaph Bill as a "basis" of discussion. "General facilities," said Lord Crewe, were their "first love," but the difficulties were serious. Lord Lansdowne suggested and led up to Tory opposition, but admitted that the responsibility of rejecting a settlement would be great. The Ritualists, unselfishly led by Dr. Knox and Dr. Wace, are in arms against the Bill, and the Catholics, Irish and English, are necessarily hostile in its present form. Mr. Hirst Hollowell also attacks it, as a scheme for sectarianising the public schools. But its moral success is considerable.

* * *

The financial year, which ended on Tuesday, has been something of a bumper for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has obtained £3,703,000 more revenue than he anticipated, and the departments have spent less than he expected by £493,000. This leaves a balance of about five millions for the relief of the National Debt. The outstanding feature of the revenue returns is the striking success of the Chancellor's scheme of differentiation. In spite of the threepenny reduction for earned incomes under £2,000 a year, Mr. Asquith, who budgeted for a loss of £1,100,000, has secured an increase of £780,000. As for the future, the Chancellor should have ample means of initiating his old age pensions scheme in the last quarter of the coming year.

* * *

The Irish University Bill, introduced by Mr. Birrell on Tuesday, follows the line we expected it to take. It was accepted by all sections of the Liberal Party, including the Nonconformists, and by the official Opposition, represented by Mr. Balfour, the only dissenting section being the Ulster Unionists, who commanded twenty-four votes. It leaves Trinity College alone, and establishes two new teaching Universities, one a single-college institution in Belfast, the other a three-college establishment on a federated basis, including the Queen's Colleges of Cork and Galway and a new college in Dublin. The purely examining Royal University will be dissolved, and outlying institutions like Magee College, Maynooth, and University College, Dublin, will in one form or another be merged in the coming University. Tests are excluded from the two new institutions, which will eventually be governed by their Senates, after an opening period of nomination. Students and professors of all creeds will be eligible, and the State will only subsidise secular instruction. The new Dublin College, which is the centre of the scheme, is to have an endowment of £32,000 and a building grant of £150,000, which strikes us as inadequate to the founding of a residential college. Trinity has about £70,000 a year. The two Universities cannot be described as denominational, though, as Mr. Birrell said, one is planted on Protestant, the other on Catholic, ground. The measure seems sure of a passage, though the Irishmen will probably ask for more money.

* * *

The Bill for reconstituting the Port of London under the control of a public, but not a municipal, authority, was introduced on Thursday. It bears evidence of Mr. George's fertile mind and genius for negotiation and arrangement. The model chosen is that of Liverpool. The scheme properly separates the upper and lower river at Teddington Lock, appointing a new and appropriate authority for each. For the lower river, there is to be an expert commercial body—why not with a representative of labour?—for the upper river, a local guardianship. All the dock companies have come in to the terms of voluntary purchase, and their shareholders will take dock stock in exchange for their present holdings. The new Dock Board will consist of twenty-five representatives, fourteen elected by a joint constituency of payers of dues, owners of river craft, and wharfingers, and ten nominated by public bodies. The London County Council only gets five representatives, two of them "experts" from outside. On the other hand, it is not asked for a guarantee from the rates. The new Port Board is to be self-supporting, it must expand its income by raising its dock or harbour dues, and extensions and improvements will have to be supplied from fresh capital. In all, the purchase-money will, says the "Daily Chronicle," amount to £21,852,491, not an unreasonable figure. It will be seen that the plan involves neither nationalisation nor municipalisation. It is unification, with public control.

* * *

The Liberal Party has properly resumed its earlier work of forcing Mr. Balfour into specific declarations in favour of Protectionist policy. A resolution of Mr. Mond, ably argued on Tuesday, condemning Mr. Balfour's latest tactic of small duties on many articles, was carried by 280 votes to 91. This plan, as Mr. Rea said, meant a recurrence to the abortive and vexatious policy of 1842, whose failure converted Peel and Gladstone to Free Trade, and whose application would be disastrous to our intricate modern industry. Mr. Balfour spoke with embarrassment. His thesis was the failure of Free Trade finance. In the face of Mr. Asquith's surplus of five millions, and the increase in the yield of the death duties and the income-tax, he maintained that no more could be got out of either of these imposts, or out of the tea and sugar duties! Incidentally Mr. Balfour showed that he was ignorant of the fact that Hamburg was a free port—a somewhat discreditable omission in his education as an economist. He favoured an increase in the number of custom duties, combined with preferences. In a vivid answering speech, Mr. Runciman, declaring that the Opposition leader was committed to a "general tariff," got from him the admission that he was pledged to a "very wide increase in the basis of taxation." Mr. Balfour listened in silence to a further statement that he was now pledged to "food taxes." We wish him joy of his new electoral cry, "More taxes and plenty of them!"

* * *

The appointment of Dr. Hill to succeed Mr. Tower as American Ambassador in Berlin has occasioned a most instructive episode. The appointment was approved some months ago by the Kaiser, but apparently he later changed his mind, and formally, or informally, suggested that it might be revoked. The only ground of objection to Dr. Hill, who is a scholar of eminence, as well as an experienced and skilled diplomatist, was his lack of money, and the "Vossische Zeitung," in an amazing article, explained that he "does not possess the financial means to make an appearance in a manner corresponding with the position of the United States as a World Power." This illuminating estimate of the nature and machinery of diplomacy has provoked a good deal of feeling in America, more particularly as American people pride themselves on not letting money appoint their Ambassadors. The episode has been closed by the Kaiser withdrawing all objections to Dr. Hill, and by President Roosevelt formally announcing his determination to make war on the doctrine that only millionaires are fit to represent the United States abroad.

* * *

The result of the Cape elections seats the Merriman Ministry firmly in power. It will possess commanding majorities in both Houses. In the Council it will hold seventeen seats against eight Progressives. In the Assembly, though the returns are incomplete, the South African Party has already gained ten seats, winning some of them even in the towns. The task of the new Government is the unification of South Africa.

* * *

Mr. Burns's Housing and Town Planning Bill follows largely the lines of the forecast published in The Nation a few weeks ago. So far as housing procedure is concerned, the measure embodies no sensational, hardly even a novel, departure. It rather proceeds upon the principle of simplifying and loosening existing machinery, and placing large powers of compulsion in the hands of the Local Government Board. Local authorities will be able, if they please, to proceed easily and effectively with the work of clearing slum areas, and to compel neglectful owners to maintain working-class dwellings in a proper condition of repair and sanitation. The consent of magistrates to closing orders is dispensed with, and procedure in the way of demolition is accelerated, but the owners of the property concerned are given the right of appeal to the Local Government Board. Part III. of the Housing Act of 1890, under which municipal building schemes can be set on foot, loses its adoptive character, and takes effect automatically, whilst the conditions under which money is borrowed are eased. In the event of local authorities neglecting to exercise their powers, the Local Government Board can step in with its mandamus upon a simple "representation." If Parliament approves this centralisation of housing incentive a separate department will have to be established at the Local Government Board for carrying out these new and somewhat complex duties. Unless this is done the Act may easily become a dead letter. A reactionary administration, dealing with one of the most reactionary departments in the public service, can reduce it to little or nothing.

The town planning powers embodied in the Bill are limited, but they include the compulsory purchase of land. Here again the operation of the measure will be made or marred by the Local Government Board. No local authority will be able to proceed with the making of a town plan without the consent of the Government Department, whose sanction will be needed at almost every stage of the scheme. The local authorities, however, will be given full powers to enforce their town plans, and, in regard to the compulsory purchase of land, they will be able to apply the principle of "betterment" for the relief of persons whose property may be injuriously affected. This latter is one of the most valuable features of the town planning clauses. Another useful provision is that enabling local authorities to combine for the purposes of town planning. The chief peril in administering the Bill will be the creation of inflated values, which may encourage the erection of block dwellings and the overcrowding of sites—a fatal development. It is a danger which, as correspondents of The Nation have testified, is very real in many parts of Germany. The reception of the Bill is, on the whole, favourable, and it will be handled on non-party lines. It is defective in some points. It does not set up a compulsory register of houses—one of the most valuable and necessary of reforms. And it does not give cheap enough money—the terms are not as good as those which Irish tenants have secured. Why should England be worse off than Ireland?

* * *

The Finnish Diet has precipitated an untimely Ministerial crisis. The present Finnish Executive or Senate came into office after the general strike of December, 1905, and consists of Moderate Constitutionalists. In a very difficult situation it has thought the best way to preserve Finnish liberties was to yield a good deal to the demands of the Russian Government, especially in the matter of political arrests. This policy has brought a double attack upon it in the Diet. The Old Fennomans complained that it was not active enough in surrendering political suspects; the Social Democrats that it was too subservient to Russian Reactionaries. An Old Fennoman vote of censure was rejected, but a Social Democratic vote of censure was carried, owing to the Old Fennomans abstaining from voting, and the Senate resigned. The Senate is not theoretically dependent on Parliament, and it is not certain that the Czar will accept the resignation. It will not be easy to get a successor, because a Social Democratic Senate is out of the question, and the Old Fennomans are more reactionary than the Moderate Constitutionalists. The episode is the more untimely because the Duma is taking an unfriendly interest in Finnish affairs, and strong influences are steadily at work against Finnish liberties.

* * *

Prince Buelow last week explained his attitude towards the franchise question. By way of justifying the existing Prussian class franchise, he said that the Imperial universal suffrage was certainly not sacrosanct, and many wise persons had their doubts about it. Still, he did not propose to alter it, but certainly he would not introduce it into Prussia, where it would put the Socialists into power. He could not understand, he added, how Liberals could face that prospect. There is not much evidence that they are anxious to run the risk. Their franchise agitation in Prussia is of the most lukewarm character, and their representatives in the Reichstag have just made another hole in their traditions by consenting to a compromise on the language clause of the Associations Bill, which will straightway prevent large sections of Poles, Danes, and Alsatians using their mother tongue at public meetings, and, after twenty years, put a gag upon them all. The bloc is rapidly destroying what sincerity remained in German Liberalism.

* * *

A rather flighty sensation has been caused by Colonel Maude's statement in the "Contemporary Review" that Mr. Simpson, the metallurgical expert, had invented a weapon able to impart an initial velocity of 10,000 yards a second to projectiles of all dimensions practicable in war. This would represent more than ten times the velocity to which gun-makers have attained, and, according to Colonel Maude, would enable users of this arm to throw thousands of shells in succession from London to Paris. The seriousness of this invention has been greatly discredited in a letter to the "Evening Standard," but Colonel Maude's argument is ingenious. He shows that in spite of the increased deadliness of weapons and projectiles, war tends to be less dangerous. At Marston Moor a man's life was only worth four hours' purchase. The life of a British soldier at Waterloo worked out at three days of eight hours each. At Mars la Tour in the Franco-German war, in spite of the invention of breech-loaders and rifled artillery, the soldier could count on a life chance of four days of twelve hours, and in the two chief Russo-Japanese battles of not less than a fortnight. This change is due to the fact that the more dangerous the weapon the greater is the reluctance of soldiers to expose themselves to it. On the other hand, argues Colonel Maude, an immense and revolutionary change would be brought about by weapons inflicting little loss of life but immense material damage. This would tend to make war so costly as to be prohibitive. What with airships and Simpson guns it certainly seems as if we were speculating somewhat rashly in "Dreadnoughts."

* * *

The University Boat Race has been marred by a rather sinister incident. This was the secret trial of the Oxford crew over the full course. Hitherto, with one exception, all trials have been open. The departure from this healthy practice was sanctioned by the Oxford coach, and ingenious precautions were taken to deceive the public. Another, and it seems to us detestable, innovation has been the action of one of the coaches and of both the strokes in writing articles on the race for popular newspapers. We hope that both these practices will be vetoed, even though they may have issued from sheer thoughtlessness. We all know why secret trials are resorted to in horse-racing. They are used to preserve and promote the gambling interests of owners, or a small inner circle of operators, and they can obviously be worked against the ignorant outsiders. But the interest of the Boat Race is not a gambling interest, but one of pure emulation. If that be destroyed, and this specially interesting and innocent form of amateur sport is corrupted or vulgarised, it had better cease.

* * *

News of a naval disaster in the English Channel, attended by great loss to life, comes to hand as we go to press. During an exercising cruise the destroyer "Tiger" ran across the bows of the cruiser "Berwick," and was cut in two by the force of the impact. So sudden was the collision that most of the crew were thrown into the water. Twenty-one men were picked up by boats, but it is feared that the remaining thirty-five have been drowned. One of the men rescued was so exhausted that he succumbed on the way ashore.

Politics and Affairs.

THE INEVITABILITY OF HOME RULE.

It is characteristic of our politics that within a few hours of declaring that Home Rule was impossible, the leader of the Opposition should be assenting to a plan of Home Rule in higher Irish education, and admitting that Mr. Birrell, a Home Rule Secretary, had succeeded where he, a Unionist, had failed. This only illustrates the fact that, call the principle of self-government by what name you please—Home Rule, the management of Ireland according to Irish ideas, the delegation of powers, the extension of local government—it advances, often without the conscious co-operation of the two British parties, and even in face of their ill-will. In order to realise this very simple truth, it is only necessary to compare the governmental machine in Ireland to-day with what it was in 1886. The Home Ruler of the twentieth century need no longer concern himself with the buying out of the "English garrison," which was the second care of his predecessor twenty-two years ago. He will not trouble himself over the University question, and the fear of the submerging of Trinity College passes away. He will find half the problem of local government settled for him. He will not have to reckon with a solid and irrationally hostile Ulster. The fury of the land war has died down; no extreme violence or inhumanity of temper exists among the peasantry to revive the passionate dislike and fear which crippled the early Home Rule propaganda. Every anti-Irish argument which was used in the debate of last Monday was, therefore, a reduced version of the original Unionist case. Mr. Balfour could still speak of the difficulties of settling the Irish representation in the Imperial Parliament, or of fixing the financial relationship. But he knows that his own Government came, at one time, rather near to creating a separate Irish Exchequer. Lord Percy could represent the Irish bodies which his friends created as unfair to Irish Unionists. But he could adduce no serious signs of unfitness for local government. Indeed, the whole groundwork of Unionism, which is that Providence first created a race temperamentally unfit to govern themselves and then tempered the wind to the shorn lamb by providing a neighbouring nation to do the work, is undermined by the experience of the last few years. There is no sign of incapacity. There is no evidence of abiding savagery or even of unfairness in the Irish people. The sting of Lord Percy's charge disappears when we remember that it is the refusal of self-government which compels Mr. Redmond to keep the Irish local bodies intact as strongholds of nationalism, and that the fusion must begin as soon as the nation as a whole is liberated to do its administrative work. Such a fusion has already set in, and gone further than careless observers suppose. The Gaelic revival, the growth of scientific agriculture, the Sinn Fein agitation, have all brought new forces into play. Nearly every one of them has attracted recruits from the landlords' camp. How much of the anti-national force will survive the growing conviction that one day—sooner or later—this country will leave Ireland to work out her own salvation, subject to the general superintendence by the Imperial Power? How much of a similar spirit and organisation in South Africa has survived the grant of a free constitution under which the cult of "loyalism," i.e., of a specially favoured minority of office-holders and expectants of office and favours, does not pay?

In Ireland, therefore, we may conclude that all is fluid, and that all the changes are tending in the direction of Home Rule. Are we sure that here things are not changing with equal rapidity? Mr. Balfour may not change, but what of the temper and policy of his party? Within twenty-four hours of the passing of the Home Rule resolution on Monday, the "Morning Post" was hinting at an accommodation between Unionists and Nationalists, under which Ireland might have the advantage of maintaining a Protectionist tariff specially adapted to her needs. We are apt to forget the not unimportant constitutional fact that, while British parties go up and down, the balance of the Irish representation remains unaffected. This generation is unlikely to see another British Government resting on a majority of 200 votes. On the contrary, every statesman who looks before and after realises that we may at any time be brought back to the capital year, 1885, when the Irishmen held the balance of power. We hope that in such a contingency the party best able to make a bid for power will not be the Protectionists. But we are quite certain that if they approach any such position, the musty formulæ of Unionism, revived without an ounce of conviction in Monday's debate, will not stop them from grasping it. What of the Liberals? What deters them from taking up Home Rule again? Not the new recruit to politics, the Labour Party, which is Home Rule to a man. Nothing in Mr. Asquith's declarations, which even if they are less warm in tone than those of the Prime Minister, represent, with all deference to Mr. Healy, no retractation or diminution of the Liberal obligations to the Home Rule cause. Not the insignificant new Unionist Rump of a score members, which the concentration on Free Trade has brought into brief existence. And not the necessity of defending Free Trade, whose maintenance may very well depend precisely on an Irish decision between Home Rule and a Protectionist offer of a separate or a specially favourable Irish tariff.

These, however, are matters of tactics, and we do not wish to rest the Irish case purely on tactical grounds. The grounds are moral, and depend on how long British democracy, while using to the full in its service the richly varied capacities and charms of the Irish people—their quick and sympathetic intellects, their adaptive talents for war, government, commerce, the arts—is going to rule them in their own country, through a selfish clique without brains or imagination, instead of frankly surrendering the task into their hands. It is impossible to conceive any end to this process other than a form of Home Rule. No good that we do to Ireland helps her or us in our actual relationships. We are slowly abandoning coercion, because, as a matter of fact, the Irish community is becoming homogeneous, and the internal warfare increasingly petty and innocuous. We are at last going to give the country a series of self-governing Universities, a generation or two after they were due. If, in face of such concessions, we maintain the Union as it stands to-day, we are simply sharpening the sword for our own flanks. And we are doing an essentially unjust and short-sighted thing. We admit the moral power of the Irish case, when we, a nation of forty millions, refuse, in uncritical fear, self-government to a nation of four millions. Injustice makes the strongest man fear the weakest. And we are acting without reason, for, while the poverty and discontent of the Irish under Unionism subsist, unaffected by our remedies, our money, our talk, all their talents and aptitudes for government remain also as witnesses and accusers of our fault. It is a chief asset of Liberalism that it retains and advances the only cure for Irish troubles, and holds itself ready at any convenient hour to propound it afresh. It is fortunate indeed that last Monday's debate left the Liberal Party a Home Rule Party. For when it ceases to merit that title, it will cease to be a party at all.

AN OLIVE BRANCH.

Those who affect to disbelieve in the efficacy of moral forces in public life may do well to reflect on the political events of the past fortnight. They will, it is true, see these forces routed in a direct frontal attack in a single election; but if they look closer they will find an indirect effect of a strong assertion of social principles working itself out in altogether unforeseen ways. The action of the Archbishop and the majority of his colleagues on behalf of the Licensing Bill could not win the Peckham election, but it has effected a marvellous clearing of the air in another quarter. It has deeply, and we trust permanently, affected the relations of Church and Nonconformity in the matter of education. It is only on a surface view that this result will seem illogical. The truth is that the firmness of the Archbishop brought the world back to some sense of proportion. It made people realise anew that in the main the social struggle is one struggle—the struggle against the forces of material self-interest, that in this struggle the leaders of the Established Church and the leaders of the Free Churches stand side by side, and that the differences which part them are far smaller than the ties of agreement which unite them. The result was to secure an atmosphere for the reception of the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill such as has never existed since 1902, and which, whatever the fate of the Bill, will, we hope, become a permanent, as it is a healthy, condition of our political life. Had Mr. Birrell's Bill found such an atmosphere awaiting it, it would long since have passed into law.

We do not say that this atmosphere is all-pervasive. There are certain interests which the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill would not satisfy, and it is natural that these should make their voices heard. There are also certain less legitimate interests to which peace is unacceptable merely because it is peace and would greatly smooth the path of the Government. The two great Bills now before Parliament form the main stones of stumbling which all men have foreseen in the path of the party in power, and it is political human nature that the party in opposition should desire to keep them in being. If the education question is settled by agreement a great difficulty in the way of the Government will be overcome, and it is to the party interest of Unionism that the question should be kept alive. Mr. Balfour, as the most adroit of tacticians, may be trusted thoroughly to appreciate this side of the position. We know the extent of his influence with the House of Lords, and we regret to see a hint of an opposition based on considerations of this kind in the speech of Lord Lansdowne. But we do not believe that such a purely factious opposition would succeed. If a basis of agreement can once be found the Bill embodying it would go of itself, and the opposition of the Lords would be swept aside. The question is: Is compromise possible? Hitherto every attempt has failed. Is it possible, in a more favourable state of opinion, for any new proposal to succeed?

Let us try to locate the points of difficulty, with a view not to emphasising them, but to seeing how they may be overcome. Broadly speaking, the Bishop's Bill provides a possible line of working agreement as between the bulk of Moderate Churchmen and the Nonconformists. On the one hand, it establishes public control, and recognises the religious freedom of the teachers; on the other, it gives facilities for denominational instruction at the cost of the denominations where the parents desire it. The one real crux involved here is the position of the teacher. Professedly he will remain free. Will it be possible to secure him real freedom to decline to give religious instruction, or will his appointment in practice be made dependent on his consent? If adequate guarantees can be given on this point, the teacher will stand to gain rather than to lose from the Bishop's Bill. If not, he may lose the position which he now enjoys in the provided schools. The first problem, therefore, is to consider the methods and conditions of appointment, and to come to an agreement on some provision which will secure to the teacher in law the position which we believe that both sides alike desire to give him.

There remains the much more real difficulty of the Catholic schools, Anglican or Roman. We cannot simply put these schools aside as a small minority. If we are to have a settlement by consent, it must be an all-round settlement; and the question is whether any settlement is possible which would concede so strong a claim as that which the Catholics make upon the State. We fear it must be frankly recognised that this can only be done by allowing of an exception within the general State system, and this brings us back at once to something like the regrettable expedient of contracting out. But, in the first place, contracting out on this basis would be a very much smaller affair than is contemplated in Mr. McKenna's Bill as it at present stands. It would not only be confined to the urban areas, but to certain non-provided schools in which a large majority of the parents of scholars should desire it. If we may trust the Bishop of Birmingham, there is not one parent in fifty who will take the trouble to demand any special form of religious instruction in addition to that offered by the public authority. Nevertheless, the suggestion of leaving even a small minority of schools to muddle along inefficiently without rate aid is very rightly distasteful, and we think that experts might well give their minds to considering whether the Catholic proposal for the earmarking of a portion of the education rate is, after all, unworkable. If this proposal were accepted it would, to begin with, come into force only where a large majority of parents of children in a non-provided school ask for special treatment, and the school would be placed on this basis only if the fund ear-marked for the purpose should be sufficient, together with private contributions, to maintain it in a manner satisfactory to the Board of Education. Under these conditions the exceptions would not be numerous, but they would meet the Catholic claim, and to meet it is worth some cost in point of cumbrousness of machinery. The alternative is contracting out pure and simple. There has not yet been devised by the wit of man any simple and uniform system which will meet all the complicated and inconsistent demands of the rival parties in the educational world. The problem now is to find the lines on which the new spirit that has arisen may work itself out into practical proposals without encountering some insuperable obstacle.

THE NEW HOPE FOR MACEDONIA.

Macedonia has once again become the centre of European interest. Last autumn that unfortunate land seemed to be settling down into a condition of enduring anarchy and decay. The so-called scheme of European Reforms had been everywhere checked and blighted. The native Christian populations were fleeing to America, or being decimated by rival bands of Nationalist propagandism from Greece, Servia, or Bulgaria. The European gendarmerie officers, impotent for amelioration, were watching this chaos with a deepening disgust. The Turk was rejoicing over the checkmating of all European attempts to ensure the good government which had been solemnly guaranteed by the Treaty of Berlin. The "interested Powers" were content to allow the whole affair to fester into corruption and decline. Austria was secretly working for the extension of the Bosnian railway system into European Turkey. Russia was wrestling with her own internal revolution. Of the others, Germany, closely allied with the Sultan and posing as the protector and friend of Turkish interests, was dominating the situation at Constantinople. The inaction of England under a Liberal Government was the subject of free comment; a comment of perplexity and despair amongst the Eastern nationalities and in the disturbed districts that had been led by Lord Lansdowne's action to hope for eventual reform; a comment of satisfaction by all those who desired the perpetuation of the present confusion and who hoped, by judicious fishing in these troubled waters, to gather in some substantial gain.

Suddenly, however, and most fortunately, Sir Edward Grey proclaimed to Europe that British patience, long enduring, had at last become exhausted; that England intended to demand an active pursuit of the policy which was the alternative to the San Stefano Treaty, accepted solemnly by all the signatory Powers of the Treaty of Berlin. The tearing up of the provisions which constructed a greater Bulgaria out of Macedonia involved, in the thirty-third article of that Treaty, the acceptance of a European responsibility for security to life and property of those Christian people who had been placed again under the Turkish rule. On December 18th last the British Government communicated to the five other great Powers which make up "the Concert of Europe" an exceedingly mild programme of reform. Recognising the deplorable condition of that unfortunate country, with murder and assassination unchecked, and a practically permanent condition of civil war, Sir Edward Grey suggested immediate action in "adopting such effective measures as may be calculated to avert a crisis which, in default of such action, cannot fail to arise." Protesting against "the gradual extermination of the Christian inhabitants of Macedonia," where the Ottoman authorities "have displayed an utter incapacity to maintain public tranquillity," the British Foreign Minister suggested a fresh remedy, in the entrusting of a full measure of executive control to the foreign staff officers in Macedonia, with the substantial increase in numbers of the gendarmerie and an "adequate equipment" for the establishment of mobile columns designed to hunt down and to destroy the bands which are a curse to the countryside. Each of the five Governments replied, in answers that are printed in the White Paper issued this week; each rejected the British proposals. Austria and Russia, in a joint reply, announced that the time was inopportune. The condition of the officers in such circumstance would be "very unsatisfactory," and the proposal "would undoubtedly meet with a categorical refusal from the Sublime Porte." The Italian Government rejected the scheme mainly, it would appear, because it had been informed that the Russian, German, and Austro-Hungarian Governments had already rejected it, though it urged also the inefficiency of the gendarmerie as at present organised for such work, and that the preliminary step of first ensuring this efficiency should be pressed upon the Sultan. The French also, as it seems, somewhat regretfully considered the proposals difficult, while other reforms—such as the judicial scheme—remain unfulfilled. And Germany—the evil genius of the Balkan imbroglio—in curt phrases—assured us that the proposal was "impracticable."

In reply to these variable counsels of timidity and scarcely concealed private interests, Sir Edward Grey addressed to the Powers of Europe, on March 3rd, an appeal which may be destined to occupy a position of historic importance. After declaring the "regret" and "disappointment" with which the British Government received the rejection of its scheme and the failure of any alternative suggestion, and some elaborate guard against the somewhat flimsy objections which had been advanced in its defence, the British Foreign Minister, in words of dignified and grave determination, invited the component Powers of the Concert of Europe to confront the essential facts of a situation full of danger. The present position of the three vilayets, Sir Edward Grey again declares, "is so serious as to call for immediate and effective action." "It is certain that serious consequences may ensue from a continuance of the present state of disorder and violence in the vilayets, especially if it is believed that the European Concert is unable or unwilling to find a remedy." And the result of the rejection of the milder suggestion is the challenge of an effectual remedy for a situation which "cannot be remedied by half measures." That challenge is offered in the scheme outlined by Sir Edward Grey in the Macedonian debate of March 3rd to the House of Commons. It revives the old proposal of Lord Lansdowne of four years ago, of an independent Governor given "a free hand and irremovable for a term of years, except with the consent of the Powers, with an adequate force of gendarmerie placed at his disposal for the restoration of public order." "His pension should be guaranteed by the Powers, and provision made for it in the Macedonian Budget." The Turkish troops—a crushing burden to Macedonia—would be largely reduced, and in return, while this system lasts, the integrity of Macedonia as a portion of the Sultan's dominions would be guaranteed by the Powers. Sir Edward Grey at the same time offered favourably to consider any alternative proposal which might be put forward by the Powers. All he demanded was some action, instead of this fatal and paralysing silence and impotence which was rendering the Concert the laughing-stock of the world. "If the Powers are not prepared to assume this attitude," he concluded, in solemn warning, "they will, in effect, declare that they are powerless to secure anything, and that the Concert, as an instrument for securing reform, has ceased to exist."

This demonstration of the prolonged and serious character of British concern in the welfare of Macedonia has fallen like a bombshell upon the divided counsels of the European nations. While Austria, in the person of Baron von Aehrenthal, is making separate treaties with the Porte for railway concessions, and Germany, in the person of Prince von Bülow, is proclaiming friendship and admiration for the Sultan, the British Government, roughly and somewhat indelicately, reminds that slow-moving and clumsy combination of the very object of its existence—the welfare of the subject Christian populations of the Near East, and, through the provision of that welfare, the avoidance of the perpetual menace of insurrection or actual warfare in the Balkans. In England over a hundred members of Parliament have signed a letter expressing satisfaction at the renewed action of the British Government. There is no official news as yet as to its reception. Unofficially, however, there comes the information that Austro-Hungary have rejected it. There are certainly elaborate discussions on this subject in the descent of Prince Bülow on Vienna and the calling into consultation of the third member of the "Triplice." Unofficially, also, there appears the outline of counter proposals which Russia, now somewhat tardily, offers for the consideration of the Concert. These counter proposals recognise the collapse of the Mürzsteg programme and the substitution of the action of the whole Concert for the action of the Mandatory Powers; and, in so far as they thus represent an advance towards reality, they may be welcomed. Otherwise they would seem to be totally inadequate to the actual situation. The Inspector-General is to be guaranteed security of tenure as long as the 3 per cent. increase of Customs is sanctioned. But Hilmi Pasha (the present Inspector-General) is not hampered by lack of "security of tenure." His effort, in recent times, has always been to get away from an impossible situation. The difficulty has been not to prevent him going, but to persuade him to stay. The Financial Commission, with the full status now possessed by the civil agents of Austria and Russia, are to be endowed with some vague and rather uncertain powers of justice and public safety under a gendarmerie, with which is to be incorporated the local village guards. If this implies full executive control to the representatives of the European Powers, it might be accepted as satisfactory. But that can only be judged when the full and definite proposals are established. If it were linked up with Sir Edward Grey's proposal of an independent Governor, it might prove adequate to the situation. Anything less than full executive control would be utterly useless. It is interesting to find the "Novoye Vremya" condemning this vaguely outlined scheme, and warmly supporting the British suggestion. It concludes that "Russia will ultimately be obliged to adhere to the British proposals, which alone can bring a beneficial change to the Macedonian population." There are suggestions, on the other hand, that in face of a non possumus from the two Germanic Powers, the three Western nations which have hitherto acted together in this matter with Russia in agreement, will go forward to press the policy of reform upon the Sultan. The situation has become at once extraordinarily critical and extraordinarily interesting. The Grey policy holds the field. By its advance this country has regained the confidence and gratitude of the Balkan nations, which we were in danger of losing from our long inaction, and assumed its rightful position of responsibility for a burden deliberately accepted thirty years ago.

THE VICTORY OF FREE TRADE FINANCE.

From the large, almost the magnificent, surplus which has accrued to the Exchequer at the close of the financial year, it is quite clear that, if the policy of military and naval retrenchment promised to the country at the last General Election by the leading Ministers and by the great majority of the Liberal Party—a policy persistently advocated in these columns—had been fully carried out, Mr. Asquith would have been able this year to present a Budget so brilliant as to revive the memories of the great Gladstonian achievements, restore the popularity of the Government, and earn the admiring gratitude of the whole nation. This, we say, is quite clear; for even without vitally challenging the policy of overblown establishments, by merely modifying the extravagances of the War Office and Admiralty, Mr. Asquith can claim to have restored the financial equilibrium. Nay, more, at a time when the trade of the world is declining, and our three greatest rival Powers—the United States, Germany, and France—are embarrassed by heavy and menacing deficits, our Chancellor can boast not only of large reductions effected by an operative sinking fund, but of a substantial realised surplus at the close of this financial year. Mr. Asquith has himself admitted that the reductions so far effected are insufficient. The total of unproductive expenditure is still at a war level; it presses heavily upon the poorer taxpayers, and requires the maintenance of war imposts (like the sugar tax), a grievous cause of unemployment.

But for the moment we are well entitled to look at the cheerful side, and draw encouragement which should be a stimulus to fresh efforts for economy on the war services. Mr. Harcourt, who inherits a love of sound finance, put the case for the Government in a fair and friendly way at Reading the other day. Our naval expenditure, he said, including votes and loans, was 35½ millions in 1905; to-day it is under 32 millions; and if we add to that a decrease on the Army Estimates of 4½ millions, it makes the total decrease of warlike expenditure of £8,500,000 in little more than two years. But the comparison of a single year does not always give the full effect of these operations, and Mr. Harcourt was justified in comparing the total naval and military expenditure of the last two years of the Tory and the first two years of the Liberal Government. In the former case the expenditure amounted to 149 millions, in the latter to 133½ millions, which means a saving of 15½ millions in two years. It is very probable that every penny of these 15½ millions would have been spent and added to the National Debt by Mr. Balfour's Government. The debt, therefore, would have been 15 millions larger, and that would have involved a permanent charge for interest of between £400,000 and £500,000, of which the taxpayer has now been relieved. Altogether Mr. Asquith has swept away over a million of interest on the debt as a result of his Sinking Fund operations, and has done far more in this direction than any of his predecessors in the same space of time. This is no small achievement. Its effect has been felt in the Money Market, and has materially helped us to come with flying colours through the international crisis that followed on the American panic.

But, of course, a saving of fifteen millions in two years does not represent the whole advantage gained by the country. Mr. Balfour, as leader of the Opposition, has lost no opportunity of urging additions to warlike expenditure. He has even declaimed against the abandonment of borrowing for military and naval works, and he has instructed or allowed his colleagues to plead for a naval programme which must soon add from five to ten millions to the Navy Estimates. But Mr. Balfour's advocacy of lax profusion in warlike expenditure is now accompanied by a declaration that the basis of taxation must be "broadened" in order to provide an adequate revenue. This is the sum and substance of his speech on Mr. Mond's resolution and this new policy ought to be vigilantly watched and criticised. We do not accuse Mr. Balfour of deliberately inciting his opponents to military extravagance so as to throw the income-taxpayers into the arms of the Tariff Reformers. This would be a subtler stroke than Mr. Balfour's milder Machiavellianism would approve. But though the member for the City of London may be excused of anything worse than looseness of mind and a cheerful willingness to oblige any friendly faction at the public expense, it is clear that another motive actuates some of his followers—or shall we say his leaders? They are not, as a rule, very well informed about economic conditions in other countries. But they are dimly conscious that in Germany and France and the United States militarism fosters Protection; not because a heavily burdened nation suffers less under Protection than under Free Trade—it suffers far more—but because its Government can win over powerful sections of capitalists to endorse costly programmes by promising them that the new taxation shall be divided between favoured interests and the exchequer. If, for example, a tax yielding five millions be imposed on imported corn, the agricultural landlords are naturally enthusiastic; for, as two-thirds of our corn is imported, they will pocket ten or twelve millions. Thus out of a tax of seventeen millions paid by all who eat bread, five go into the Exchequer and twelve into the pockets of a small class. To the Tariff Reform League this seems an admirable way of raising money. Indeed, the one argument for it is the political one that it enlists for any given tax the enthusiastic support of a rich class which can well afford to contribute heavily to the preliminary work of "education." But any thoughtful student of public finance will see that this policy of "broadening the basis" and giving "a little Protection all round"—which is what Mr. Balfour means—would very soon prove fatal to the public revenue. It might take a year or two for its consequences to develop. But the futility of a pile of little taxes, such as our tariff contained before the 'forties, would speedily appear. The best and the worst that could be said for this policy, as Mr. Churchill put it in his masterly speech at Manchester, is that it would greatly increase the taxation of the poor in order to diminish slightly the burdens of the rich.

We see to-day, in the contrast between Great Britain and Germany or the United States, how the interaction of tariffs and revenue works out. Our actual expenditure in money on the Army and Navy in proportion to population is much greater than that of Germany, and vastly greater than that of the United States. Yet these two nations are so burdened by Protective tariffs that the monetary crisis has plunged them into the utmost embarrassment. New York and all the great towns of the United States are swarming with unemployed. At least forty thousand men are workless in Berlin; 185,000 is the calculation by Protectionist papers of the number in New York. Serious rioting has occurred in both countries. In the United States the falling off of the customs under tariff influences is so serious that a deficit is inevitable, and borrowing must ensue. Still more critical is the case of the German Empire. Instead of a five million surplus, Germany is faced with a six million deficit on its ordinary expenditure, and a further deficit of ten millions on what is called its extraordinary expenditure. While Mr. Asquith cancels fifteen millions of debt, the Finance Minister of the German Empire has to borrow sixteen millions sterling in order to balance his annual accounts.

If we turn from general considerations to the figures themselves, we find that the only item on which there was a serious decrease of revenue for the year was customs, though excise only showed a very trifling gain. Mr. Asquith's great successes were the death duties and the income tax. The former has fully justified last year's graduation, and in the latter Mr. Asquith has actually obtained £780,000 more than last year, though he allowed for a loss of £1,100,000. He has given a relief of threepence in the pound to people with earned incomes of from £700 to £2,000; but he has so improved the machinery of collection that this handsome concession to honesty has been more than made up by those who had hitherto sent in dishonest returns. Mr. Asquith's income-tax experiment has, therefore, proved wholly successful; and the success is not only of good augury for next year's Budget, but also a conclusive vindication of the superiority of direct over indirect taxation, a victory both for Free Trade and for progressive finance at a moment when an ill-informed statesman, in shifts for a party and a majority, is threatening both.

Life and Letters.

A CHILD.

In Kensington Gardens, that February day, it was very still. Trees, stripped of every leaf, raised their bare, clean twigs towards a sky so grey and so unstirring that there might never have been wind, or sun. And on those branches pigeons sat, silent, as though they understood that there was no new life as yet; they seemed waiting, loth to spread their wings, lest they should miss the coming of the spring.

Down in the grass the tiniest green flames were burning—a sign of the fire of flowers that would leap up if the sun would feed them.

And on a seat there sat a child.

He sat between his father and his mother, looking straight before him. It was plain that the reason why he looked so straight before him was that he really had not strength to care to look to right or left—so white his face was, so puny were his limbs. His clothes had evidently been designed for others, and this was fortunate, for they prevented the actual size of him from being seen. He was not, however, what is called neglected. His face was clean, and the utmost of protection that God and the condition of his parents had vouchsafed was evidently lavished on him, for round his neck there was a little bit of draggled fur which should have been round the neck of her against whose thin and shabby side he leaned. This mother of his was looking at the ground, and, from the expression of her face, she seemed to think that looking at the ground was all life had to offer.

The father sat with his eyes shut. He had shabby clothes, a grey face, and a grey collar that had once been white. Above the collar his thin cheeks had evidently just been shaved, for it was Saturday, and, by the colour of those cheeks, and by his boots, whose soles, hardly thicker than a paper sheet, still intervened between him and the ground, he was seen not to be a tramp or outdoor person, but an indoor worker of some sort, and very likely out of work, who had come out to rest in the company of his wife and family. His eyes being shut, he sat without the pain of looking at a single thing, moving his jaw at intervals from side to side, as though he had a toothache.

And between this man who had begotten, and this woman who had borne him, the child sat, very still, evidently on good terms with them, not realising that they had brought him out of a warm darkness where he had been happy, out of a sweet nothingness, into which, and soon, perhaps, he would pass again—not realising that they had so neglected to keep pace with things, or that things had so omitted to keep pace with them, that he himself had eaten in his time about one-half the food he should have eaten, and that of the wrong sort. By the expression of his face, that pale, small ghost had evidently grasped the truth that things were as they had to be. He seemed to sit there reviewing his own life, taking for granted that it must be what it was, from hour to hour, and day to day, and year to year.

And before me, too, the incidents of his small journey passed. I saw him, in the morning, getting off the family bed, where it was sometimes warm, and chewing at a crust of bread before he set off to school in company with other children, some of whom were stouter than himself—saw him carrying in his small fist the remnants of his feast, and dropping it, or swopping it away for peppermints, because it tired him to consume it, having no juices to speak of in his little stomach. I seemed to understand that, accustomed as he was to eating little, he almost always wanted to eat less, not because he had any wish to die—nothing so extravagant—but simply that he nearly always felt a little sick. I felt that his pale, despondent mother was always urging him to eat, when there were things to eat, and that this bored him, since they did not strike him as worth all that trouble with his jaws. She must have had a "job" indeed to persuade him that there was any point in eating; for, from his looks, he could manifestly not now enjoy anything but peppermints and kippered herrings. I seemed to see him in his school, not learning, not wanting to learn, anything, nor knowing why this should be so, ignorant of the dispensations of a Providence who, after hesitating long to educate him lest this should make his parents paupers, now compelled his education, having first destroyed his stomach, that he might be incapable of taking in what he was taught. That small, white creature could not, as yet, have grasped the notion that the welfare of the future lay, not with the future, but with the past. He only knew that every day he went to school with little in his stomach, and every day came back from school with less.

All this he seemed to be reviewing as he sat there, but not in thought; his knowledge was too deep for thoughts; he was simply feeling—as a child that looked as he looked would naturally be feeling—on that bench between his parents. He opened his little mouth at times, as a small bird will open its small beak, without apparent purpose, and his lips seemed murmuring: —

"My stomach feels as if there were a mouse inside it; my legs are aching; it's all quite natural, no doubt!"

To reconcile this apathy of his with recollections of his unresting, mirthless energy down alleys and on doorsteps, it was needful to remember human nature, and its exhaustless cruse of courage. For, though he might not care to live, yet, while he was alive, he would keep his end up, because he must—there was no other way. And why exhaust himself in vain regrets and dreams of things he could not see, and hopes of being what he could not be? That he had no resentment against anything was certain from his patient eyes—not even against those two who sat, one on either side of him—unaware that he was what he was, in order that they, who, against his will, had brought him into being, might be forced by law to keep a self-respect they did not want, and have the unsought pride of giving him an insufficiency of things he could not eat; for he had as yet no knowledge of political economy. He evidently did not view his case in any petty, or in any party, spirit; he did not seem to look on himself as just a half-starved child that should have cried its eyes out till it was fed at least as well as the dogs that passed him; he seemed to look on himself as that impersonal, imperial thing—the Future of the Race.

So profound his apathy!

And, as I looked, the "Future of the Race" turned to his father.

"'Ark at that b——y bird!" he said.

It was a pigeon, who, high upon a tree, had suddenly begun to croon. One could see his head outlined against the grey, unstirring sky, first bending back, then down into his breast, then back again; and that soft song of his filled all the air like an invocation of fertility.

"The Future of the Race" watched him for a minute without moving, and suddenly he laughed. That laugh was a little hard noise like the clapping of two boards—there was not a single drop of blood in it, nor the faintest sound of music. So might a marionette have laughed—a figure made of wood and wire.

And in that laugh I seemed to hear innumerable laughter; the laughter in a million homes of the myriad unfed.

So laughed the Future of the richest and the freest and the proudest race that had ever lived on earth, that February afternoon, with the little green flames lighted in the grass, under a sky that knew not wind or sun—so he laughed at the pigeon that was calling for the spring.

John Galsworthy.

THE DEAD MARCH.

The Volunteer was forty-five years old when he passed away last Tuesday as the clock struck midnight. Only forty-five, he was, by regulation, and his father's name was Fencible. It seemed impossible that all we knew of him could have been crowded into those few years—less than two generations, not time enough to allow him to win his long-service medal twice over. Yet we could have wished him no fitter demise. Cut off in his prime, he fell with harness on his back. At his obsequies drums were heard, and funeral notes; many soldiers discharged their farewell shots, nor did an enemy, with sullen firing, disturb the sad festivity of the scene. In conformity with his career, his end was martial peace.

That "Last Post," how sad and sweet it is, whether it sounds over lonely graves soon to be indistinguishable, or warns the canteen of bedtime! "Good-night, good-night!" it cries. "Sleep well in the grave—sleep!" Or else, like the blue-water school when the fleet is at three-Power standard, it says, "Sleep well in your beds." To the Volunteer last Tuesday night it said both, and, after the burial of his name, the man went home to slumber. We would not speak without respect of anything that is past. One remembers those verses in the "Daily Chronicle" that first drew attention to Mr. Edgar Wallace's art ten years ago. The thing was called "Ginger James," and it told how an insignificant and rather worthless private suddenly came to be honoured by all the regiment. His comrades saluted him, the colonel took off his hat, the guard stood at the Present, he rode in a carriage, and his travelling rug was the Union Jack, when he drove away to a rather slow selection from a piece that is known as "Saul." And all this for nothing he had done. So with the Volunteer. He was alive, and is dead. The War Office made him; let him pass for a soldier.

He has been dead and buried only these four nights, but already we begin to think of him with regretful tenderness, and fond memory brings the light of other days around him. We see him as he first appeared, in hard, high cap, with flat, projecting peak, and a little ball or plume of cock-feathers at the top. That was the time when his officers wore long pointed whiskers that waved over their shoulder-straps in the breeze, and his youthful courage was maintained by assurances that he would be sent out of England only in case of invasion. It was the time of Ritualistic movements, when the defaulting Volunteer pledged himself to come to drill in Lent. It was then that he got his rifle mixed up in the wheels of his omnibus, and could not imagine where to hide the unsightly ribbon of wood and iron that came out. Then that, mistaking the wooden Highlander in front of a tobacconist shop for one of the London Scottish, he called him "poshtively a dishgrache to the serviche." Then that, being discovered by his adjutant asleep among the furze-bushes on Wimbledon Common while a field-day was raging, he explained that he had been a Volunteer quite recently, but had just resigned "owing to tempry indishposition."

"Punch" was then his record, his chronicle, and service-sheet. "Dress up, indeed!" he retorted to his sergeant-major. "Confound you, I'm better dressed than you are!" And once he had to display obedience to the direction, "Has you were! 'Alt! Mark time! The 'ole will bear in mind that my word of command is merely a Caution." Or he imbibed the instruction, "When I says Fix, mind you baint to fix, but when I says Baynets, whip 'em out smart." The brave days of Wimbledon faded away like youth, but still something of the old spirit remained, and it was in actual camp at Aldershot that the Volunteer put the guard-tent prisoner on sentry-go while he went for a walk with his girl. It was at Aldershot that he fired at a rook with a round stone and a blank cartridge, and both he and the rook survived.

We owe a great deal to one who added so much to the gaiety of the nation, nor will we lightly talk of the spirit that is gone. Looking at him as he lived, we have often marvelled at his humility and devotion. The thing may not have been particularly well done; the wonder was it should be done at all. Some, as we know, attributed the Volunteer's zeal to a form of snobbery—to a delight in fine clothes and sounding titles—to a sense of rank and command—to a passion for mess-tent revelry. There was, perhaps, no great harm in liking to be decently dressed once a month, or even once a week, but people who said these things never knew the Volunteer from inside. They never knew the Regular's scorn, the Militiaman's contumely. They never knew what it was to be a Volunteer officer and see a private in the Foot Guards turn about and walk in the opposite direction rather than salute you, or to hear soldiers three discussing whether to salute, and deciding not. They never knew what it was to hold an advance party together for pitching camp in rain and wind, or to be summoned at daybreak to see that the fat on the raw sides of ration flesh was of a wholesome hue. They never knew the mess-tent revelry of sopping grass and puddled clay, of stinking stoves and lukewarm soup.

It could not have been snobbery that made the Volunteer. There was no social pride in being called a "mutton-slayer," or even a "Saturday soldier." There was no undue distinction in the glance that observed the silver buttons, nor in the sniff that went by. The cause remains something of a mystery; it was so easy not to be a Volunteer, yet so many were. Something savage, we suppose, was mingled in their blood—the touch that makes a box of soldiers so welcome to a boy, or that drives people to tour in gipsy-vans far from their desirable residences. Some natures also are born to obey; they enjoy the decisiveness of commands, the relief from hesitation, the comfort when only obedience is required. Others sought comradeship—the true and only society in a common cause. These may have been among the reasons why the Volunteer existed. The defence of the country has also been alleged.

But, whatever his reasons for existing may have been, there is no question as to the Volunteer's influence upon our physical and intellectual condition. The movement started at about 160,000 strong, and it put on about 100,000 more before it was done. It was something to have that considerable number of young men engaged in definite exercises week by week for all those years. It was more that their thoughts should be diverted from the backyard and street to wider interests and subjects attractive to military minds—the reform of the War Office, foreign relations, or the lessons they could draw from Napoleonic campaigns. One of the Volunteers, by nature himself Napoleonic, by destiny a banker's clerk, was lying out with his company upon an African hillside. Being under cover for the moment, he was asked what he thought of active service, and replied, "I think it has extended our horizons." A few minutes later the scope of his horizon was again extended, for he was dead.

That is, perhaps, the best thing to remember when we recall the episode of the Volunteers in our history. Of their military value it is impossible to judge, for it was never tested, and the hottest field-day is not in the least like war. Indeed, the only danger of the movement lay in accustoming men to think that war would not be very much different. But, allowing for all the seriousness of this danger, we may still say that for several hundreds of thousands the movement widened an horizon otherwise narrow, and when ridicule has said its worst, still that is something to boast of. To take the dear old Volunteer's place, we are now promised "Territorials," with County Associations, converted artillery, 168 battalions formed into 14 divisions, and one knows not what beside. But in burying our Volunteer, let us not think bitterly of the morrow. One of the characteristic things about the funeral is that we are not sure whether he is really dead, or whether, like the evening and the morning star, it is only his name that is changed.

THE UNDERCURRENT.

Under the rush and bustle of the day, by the gaiety and loneliness of night, the movements of its troubled depths are half concealed. But it is always there.

For just beneath the surface it flows on, like the under-rush of some vast river big in flood, which swirls and eddies and sweeps along below, but only at intervals reveals itself; so that its force and volume are not known or are misjudged by the little surface ripples which deceive. So, in the City of the Great Unrest, a mighty undercurrent seethes—beneath the onward rush of outward things.

To the heaving surge and hurry of the streets, where vast oblivious crowds pass to and fro, to shop for pleasure or necessity, or just to gaze at unaccustomed sights, or hurry through a little social round, it adds the deeper, fiercer restlessness of hidden things. While ordered millions work and rest and sleep in smooth routine of regulated lives, it boils with the passion, jealousy, and despair of those who live wilfully or blindly by desire. And underneath the carelessness and mirth of all who dine or sup or watch the play, in quiet respectability or guarded ease, it surges, swollen with realities of love and sin and avarice and want.

Silent, submerged, and turgid with intrigue, it seethes with the complexities of unbridled lives and the tossing destinies of those who do not live or know the life of home, but struggle fiercely through a swirl of plots and strife and robbery and fear.

The driftwood of its flood is mad humanity. Wild, lawless men who do not stop to think, except to manage women, raise a loan, or circumvent their pressing creditors. Men who still seek adventures of their youth, or because of their loneliness lead double lives. Suave, callous men, who smile and screw their eyes, while they listen to a woman's tearful prayers, or threats of hate from creatures in their power, or gauge the gullibility of those they engineer acquaintance with, to rob. And men with bloated faces and loose mouths, who talk the jargon of the betting ring, and bring the roguery of racing tricks, and a gambler's licence to guide their lives. And all the hirelings of vice and crime, who take their orders for shameful deeds in drinking bars, nor care for whom they spy or whom they trap, so long as they can earn the means to indulge.

Swelling the turbid stream of men's iniquities are women, loving and deceiving men; and many who obey from want or fear. Vain women, crazed with rivalry and pride, who smile with advertised integrity, and trade on the passions of enamoured men to pay their debts and help them flaunt abroad. Frail, dainty women, born to be caressed, who idolise some careless, bragging youth, or yield to a crafty blackmailer of town, because they fret or wither in their homes. Mad, reckless women, jealous for an age, who hang a leaden weight of fearing years, as tribute to their importunity, around the neck of tempted, threatened men. The strange, hard women, married or divorced, who never had or have forgotten youth, and always live in company with men, and help them in their schemes, and talk their talk, and act as a hostess, accomplice, or decoy, at men's enforced commands. And they who reach for better company, with youthful indifference to risk or wrong, drawn by the glamour of pleasures out of reach. And all the many Daughters of Despair, who loved an easy luxury too well, or wanted food—fierce, callous, cunning, passionate, and sad—who drift in the restless currents for a space, and sink and sink and finally go down—clutching and struggling and gasping as they go down.

With every ache and passion and desire wherewith these men and women are perturbed, the eddying undercurrent's drift is swelled; so that the busy, crowded outward life seems sinister with what is underneath. For the little flashes of its under-rush are everywhere.

In the more secluded places of the parks, men sit and fidget, frowning into space; and women, dressed to ruffle it in crowds, stare down an unfrequented path, sitting and watching and pretending not to look; and hired broughams stop at distant points just long enough to let a man step in; and couples pace the little-trodden grass, talking with earnestness which shows, but does not see. All keep a day-time tryst not safely possible elsewhere.

In the noisy reeking pack of drinking halls, sallow-faced evil men with cruel eyes mutter their angry warnings or commands into scared women's faces, blotched with tears; or, slouching in, make signs to seated friends, and point with little signals of their own the unconscious victim of their ripening plot; or ply with seeming jollity and drink a circled man to make him easier to rob. Girls with flushed cheeks and pouting, childish mouths, flounce round, in imitation finery and paste, from group to group; and, while they laugh and jest, and look around with the impudent self-consciousness of youth, you seem to see the horror of their end. And, silencing the clatter and the buzz, rise gasping, bitten oaths of fighting men, or women's choking cries, as suddenly with a sentence and a blow the smoulderings of a long vendetta burst; and men or women hit and tear or dodge. And in the lounges of the music-halls, heavy with scent and hot with burning lights, beneath the ordered crush of painted pain and the regulated boisterousness of drink, the undercurrent boils and rises up: in the murmured supplications of a youth, the corner conferences of scowling men, in avoided meetings, and quick whispered words, in altercations about wild happenings, or in an angry woman's mocking smile.

The rushing panorama of the streets teems with the little scenes which half disclose. Men stand as if to look into a shop, while they watch and track a couple or a man, with the furtive cunning of hired spies—moving with careful carelessness along the street. A cab draws up against a quiet kerb, and the woman leaning back inside sits still; and where it stops no light shows in the door, or, maybe, the house is empty or to let. A covered carriage passes quickly by, showing a flash of struggling within, and only the raising of the shuttered window breaks the cry. In all the little actions unexplained by the everyday routine of ordered lives, the undercurrent shows: in the hurry of a woman, late at night, who stops her cab a street away and walks, speeding around the corner to her home; in the fumblings with an unaccustomed key of the man who checks the impulse to look round to see who comes along the silent street; in late departures from unlighted doors, in strange companionships, and open tears, by secret signals, and in looks of hate, in the visits of rich people to mean streets, in the vigils and the scuffles of the night.

The mirth and brilliance of restaurants hide more than they disclose; save that the well-known plunderers of town, suave and well-dressed, dine sumptuously at their ease; and jewelled women, notorious for a list of ruined men, sup with some careless or unconscious youth, or with the man who helps them to spend their gains. These by their presence conjure up the depths. And the boredom and disdain of silent pairs, the cool intrusion of unwelcome men, and the secret passage of a scribbled note, ruffle the surface of gay merriment. And even in the intervals of plays, the hungry watching of a lonely man, a studied insult in the crowded lounge, or a woman's start and glances of surprise, tell of the deeper dramas of real life.

Thus, by an infinite variety of sudden glimpses it reveals itself. And the intricacies of its mysteries appal the mind; for only the little ripples are perceived. But still it winds and rushes and sweeps on in a tortuous, seething, hidden confluence of self-indulgence, want, intrigue, and crime. And with the foolish insolence of youth, the evil cunning of experience, and the frailty, the cruelty, the greed of those who battle strongly for a while, mingles the wreckage of those who sink. For in its troubled waters many drown.

THE SIMPLE LIFE.

The usual conception of the simple life is distant and rural. It comprises rose bowers but no green fly, apple alleys unvisited by the codlin moth, lawns wherein the plantain never appears. The blackbird flutes to us all day long and never turns his attention to the strawberries; rabbits skip amiably and never gnaw our choicest trees; the warm red walls whereon the peaches lie are unslimed by slug or snail; the garden patch bears every vegetable in its season and never a troublesome weed. Everything grows by itself. At any rate, the garden is a three-hundred and sixty-five day clock which we have only to wind once a year, and which will run with happy tick while we read our poetry, pay visits, and generally enjoy ourselves. For we have always heard that the greatest of all country delights is that of getting back home after a week or two spent in town.

Into this Eden of the imagination strides the well-informed writer and worker who calls himself "Home Counties," scattering thistle seeds and couch grass. At his nod, down come Kah-gah-gee and his black hordes to devour the fruit we had intended for dessert. Blight falls upon our garden, blistering every leaf. Wireworm takes it by the root, mildew in the bud, drought parches it, or unremitting rain turns it into a swamp. The book of verses must be flung down and we must work morning, noon, and night if we would save a mere tenth from destruction. Not only that, but, as it is not given to us to know what and when is the right thing to be done, we shall often be aiding the ruin rather than hindering it. All the books ever printed are useless. The worst of them (and the most attractive and best advertised) are works of imagination written by journalists. The best can only tell the novice how little he knows and how necessary it is for him to gain experience before he begins to run a farm of his own. He cannot learn from a neighbour without paying him a fee to come in and give periodic advice. The simple life of the country, evidently, has not yet produced the simple soul that makes a free gospel of the good things learned. The assumption that it has can only be based on the fallacy that Nature yields her secrets for the asking.

This book of "The Townsman's Farm"* contains, of course, a great deal of necesary truth. Too many men are ready to rush off to the land without properly counting the cost. Learning that a grain of wheat when planted will produce a thousand grains, they jump to the conclusion that agriculture must be very profitable; learning again that the "stupid" farmer is all out-of-date by comparison with the last word in laboratory science they think it quite an easy thing to take a short cut and get ahead of him. The very cheapness of farm eggs by comparison with the price at the stores, which ought to be a warning to them, becomes a promise of large profit. The optimist takes four hundred pounds out of Consols, where it has been yielding three per cent., invests it in a farm, and goes down to wait confidently for it to give him ten or twenty. He expects three hundred acres of grass land to make him a better living than the three or four square yards of City office-room by which he has hitherto done pretty well. But his City office has drawn tribute from the ends of the earth and, perhaps, actually from a hundred such farms as he is about to settle on.

The simple life, as most men imagine it, is far more easily attained in the town than in the country. We spent a week-end lately with one who asked us to "come and try our simple life on the hills." The simplicity of the life was mainly manifest in the fact that only two motor cars were kept at this summer residence, the staff of domestics only numbered six, and we did not dress for dinner. Needless to say, the establishment was not maintained from the difficult and hazardous operations of agriculture, but from one of those simple operations of industry that are carried on in the town. A man can make a living in town by devoting a third or so of the twenty-four hours to making heads for pins he is never to see sharpened, or by casting up daily a certain number of figures by the infallible and unchanging method of arithmetic. He gets tobacco from the Indies, oranges from Spain, apples from Tasmania, by the simple process of walking into a shop and giving in exchange a portion of his automatic wages. If Argentina fails him, India will not; if he doesn't like the French wines and is a hardy experimental kind of man, he can try Australia. We need not go to his shop-keeper, as the countryman must go to Dame Nature and make provision six months ahead for what he will require. There is no simplicity like this in the country.

All very true and trite? Then why does the townsman fear to go to the country lest he should become stupid like the countryman, and why does he flee back to his pin-making with the plea that the country was "so monotonous"? He must come to look upon his own life as too simple and monotonous, and to sigh for the endless variety and mental stimulation of a country life before he will make an effective back-to-the-lander. It seems to us that the highest success can only be had by making entry at the foundation, whereas too many try to get in by the roof. He must obey Thoreau, and "not being in the least awed by many celebrated works on husbandry," live simply and eat only the crop he raises, raise no more than he eats, and not exchange it for "an insufficient quantity of more luxurious and expensive things." An ideal to be aimed at rather than reached, but the right side from which to approach this problem of back to the land. It must, at any rate, be some time before we can buy a grand piano and a motor car out of agricultural profits. The bonanza farm must grow from a seed just as any oak upon it. An abundance of these things must be looked upon as the solace for a townsman's slavery, whereas the countryman has not the same need for them.

The simple, automatic means of getting a living from the land does not exist. Even the feeding and tending of poultry is not like the incessant making of pin-heads, and it is one of the tenets of "Home Counties" that a poultry farm will not pay. Neither will a fruit farm, nor a bee farm, nor a sheep farm, nor a farm without any occasion to shed blood, such as the humanitarian longs for. Poultry must be treated as a term in a system of rotation, just like clover, and as a link in the chain of agricultural sequence, like basic slag. The fruit trees will be the better for them, and even if the profit is not distinguishable in the egg account, it may be found in the fruit account. Nor must it be forgotten that the blossom is the counterpart of the bee, and that the man who keeps bees but no fruit, only gets one-half of the bargain, his neighbour securing the other. And, fight as he will, the humanitarian must take in pigs or sheep or goats if he would make his farm pay. There is no room on a farm for that waste that seems to pay so well in the towns. The town is a wen that lives for a time by the charity of all the farms of the world, but every holding must be a microcosm of the macrocosm.

Then in spite of the blight and the moth and the ravaging foe or unfaithful elements that we do not always bear in mind when we think of our rose bowers and walled gardens, we still plump for the comparatively self-contained and in every way excellent life of the man on the land. We bow to our author, who knows the difference between basic slag and sainfoin seed, and we admit that we may make something less than a financial success of our first crop of turnips. We fancy that we have heard of failures in the town, of trade vagaries not less destructive than hailstorms and drought. And the town gives us worse than failures—smooth running in an ever deeper and deeper groove, a deadening conviction that our counting-house is the whole world, and that we produce somewhat by financing a wheat option or helping to engineer a cotton corner. This dour man who stands in the way and utters disparaging remarks about that life which "he and many others" would not exchange for a town life, cannot deny that if we serve Nature faithfully she will give us a living. It is only those who have been spoilt by town life that expect more than that from our just and rather stern Mother Earth.

* Cassell & Co.

Present-Day Problems.

MR. MORLEY'S INDIAN REFORMS.—II.

By Sir William Wedderburn.

We are now approaching a grave crisis in the development of Mr. Morley's Indian constitutional reforms. During the last six months a vast amount of material has been accumulated, comprising official and non-official contentions and allegations, collected from the whole of India. How will Mr. Morley deal with this mass of conflicting evidence?

Let us consider how the matter now stands. In his Budget speech of June, 1907, Mr. Morley adumbrated certain movements in advance, relating principally to the formation of a Council of Notables, and the expansion of the Legislative Councils in India, both Imperial and provincial. To the Government of India he assigned the duty of initiating a scheme to carry out these objects, with instructions to consult not only the local administrations, but also independent public opinion. Accordingly, the Government of India framed a draft scheme, which is set forth in the Simla Circular of August 24th, 1907, and a further report is now due from them to the Secretary of State, giving their matured recommendations, after weighing the opinions called forth by their Circular. Mr. Morley retains in his own hands the ultimate decision. That gives assurance as to the general principles that will be applied.

But the immediate question that presents itself is, What method and what machinery will he adopt in order that the momentous issues raised may be fairly tried and determined? The magnitude of the task will be self-evident to those who know how fundamentally the views of European officials differ, as a rule, from those held by independent Indian opinion. It is the old quarrel between the maker of the shoe and the wearer; the old difficulty of reconciling the self-confidence of the professional artist with the feelings of the sufferer whose foot refuses to fit the model shoe. I have now before me one of the most authoritative expressions of independent Indian opinion. It is a memorial prepared by the Council of the Bombay Presidency Association, and addressed to the Viceroy in Council. This memorial joins issue with the Simla Circular at every point, traversing the allegations of fact and challenging the conclusions. No one can read it without being impressed with its knowledge and reasonableness; and we must remember that this grave document, with its forty-eight printed pages and 133 solid paragraphs, is only one of the many representations coming from every part of India.

How are all the issues thus raised to be tried and determined? What course can Mr. Morley pursue which will satisfy the people of India that their case has been dealt with carefully and, above all, impartially? The only course open seems to be to refer the papers, with a clear and definite reference, for report to a Parliamentary Committee or a Royal Commission. The subject, embracing, as it does, constitutional reforms of a far-reaching kind, is well worthy of such special treatment. And what is the alternative? The only other alternative is for the Secretary of State to be dependent for advice upon the members of his own Council. But, with every respect for the distinguished gentlemen who form that Council, it cannot be said that they occupy a position of impartiality when the controversy is between European official opinion on the one hand and independent Indian opinion on the other. If the procedure suggested be adopted, they would still have full opportunity of tendering their advice; for when the report of the Committee or Commission was received, the ultimate decision would still rest with the Secretary of State in Council.

To illustrate the complexity of the issues involved, I will take as an example the Council of Notables, which is, perhaps, the simplest of the reforms adumbrated by Mr. Morley, and will show briefly the scheme suggested by the Simla Circular and the objections taken by the Bombay Presidency Association. The object of this Council, as declared by Mr. Morley, is to act as an interpreter between the rulers and the ruled; to use his own phrase, the purpose is a double one, (1) to elicit independent opinion, and (2) to diffuse correct information as to the actions and intentions of the Government. In pursuance of these objects, the Government of India, in their opening paragraphs, propose to give the people of India "wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters." They hold that "for the present, at any rate, the needs and sentiments of the masses of the people must find expression through those, whether officials or non-officials, who are acquainted with their daily life, and are qualified to speak with authority on their behalf." But they desire "free and close consultation," and express a belief that their scheme will "represent a considerable advance in the direction of bringing all classes of the people into closer relations with the Government and its officers, and of increasing their opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes in respect of administrative and legislative questions."

These be brave words. But what is the scheme proposed to carry out the objects thus stated? Even to those unacquainted with Indian affairs, the Simla scheme must read strangely, as the means to an end. Briefly stated, it is as follows:—A Council called "The Imperial Advisory Council" is to be formed for purely consultative purposes; all the members to be appointed by the Viceroy; the Council to consist of about sixty members, including about twenty ruling chiefs and a suitable number of territorial magnates; the members to hold office for (say) five years, and to be eligible for reappointment; the Council to receive no legislative recognition, and not to be vested with formal powers of any sort; the Council to be purely advisory, and to deal only with such matters as may be specifically referred to it from time to time; and the proceedings of the Council when called together for collective consultation to be, as a rule, private, informal, and confidential, and not to be published, although Government would be at liberty to make any use of them that they thought proper.

Such is the scheme by which the Simla authorities propose to give the people opportunities of making known their feelings and wishes. The Bombay Presidency Association has no difficulty in showing that such a scheme cannot possibly carry out Mr. Morley's purpose of eliciting independent opinion. Nor does it fulfil the conditions set forth in the opening paragraphs of the Circular itself. For the aristocratic classes selected for the Council are not qualified to speak for the masses of the people; and, even if they were, the restrictive procedure would render them powerless as free exponents of public opinion. The scheme is condemned because it provides no representation for trade, manufactures, or the liberal professions. No place is found for the merchant princes, the captains of industry, and the professional men who, for half a century, have taken the leading part in public and municipal affairs. Above all, the scheme is condemned because it rests entirely on official nomination, excluding the element of election, without which the people cannot choose their own spokesman from among those who have the knowledge and independence and courage to voice effectively the needs and grievances of their poorer brethren.

This is undoubtedly the view that will be taken by the British public and Parliament when the case comes to England for consideration. If the true feelings of the people of India are to be learnt, it must be through their own representatives, elected either directly or indirectly. How can this be best accomplished? In political matters the British people do not like evolving institutions out of their inner consciousness. Their favourite method of proceeding is to build upon some existing foundation, and to utilise whatever machinery is in practical operation, adapting it to the new requirements. And, fortunately, there already exists, in the Indian National Congress, an organisation which was founded for the express purpose of eliciting and focussing the best Indian opinion, and placing it at the service of the Government for the benefit of the people. This organisation has been in practical working for the last twenty-three years, untiringly, loyally, and at great self-sacrifice, acting as the interpreter between the rulers and the ruled; striving, indeed, to do the very work which Mr. Morley desires to see done through a Council of Notables. Such being the case, why should not this machinery be now utilised? There is nothing alarming about it. Lord Lansdowne, when Viceroy of India, said that the movement which it represented was perfectly legitimate, and, in a letter addressed by him to the General Secretary of the Congress, he said: "The Government of India recognise that the Congress movement is regarded as representing in India what in Europe would be called the more advanced Liberal party, as distinguished from the great body of the Conservative opinion which exists side by side with it." An institution thus defined by so unexceptionable an authority ought not to be outside the sympathy of Mr. Morley; and, so far as an advanced Liberal party is entitled to representation in a body intended to give expression to popular feelings and aspirations, to that extent the Indian National Congress should be allowed to contribute to the composition of the Council of Notables. If further recommendation is needed, it will be found in the words of the late Sir Richard Garth, Chief Justice of Bengal. Writing in the "Law Magazine," this is how that stout old Conservative describes the work of the Congress leaders:—

> "I will tell you what they have done. They have dared to think for themselves; and not only for themselves, but for the millions of poor, ignorant people who compose our Indian Empire. They have been content to sacrifice their own interests, and to brave the displeasure of the Government, in order to lend a helping hand to those poor people. They have had the courage and the patriotism to denounce abuses which have disgraced our Indian rule for years past; which have been condemned by public opinion in India and in England, and to which the Indian Government appear to cling with a tenacity which seems utterly inexplicable. They have dared to propose reforms which, despite the resistance of the Government, have been approved by Parliament, and to endeavour to stay that fearful amount of extravagance which has been going on in India for years past, and has been the means, as some of our best and wisest counsellors consider, of bringing our Eastern Empire to the verge of bankruptcy."

I trust, therefore, that in framing the constitutional reforms a real effort will be made to reach the springs of Indian popular feeling, and that the necessary inquiries will be conducted in such a way as will satisfy the people of India that their case has had a careful and impartial hearing.

W. Wedderburn.

Letters from Abroad.

TO-MORROW IN PORTUGAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—At the first glance Portuguese political affairs seem to be in a hopelessly chaotic condition, yet the position of the different parties is not so nebulous, and their aims are not so uncertain, that it is impossible reasonably to prognosticate their probable attitude towards, and influence upon, the future administration of the country.

First of all, what are the political parties in Portugal? The old Chamber of Deputies, before it was dissolved by Senhor Franco, consisted of forty-four Progressives, twenty-three Regenerators, three Dissidents, four Republicans, one Nationalist, five Independents, and fifty-four Franquists. One of these parties will, of course, not appear, in name at all events, in the new Côrtes, viz., the Franquists. It is said that many of the followers of the late Dictator will retire from political life, and of those who still wish actively to participate in national affairs, the majority of the comparatively small number who will be returned will doubtless abstain from giving their adherence to any prominent party until they are assured that the best interests of the country will be served by so doing.

In gauging the political position of the country, the Nationalist and Independent parties may safely be left out of account, for it is not anticipated that their influence will be found to have materially increased when the Côrtes reassembles. The number of Independents returned may, of course, be slightly increased by the inclusion of certain Franquists. This, however, may be looked upon as an augmentation of quite a temporary nature, for the Franquists will, sooner or later, transfer their support to the party which promulgates the reforms of which the country stands in urgent need, since that would simply mean carrying on the work undertaken by Senhor Franco, and introducing the measures advocated by him. With these eliminations, therefore, we are left with four parties, the Progressives, Regenerators, Dissidents, and Republicans, and it is upon these that interest will centre itself at the forthcoming elections. What then, are the aims of these parties, and what influence are they likely to have upon the future of the country?

We will deal with the Progressives and Regenerators together, for, although nominally political opponents, their attitude towards one another under the old régime was such as to earn for them the combined name of "Rotativists," and they were looked upon as (and, indeed, were, to all intents and purposes) one party. It is not necessary to go into the antecedents of the Progressives and Regenerators; their policy of intrigue and peculation is now too well known to require repetition. Suffice it to say that they were directly responsible for the grave political crisis which forced the late king to adopt drastic measures to save his country from revolution and ruin, and to initiate reforms, the furtherance of which cost him his life. To the Progressives and Regenerators must be credited, if not the introduction, at least the perfection of the system which permitted all manner of abuses in connection with election returns. For years, owing to the enormous percentage of illiterates in the country, they regulated each other's entrances and exits with a suavity of procedure which was amazing, and in this manner effectively checked the growth of a true popular participation in the conduct of national affairs. Had Senhor Franco remained in office until the elections, it is safe to say that a proper system of representation would have been introduced. He saw the necessity for sweeping reforms in this direction, for he realised that the people would never grasp the significance of the elections so long as a discredited polling system was tolerated, and that under such a system they could not be expected to take a healthy interest in the administration of the country. Senhor Franco's influence has, however, been removed, and the engineering of returns will again take place, although in all probability to a lesser degree than before, since the inhabitants of the towns are beginning to realise their responsibilities as citizens. Now the Progressives and Regenerators, in spite of their unsavoury record, are still immensely powerful in the country districts among the impressionable peasantry, and it is fairly certain that either one party or the other will again be placed in power. The question, therefore, arises, will they perpetuate their old policy, and, by peculation and culpable mismanagement, hurry the country to her doom; or has two years' enforced abstention from politics brought home to them the necessity for clean and efficient Government? Unfortunately, their attitude of implacable hostility to the much-needed reforms introduced under the Dictatorial régime, nay, their undisguised abhorrence of reforms of any description, does not augur well for the administration of affairs once they again resume control.

What, then, is to save the country from a repetition of the abuses which characterised the Government of the Progressives and Regenerators when they were previously in power? In the first place, there is every reason to believe that these two parties are not so amicably disposed towards one another as they formerly were. The exposure of the scandalous proceedings in connection with the renewal of the Tobacco Monopoly in 1905 supplied the country with a concrete instance of their machinations; they were for once driven into a corner, and when the public eye was focussed upon them in their unenviable position they wriggled and squirmed and finally indulged in mutual recriminations. The partial estrangement which then took place is still apparent to some extent; indeed, they have quite recently been squabbling over the appointment of Civil Governors for the various cities and districts. This, in itself, is a distinctly healthy sign, for, although when combined they are strong, as separate units they are comparatively weak. But a much more important factor than the disintegration of the "Rotativists" is the fact that it is confidently anticipated that the next elections will, for probably the first time in the history of Portuguese politics, reveal the existence of a really important opposition in the shape of the Dissidents, Republicans, and the supporters of the late Dictator.

As to the Franquists, little need be added to what has already been said about them. There is a strong possibility, of course, that the action of the new Government may drive them, at no distant date, to join forces with either the Dissidents or Republicans.

The Dissidents have taken a stand midway between Monarchical and Republican forms of Government. They are willing to support the Monarchy so long as true democratic principles are observed, and their leader, Senhor José d'Alpoim (who has been described as a Portuguese Clémenceau) has given solemn warning that should the old discredited system be reverted to, he and his party will throw in their lot with the Republicans. Senhor d'Alpoim is a man of great tenacity of purpose, a strenuous fighter, and possessed of unbounded ambition. He has, it is stated, a large following, and his party will, without doubt, loom very prominently in future political developments.

The rapid spread of Republicanism during recent months would be cause for some alarm were it not for the fact that the average Portuguese, when he says he is a Republican, simply means that he advocates an efficient form of democratic government. At present he cannot realise that the political abuses from which his country has suffered could, and probably would, have occurred even if a President had been at the head of affairs. He, naturally, perhaps, persists in associating misgovernment and corruption with the Monarchy, and cannot conceive that anything short of a Republic can possibly cope with the existing evils. Given sound government, however, and the Portuguese Republican has nearly all that he is asking for. It is not at all improbable, therefore, that, having secured what he desires, he may relinquish the name with which he is just now enamoured, and will support the dynasty. He is not at present militant, but he may prove so if in future the policy of the last decade or two is pursued. There is still time to come to terms with him, but this is assuredly the last opportunity, and if it is not taken he will, in all likelihood, adopt an intransigent attitude. Be this as it may, however, the fact remains that the Republicans, with their watchword of purity of elections, and clean and just administration, will help to introduce a healthy tone into the deliberations of the next Côrtes, for they will, without doubt, be ever on the qui vive to strike a blow at any attempt to revive the old system with its attendant abuses.

From all indications, therefore, to-morrow's elections will supply a long-felt want, viz., a strong opposition. From the lack of this element, Governments in the past have almost invariably become effete. Furthermore, a political interest has been aroused in the country which should prove an effective bar against the introduction of abuses in the future. Under these circumstances, it is safe to assume that Portugal is entering upon an era of prosperity—for the hopeful signs for efficient government can mean nothing else—during which she should again assume her proper place among the nations of the world.—Yours, &c.,

April 4th, 1908. AN OLD RESIDENT.

The Drama.

"THRILLS."

THE more intelligent play-going public have, I think, a very real quarrel with the dramatic critics, in that they so often write of stage-work without giving a definite impression of its value. Much of this disguise of feeling and language is, I am afraid, part of the general relationship between theatres and newspapers. Put quite simply, that relationship is commercial. The theatres are profitable sources of advertisement. Their directors naturally consider that, in return for filling one or two columns a day of the most remunerative sheets of our leading daily journals, they are entitled to have their wares praised and recommended. This is, no doubt, a sous-entendu, and no bargain is made or suggested. But the fact that more than one affront has been put on distinguished writers on the stage because they chose to exercise their critical faculties on certain plays and playwrights is proof of the existence of a tradition against the freedom of the Press in one of the most interesting of its functions. This hostile force makes itself felt in many ways. It is a very rare thing for a critic to say, plainly and bluntly, that a play is worthless or silly, and its production devoid of merit; in other words, that the public ought to stay away from it. Even a writer of so much knowledge and of so fastidious a sensibility as, say, Mr. Walkley, throws an ironical veil over his writing, so that, while the instructed reader can see what he means, the average man and woman may well conceive him to be a much warmer friend of our theatrical system than he really is. Indeed, quite apart from this tradition of friendliness, so much modern English drama is bad that writers of insight, who recognise this fact, are drawn into adapting their style to it. There being no recognised standards of dramatic art, the tolerable, the well-meant, the half-baked, get much more than their due. Finally, the commercial drama is so deeply rooted on our stage, and has so firmly established its divorce from life and feeling, that it has set up a general acceptance of its aims and methods. The public look for nothing serious, and require the critics to speak the language concerning it which they understand. But such a basis for any form of literature is rotten. The commercial drama gets worse and worse. It passes into more and more vicious forms, and the critics, having given away their power at the start, cannot stay or control its decline.

For these reasons I was not surprised to find that the programme of the "Grand Guignol" at the Shaftesbury was described in many newspapers as furnishing a new kind of "thrill" in succession to the genuine sensation which the advent of the Sicilian players brought us. It ought to be needless to say that the two dramatic events have no kind of connection. The art of the Sicilians was fresh and daring, that of the players in the "Grand Guignol" is as conventional as a Drury Lane melodrama. It has nothing puppet-like about it; probably it would achieve a more distinct effect in a small theatre than in a large one; but its only distinction is that it deals with slighter material than the average play, with dramatic sketches or stories leading sharply up to some crudely conceived piece of stage realism. In this latter device is supposed to lie the capacity for "thrilling." But I was not thrilled. So far as I could see, nobody in the theatre was thrilled. Now and then there was a chorus of the half-shocked, half-delighted "Ohs" with which French people greet a somewhat adventurous jest. But, as a rule, the jests were not adventurous, and were only not quite so tame as the "thrills." These all failed for a variety of reasons. Great literature can thrill you, and so can great acting. I am thrilled as I see Romeo hanging over Juliet's lips and vowing that "death's pale flag is not advancèd there," because the words themselves are beautiful, and because, too, I know that death will soon seize that lovely prey. I was thrilled (and shudder now at the recollection) as the first blaze of jealousy was kindled in Othello's eyes, and flashed through his quivering body, for the player was Salvini. I am thrilled by the scene in "The Silver King" where, by an ingenious and impressive stage artifice, an unfortunate man is made to think himself guilty of a murder he has not committed. But the Shaftesbury "thrills" are at once too gross and too tame. The acting, now and then ingenious, is not remarkable, and the appeal of the plays is neither moral, nor intellectual, nor æsthetic. Thus the discovery of the lady walled-up in the sculptor's studio failed, first, because we all knew that there would be such a lady; secondly, because we knew nothing about her, and cared as little; thirdly, because when she was revealed she looked like a dressmaker's model in a shop window, and could not have been made to look more like a corpse without provoking, not, indeed, a "thrill," but disgust. The attack of hydrophobia which seizes the young lighthouseman, and his attempt to "worry" his father, produced no thrill because it was foreseen, because the details lacked plausibility, because, again, no moral interest had been aroused. The hanging of the cheating banker in his own office by the three rogues he had betrayed in his youth might have suggested such an interest if a more vigorous and truthful hand had been at work on it. But this element was lacking. There were too many false touches. There had been no adequate preparation of the audience, no development of the idea, and only old, faded material had been used. A street fight or accident would have been incomparably more interesting, for it would have awakened a train of elemental feelings—pity, anger, fear, sympathy, horror. The catastrophes of the short plays of the "Grand Guignol" stimulated no such sentiments, for at no moment in the action did they yield the effect of illusion, and set at work that sympathetic relationship between play and audience which alone produces emotion.

Yet there is no reason why the short dramatic piece should not have as real a vogue as the short story. I have seen M. Antoine and his company play "Boule de Suif," one of the most famous of short stories, with surprising effect, even though they expanded it beyond the rigorous limits of Maupassant's art. Even merely horrible things like the walling up of a corpse may, in the hands of the artist, yield its "thrill"; for have we not the example of "The Cask of Amontillado?" Possibly Poe's story would not bear any form of transformation into drama. But there should be an opening for the simpler effects of the short story—such as irony, an especially pitiful episode in life, like the theme of the "Convict on the Hearth," a vivid and significant relationship of characters of whom just enough is said to stir our interest, or (in lighter vein) a stroke of playful satire, like "A Pantomime Rehearsal." Such artistry is well within the compass of our modern workers, who excel in the minor key. But few hints of this kind of talent reach the stage, and, meanwhile, we are led away on false scents such as the performances of the "Grand Guignol" supply. We should not be deceived by them, even when they come from Paris, if the Press were really watchdogs of the drama, or, perhaps, I should say, if the watchdogs were occasionally let off the chain.

H. W. M.

Communications.

THE INCOME-TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

"What we understand to be the sentiment of the country, and what we ourselves as a matter of feeling are disposed to defer to, and to share in, is that under our present financial arrangements the Income-tax bears, on the whole, too hard upon intelligence and skill, and not hard enough upon property as compared with intelligence and skill."—Gladstone Budget Speech, 1853.

SIR,—When there is war there is the devil to pay, and the poor income-taxpayer believes that he is called upon to foot the Bill. We shall see. First let us try to appreciate the grievance which one class of income-taxpayers have to bear as against their fellow taxpayers. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, by his scheme for the differentiation of the income-tax as between earned and unearned incomes, has gone far to meet the inequalities referred to by Mr. Gladstone.

The Budget proposal of last year provided that earned incomes of £2,000 a year and under should enjoy an abatement of 3d. per £ from the nominal 1s. rate at present in operation. The inequality, great as it was in 1853, had become intensified year by year as the proportion paid by property and trade respectively had been reversed. In 1853 the income-tax derived from the assessment of lands and houses under schedule A produced £2,400,000 out of a total tax of £5,600,000, or 42 per cent. of the whole.

The tax on incomes from trades and professions under schedule D produced £1,200,000, or 21 per cent. of the total produce of income-tax. For the year 1906 the produce of the tax under schedule A had increased to £7,876,290, or 25 per cent. of the whole, as compared with £2,400,000, which in 1853 was 42 per cent. of the whole tax. The great strides which the country has made in trade and commerce has put this increase into the shade.

The produce of the income-tax under schedule D which amounted in 1853 to £1,200,000, equal to 21 per cent. of the tax, had risen in 1906 to £18,767,448, or 59½ per cent. of the total of £31,601,237, the net produce of the income-tax for that year, which compares with £5,600,000 in 1853.

Keeping in view the adjustment made by the Budget proposals of last year, we may still ask, "Does the present system deal fairly by the income-taxpayer, having regard to the source of his income and its amount?"

There is also the further question, "Do the income-taxpayers contribute too large a share to the general taxation of the country?"

It may be confidently asserted that at least one of Adam Smith's well-known canons of taxation—ability to pay—is grossly violated under the present method. We are, however, moving steadily on, step by step, to a more equitable system.

There were three definite steps necessary in consequence of our haphazard method of progress. Two of these have already been taken without much reference to the third step, or to each other—abatement, differentiation, graduation. An unconscious evolution towards perfection, so far as that can be attained, in any scheme of taxation.

A limited system of graduation by abatement was in operation prior to the passing of the scheme for differentiation, which in effect graduated the tax on all incomes liable to tax up to £700 a year. With the income-tax at 1s. in the £ the effect of the abatement allowed resulted in a graduated tax ranging from a little less than 1½d. in the £ on an income of £180, to 10¾d. per £ on an income of £700 per annum. All incomes over £700 a year paid the full rate of 1s. in the pound.

The Asquith Act of 1907 extended the abatement system to earned incomes up to £2,000 a year. Earned incomes between £700 a year and £2,000 paying 9d. per £ so long as the nominal rate remains at 1s. in the £. Earned incomes under £700 receive this rebate of 3d. per £, in addition to the abatements as formerly given.

But it will be conceded that it is rather hard on the possessor of an income from unearned sources amounting, say, to £750 a year, that he should pay the full rate of 1s. per £, while the successful merchant with £2,000 a year only pays a ninepenny rate. On the other hand, the merchant earning £750 a year feels it a hardship that he should be called upon to pay the same rate as his more prosperous neighbour who is making his £2,000 a year.

The incidence of the tax must bear more heavily and most inequitably on the smaller trader. The great objection hitherto urged against a scheme of graduation is that the rich man would be required to declare the amount of his income from all sources. Why shouldn't he? This same personal declaration is already made annually by 65 per cent. of the income-taxpayers—those who claimed abatement on incomes of £700 a year and under.

The new scheme of differentiation will largely increase this percentage, as all persons with earned incomes of £2,000 a year and under must make a similar declaration before they can get the benefit of the ninepenny rate.

The last entrenchment of the anti-graduationists has already been stormed by a flank movement.

There is no serious obstacle in the path of the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he desires to take a forward move. It is to be hoped that he will complete the good work he has begun by putting into speedy operation a system of complete graduation of the income-tax.

Who pays the tax? According to official figures given by Sir Henry Primrose before the Income-tax Committee, 1,100,000 persons pay income-tax. He estimated the income on which tax was payable by individuals at £678,000,000. This he divided into three classes. Incomes of £700 a year and under, £250,000,000. Incomes from £700 a year to £5,000, amounting to £307,000,000; and incomes of £5,000 a year and over, £121,000,000. Of this total 800,000 persons take £250,000,000, the remaining 300,000 persons appropriating £428,000,000. These figures only show income assessed after deductions. The gross income which comes under the the review of the Inland Revenue Department is much larger, and amounted in 1906 to £925,184,556.

This is the important factor which will help us to answer the second query: Does the income-taxpayer contribute more than his fair share of taxation? The old plea that the income-tax is a war tax has been discarded.

It is now universally accepted as part of the permanent sources of revenue.

A shilling income-tax is mournfully looked upon as justifiable only in time of war.

To the great bulk of the income-taxpayers, as we have shown, this is only a nominal rate.

The total tax revenue paid into the Exchequer amounted in 1906-7 to £119,830,000, of which sum the income-taxpayer contributed £31,600,000. In this is, of course, included his contribution for interest payable on war debt, and his share to the Sinking Fund payment for its ultimate redemption.

If we take the pre-war period we find that the total tax revenue paid into the Exchequer for the year 1898-9 amounted to £89,450,000, to which the income-taxpayer contributed £18,274,315. So that take the total increase of 30 millions in the revenue from taxes, the income-taxpayer only pays 13 millions, leaving 17 millions to be paid from other taxes.

Extra taxes were imposed for the war. These produced in 1903 £18,107,000 additional from income-tax, and £15,132,000 from other taxes.

If we deduct the coal tax, as being a kind of hybrid tax, the latter figure would stand at £13,230,000.

The proportion of war taxes remitted have been in favour of the income-taxpayer, who has been relieved to the extent of £8,750,000 per annum, as against a reduction in the other taxes of £3,400,000 on tea and corn. We have excluded from this comparison the additional 2d. per lb. on tea, put on by Mr. Austen Chamberlain in 1904, to provide for ordinary expenditure, and remitted by him in the following year.

Instead of bearing the brunt of the war taxation, the income-taxpayer is only paying one-half of the extra taxation, viz., £10,524,300; the other taxes still contributing 11 millions a year. All things considered, the income-taxpayer has come out of the war business fairly well.

Can he afford to pay the increased tax which still remains? Could the larger incomes even bear a higher rate than one shilling?

The figures already given help us to an answer. The growth of that part of the national income which comes under review of the Inland Revenue Department affords still more striking proof of ability to pay.

This part of the national income has increased from £704,740,000 in 1896-7 to £925,184,000 in 1905-6—an increase of 220 millions sterling in nine years, or equal to an increase of 31 per cent.

It is calculated that this 925 millions of income is enjoyed by five millions of people, the other half of the national income, amounting to some 850 millions, falling to be distributed among no less than 38 millions of people.

This gives an average per head for the income-taxpayer of £185, or, say, £740 per family, as against £22 7s. 4d. per head, or £90 per family, for the other class. Who is best able to pay taxes? Can anyone maintain that this division of income justifies our present apportionment of the burden of taxation.

We have shown that that part of the national income which pays income-tax has made the startling increase of 220 millions in nine years. These are interesting years, and show the effect of war on trade in significant phases.

The first three years—years of peace—show steady and marvellous progress, and an annual increase of 29 millions a year to the national income.

Then comes war, and for two years we have a great boom; the annual increase in income shoots up to 41½ millions and 33½ millions respectively. The year following the close of the war the increase drops to 12½ millions; while the last three years show an average increase of 15 millions a year.

We may derive more than one lesson from these figures. They are also a justification of the principle of differentiation. They clearly demonstrate that the incomes which suffered were the trade incomes. Income from property was hardly affected. This may seem strange, keeping in view the great slump in gilt-edge securities. The increase under schedule A, income from lands and houses for the period under review, amounted to £44,750,000. The increase under schedule D, trades and professions, amounted to £131,565,000. For the five years before the war affected the annual returns the increase under lands and houses for the five years amounted to 24 millions. But trade and profession incomes showed an increase for the same period of 110 millions. The succeeding four years to 1906 tell a very different tale, the increase under lands and houses equalling the increase from trades and professions, the figures under each head being £20,716,000 and £20,932,000 respectively. So does trade pay for war.

The income-tax was originally imposed, and was for long considered specially applicable for war purposes. There was much to be said for this view. The idea is capable of still further development.

It may fairly be argued that the maintenance of the fighting services, our national insurance against war, should be a first charge on the income-taxpaying classes. Industry has been relieved under differentiation, and the burden will therefore fall more heavily on property.

It is well that all classes should bear their share in the burden of war, so that all may fully realise the awful responsibility which it involves. Taxation, after all, is the best guarantee of peace. Having said that, it is none the less true that there is no part of the national expenditure which can more fitly be provided for on the principle of ability to pay than our naval and military services.—

Yours, &c., GEORGE MCCRAE.

House of Commons, March 31st, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

"FISCAL FALLACIES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Nothing could more clearly emphasise the contention I submitted to you last week than the article this week on the above subject by "J. A. H." Discussing "a tariff as a cure for unemployment," by reference to the importation of motor-cars, he offers two arguments against the Protectionist fallacy, one for the armchair and the other for the platform. The argument for the intelligent person reading at leisure is that, because of the higher prices resulting from the tariff, the same money will buy fewer cars. The additional expenditure, therefore, may not cause any greater demand for the labour of home production, and if more money is spent it means less spent on other commodities. "The net quantity of employment is the same as before, but the amount of commodities it turns out is somewhat reduced."

The argument "for the platform or short leaflet" is that the drawing of more money into the buying of home-made motor-cars by the imposition of a tariff must result in tariffs for other trades, and thus stop the desired diversion to that trade. "In other words, the whole plausibility of the Protectionist claim can be shown to rest upon the supposition that the motor-car trade is to be allowed to injure other trades in the country with impunity."

Now I know something of arguing pure economics with popular audiences, but I should not venture to face a popular audience with arguments so weak as either of these two. An audience to whom Protectionist arguments appeal is not to be turned from its purpose by the consideration that it is asking for a selfish and unfair favour. There is nothing more selfish in this consideration than there is in a section of the community asking to have employment found at the cost of the remainder of the community by the spending of rates and taxes on unemployment schemes.

The more elaborate argument is capable of being strengthened by a line "J. A. H." suggests and then drops. For to attain the same quantity of employment with a tariff as without, it is necessary to shut out all the foreign-made cars, and that means not only more unemployment abroad, but also that the goods which would have gone to pay for those cars are not required. By bringing that argument forward to buttress the other it can be shown that tariff must result in absolute loss of employment.

The true argument, however, is that the tariff raising the price of the commodity must inevitably reduce the demand for it, and must consequently reduce the demand for the labour of making it and the price of that labour. It is not true, or reasonable to expect, as "J. A. H." suggests, that more money would be devoted to purchasing the commodity because the price is raised. A reduction in price so increases demand that a larger total of money is obtained as the result of the production. That is why the reduction is made. It would be absurd to make the reduction otherwise. The forcibly raised price must therefore have the effect of reducing the total of the money expended. If more money could be got the manufacturers would get it without State aid.

If we assume that the same money would be spent at the higher prices, it still means that it is for a smaller quantity of product, and the demand for labour falls off. The additional money goes into the pockets of the manufacturer, not into those of the employee. But since the demand, as measured in money, actually falls off, even the manufacturers in the aggregate do not gain. The weaker ones lose and fail. The others take larger profits not because of higher prices obtained for the commodity—the prices must fall by lack of demand—but because the smaller quantity produced, as well as the lack of demand for labour in the trades engaged in export, reduces prices of labour. The Protectionist policy that follows the imposition of tariffs in one trade also makes the maintenance of labourers more costly. That means they offer their labour more keenly, being in greater want. It hits labourers every time.

Once grasp this argument, and a speaker can answer Tariff Reformers all night without losing a point. The foreigner becomes a blessing, because by his competition he keeps the manufacturers from charging too much, or giving an inferior article, and thus killing the demand. It can still take in the fact that the foreigner is paid with goods produced in this country, and therefore himself replaces all the demand of which he deprives us. And there may be added the contention that Protection for one trade involves Protection in others, and therefore dearer commodities for labourers. Moreover, it is an argument that can be used to the manufacturers themselves, who know that small reliable profits are better than the irregularity and the periods of loss caused by sudden and enormous falling off of trade which happens in protected countries.

But it is a weapon which the present-day "orthodox" Free Trader dare not use, because it cuts deeper than he wants to go. The Liberal Party must, however, make up its mind to it. If the consumer of bread is not to have the price raised, why should the occupier of a house have the cost of his shelter raised by taxation, or the consumer of home-made objects have to pay taxes on the use of land for their production, while there is no tax so long as the land is unoccupied and unused?

Mr. Outhwaite utters a word of warning about small holdings. There are other aspects of that question, which I remember his discussing in another journal. But he will be driven further than he goes at present, if the Liberal Party are content to believe they can maintain Free Trade by asking the people to take wide views and forget their starvation. There must be a remedy, or the people will ask why, and try those who promise even a delusive one. And the remedy is not more State interference by Socialism or Tariff Reform. It is further progress towards freedom, in the way of just taxation and sound public finance.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. Laycock.

Sheffield, March 28th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I am glad that an economist of the standing of "J. A. H." has pointed out what the average Free Trade lecturer will not admit, that a loss to the manufacturer of British goods now exported need not result from a tariff on foreign motor-cars. But I cannot agree with the substitution of argument based on the supposition that "British prices throughout the trade must rise." The Tariff Reformer can surely fairly reply to this that, though there may be a temporary rise of prices caused by the sudden dislocation, the increased demand for British cars will bring in fresh capital, and in time prices will fall to the old level.

It seems to me that the safest line of argument is to admit that a tax on foreign motor-cars might help unemployment; but that it is not practical politics to tax motors without at the same time taxing hops and butter, steel billets and cement.

The trouble with Protection is not the principle but its application in a state of society where reliable statistics are not available to show exactly what goods and in what quantities can be as cheaply made at home as imported, where the personal ownership of land prevents the would-be producer from obtaining access to his raw material, and where transport facilities are not directed solely to bringing manufactures to market at the lowest cost.—Yours, &c.,

R. C. Phillimore.

Battler's Green, Watford, Herts,
March 30th, 1908.

THE SUFFRAGISTS AND PECKHAM ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I question whether all the efforts of the female Suffragists carried more than a very small weight in the scale at the recent bye-elections. Every interest, of course, that can do so tries to magnify its power, and it is not easy to get at the truth. The dictum, "Taxation without representation is tyranny," is apposite as regards Adult Suffrage; in respect of Female Suffrage it is meaningless; all who pay their way are taxed, and the poorest the heaviest in proportion.

The Liberal Party is unfortunate in having two comparatively hostile wings, and any measure that pleases the one is likely to offend the other. Personally, I consider myself a Radical stalwart. I would not vote under any circumstances for a Tory, but, had I had a vote at Peckham, I would not have recorded it at all. The Government could easily smash the power of the brewery companies and carry all political parties enthusiastically along with them were they not dominated by people who want to close the public-houses altogether, or, at the very least, all day on Sunday. Let them drop the present Bill and introduce a measure fixing a time limit after which all licences must be paid for at full monopoly value, such price to go to the State or municipality. The limit should be a long one for old licences; even fifty years would be a great benefit to the State, although I would not suggest more than thirty. Liberals must remember that if not returned to power after the next General Election it may be quite fourteen years before they get another chance to deal with the subject at all.

But what would enthuse everybody and destroy the illegitimate power of the brewers would be to enact that after a given time —seven years, I think, would meet the case—brewery companies or brewers must sell their houses, and only owners who lived on their premises and managed them would be licensed. They might sweep the country with a measure of this kind, which would destroy the tied-house system, especially if the Bill contained the extra condition that no brewer or brewery company might lend money on licensed premises.

They could also make regulations as to the hours of the publicans' servants. But—well, dash Mr. Stiggins. He is really the cause of all the trouble.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. Marriott.

249, Ladbroke Grove, Notting Hill.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You make a very mild remark in your "Diary of the Week" on the above.

No language can be too strong to condemn the unmitigated selfishness of those women, who, unless they are in a state of the most crass ignorance, must know some little of what the drink traffic is doing, yet, utterly regardless of consequences, help the tied-house owners to maintain its power.

I have been for many years in favour of giving votes both to single and married women (although I feel that at least three-fourths of them would vote for the Tories), yet if those who boast of the mischief they did at Peckham are a sample of the sort who would have a part in the government of the nation, I fervently say, "May the country we love be eternally preserved from so dire an affliction!"—Yours, &c.,

J. Marshall Sturge.

Charlbury, March 31st, 1908.

TARIFF REFORM AND MOTOR CARS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The argument against Tariff Reform, published in the current number of The Nation, takes no account of the fact that motor cars are in nine cases out of ten a luxury. They are bought by persons who do not need to economise because of them. These are the persons, in this country a very large class, who have always a reserve of wealth to be spent on any new commodity that takes their fancy. Thus "J. A. H.'s" elaborate theory is built upon a crumbling foundation. A duty on imported cars would stimulate the manufacture of and trade in British cars; even if the price of these rose slightly for a time, there would be no slackening in the current demand for cars; and practically the whole of that part of the British luxury-fund, which is now spent on French cars, would be spent on British cars.

Please do not put an editorial foot-note saying: "What then? If we reduce our imports from France we must also reduce our exports to France, or to some other place?" That would merely be starting another hare, which I should be sorry to hunt to the death in a Liberal pasture-land.

The fact, Sir, is that I am becoming most uneasily sceptical of the fine show of reasoning with which certain Liberal propositions are being urged. I will not harrow your feelings by looking into the defences of the Education Bill, the Scottish Land Bill, and the Licensing Bill. All I ask is that we should draw from recent experience a warning as to Tariff Reform. It seems to have become inevitable. There are signs that the Cabinet have secretly come to perceive this, and that they would not be ill-pleased if a General Election resulting in the return of the Unionists and the institution of Tariff Reform gave Liberalism a fresh future, with ampler financial resources.—Yours, &c.,

Constant Reader.

Aberfeldy, March 30th, 1908.

IRISH LIBERALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your recent correspondent, "An Irish Liberal," has evidently never lived in England nor mingled much with English Liberals, or else he should have discovered that Ireland is no longer "a subject of intense interest to them," but has become, as your leader writer pointed out recently, an object of indifference, and a source of boredom not only in the House of Commons, but to the whole people of England, who are beginning to realise that they, too, have national questions.

"An Irish Liberal" gives as one of the reasons a Liberal Administration in Ireland is always at a disadvantage, the assertion that there is no Liberal Party in Ireland. There is a Liberal Party in Ireland, but, like many other things there, it is of exotic growth, and of little use in the practical politics of the country. This was shown pretty clearly over Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, when practically all the Irish Liberals declared themselves Unionists, and therefore in favour of coercive government in Ireland.

The true line of cleavage in Irish politics lies between Nationalism and anti-Nationalism. An Irishman must belong to either of these camps. But if to-morrow England cleared Ireland of her soldiers and officials, I believe both these parties would quickly settle down to developing the neglected resources of the country, and in a short time make Ireland worthy to be called a nation, instead of a source of irritation and embarrassment to all connected with her.

The questions that interest Ireland are not and cannot be the same as those that interest England. For instance, no election in Ireland could be fought on the English issue of Free Trade versus Tariff Reform. It is quite natural, therefore, that the Irish should hold views utterly at variance with those of the English Liberal Party.

The younger Irishmen who are "seeking to break away from the traditions of the past," will, I hope, become "helpful allies" of their own country, not hangers-on of any English political party, which is your correspondent's strange ambition for them. Those movements on the Continent which, he says, are attracting attention in "Dublin and the larger provincial towns"—he might have added "the country," too—are something more than "Liberal movements." The movement in Hungary is national, in Russia it is revolutionary, in Germany it is economic; there is no need for anyone to explain Ireland's interest in all these movements.

"An Irish Liberal" says that "the crowning blunder" of the present Administration in Ireland is the passing over of many eligible Roman Catholic barristers of both the Liberal and Nationalist persuasion when the last bit of jobbery was perpetrated. Surely he ought to know that no honest Nationalist can be an office-seeker or place-hunter, nor even accept "an appointment" when it is offered without his seeking it. With the Liberals it is, of course, another matter, and it must be very vexing to them to have none of the "comfortable salaries ranging from £500 to £12,000 a year" (poor Ireland!) which he complains have been bestowed on "men who are open and avowed opponents of the present Administration." But is the party that seeks to strengthen its hands by bribery and corruption ever likely to satisfy national aspirations either in its own country or any other?

In conclusion, we cannot but admire the frankness of "An Irish Liberal" in lamenting that "no effort has been made by the judicious use of the patronage at its (the English Government's) disposal to attract to its support the younger and more active members of the various professions." We Nationalists hope, however, that the present revival in Ireland will lead our young men to work for their own country without needing to be bribed to do it.—Yours, &c.,

An Irish Nationalist.

Poetry.

THE INTERVAL.

I.

I sleep. The panoply of sense,
The buffetings, the din,
The breasts of love, the battle dense,
The roaring drive I know not whence,
The riot curbed within,
Cease, and in dreamless innocence
The Self forgets its sin;
Forgets, unloosing like a robe,
The body and its grief,
Till at the Dawn over the globe
(That soft and silver thief!)
It wakes; nor ever eye can probe
Where it has found relief.

II.

I die. The treasure-ships I sought,
The glories and the glee,
The lives wherewith my own was wrought
(As in some tapestry gem-fraught)
Nearly and tenderly,
And the tune mine ear had almost caught,
All sink away from me.
Then dreamless æons interpose.
The gap, perchance, is long.
Will the Self wake to strains it knows?
Will the vast star-lit throng
Take up, renewed by deep repose,
The full theme of the song?

Herbert Trench.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

IN addition to the books by Mr. H. G. Wells announced in a recent number of THE NATION, another work from his pen may be expected in the immediate future. It will contain a general statement of Mr. Wells's speculative views on religion and life, developing, amid other things, the line of thought set forth in the essay "Scepticism of the Instrument," which is printed as an appendix in "A Modern Utopia." Mr. Wells shows a great power of literary production, but in his case this gift is not, as so often happens, accompanied by any loss of freshness. The influence of religion upon social progress, and the way in which the modern mind is inclined to approach both these subjects, have engaged his attention for some time, so that the coming volume is sure to be suggestive as well as critical.

* * *

IT is always interesting to learn what are the books that have been read and admired by famous men of letters. Mr. Austin Dobson has already written in delightful fashion about the libraries of Gray, Johnson, Goldsmith, and other authors of the eighteenth century, but it is surprising that this fascinating line of research has been so much neglected. However, one of the essays in a coming volume of "Literary and Biographical Studies" by Mr. James Baker, will be given up to books read by Coleridge, Southey, and Humphrey Davy. Coleridge, as everybody knows, was as great a reader as he was a talker, while no one can turn over the pages of Southey's "Common-Place Book" or "The Doctor" without being struck by the number of out-of-the-way books which Southey seems to have read. Among the other contents of Mr. Baker's volume are some hitherto unpublished letters written by Macaulay to his father and mother, and personal recollections of R. D. Blackmore, Friedrich von Bodenstedt, and Verestschagin, the famous Russian painter. It will be issued in a few weeks by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

* * *

"FRANCE IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY" is the title of a book by Mr. W. L. George, which is to be published next month by Messrs. Alston Rivers. The book is a study of the chief forces, religious, social, political, and literary, that are now making themselves felt in French thought, or that seem to have most likelihood of influencing its future development. Mr. George, who has been educated in France, and has served as a conscript in the French Army, holds that the French Radicals constitute the most virile and progressive element in the country. His book comes at an opportune moment, since interest in French affairs is sure to be heightened by the Franco-British Exhibition which opens next May.

* * *

THE study of æsthetic philosophy has always found favour in Germany. Lessing and Winckelmann, in the eighteenth century, built up a framework of artistic theory, to which Goethe subscribed; to-day quite a host of German writers are engaged upon the same subject, endeavouring to promote a more intelligent appreciation of works of art and to find new standpoints from which to approach the question. Some of the fascination of the newer, more thoughtful style of art criticism has penetrated this country, and the influence of Muther and Thode has impressed itself on our treatment of æsthetic matters, tending to oust the humdrum historico-biography method of a former age. Another German writer, who has just been translated into English, is Dr. Julius Meier-Graefe. His "Studies in the Development of Modern Art" aims at showing "the continuous growth of art, the evolution of one great personality from another, of one great tradition from what has gone before." It claims to be a contribution to a new system of æsthetics. Miss Florence Simmonds is responsible for the translation, and the work, consisting of two volumes, with about 250 illustrations, will be issued by Mr. Heinemann.

* * *

THE announcement that an eminent lawyer is at work on a life of of Isaac Butt, Parnell's predecessor in the leadership of the Home Rule movement, is sure to provoke interest. At the same time, it calls to mind other biographies that still remain unwritten. John Bright, for instance, has left behind him a large mass of correspondence, yet in spite of his share in the great political movements of his time no authoritative "Life" has appeared. R. D. Blackmore also kept a diary, but the non-appearance of a biography of the author of "Lorna Doone" is probably due to a wish expressed in his will. Other writers, Thackeray and Froude, for example, expressed similar wishes, but biographies of both have appeared.

* * *

THERE seems to be a revival of interest in spiritualism if we may judge from the number of books upon the subject which the publishers announce as in active preparation. Messrs. Putnam's Sons have in the press "The Naturalisation of the Supernatural," by Mr. Frank Podmore, who is widely known as an authority on psychical research. His book reviews the work effected during the past twenty-six years by the Society for Psychical Research, and shows that while the Society's investigations have done much to expose fraudulent performances by mediums, they have also brought forward a considerable body of evidence on behalf of thought transference or telepathy. The latter part of the book is devoted to a critical examination of the evidence so far accumulated for communication with the dead. Mr. Podmore's verdict is that conclusive proof of such communication has not yet been furnished. Mr. Werner Laurie will issue two books upon the same subject. "Do the Dead Depart? and Other Questions," by Miss Katherine Bates, whose former book, "Seen and Unseen," has had a great vogue, deals with clairvoyance, automatic writing, materialisation, and so forth, from the standpoint of a convinced believer. Mr. H. Carrington's "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism" is mainly occupied with an exposure of the frauds connected with the subject. He holds that an attack upon these frauds is a necessary step towards reaching the genuine phenomena which, he believes, do occasionally happen.

* * *

THE Manchester University Press has in preparation an important historical work, "The Cromwellian Conquest and Settlement of Ireland," by Mr. Robert Dunlop. It consists of a series of unpublished documents relating to the history of Ireland from 1651 to 1659, arranged, modernised, and edited with introduction, notes, and a critical apparatus. Mr. Dunlop has already given us several contributions of value to Irish history. He is well qualified to deal with even so controverted a period as that of the Cromwellian Settlement.

* * *

THE lectures on Racine by M. Jules Lemaître, which have been the literary sensation of the season in Paris, are to be published in a couple of weeks by Messrs. Calmann-Lévy. Judging from the summaries that have appeared in the French newspapers, the book is likely to be a critical work of the first importance.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Duke of Gandia." By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)

"Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England." By J. Churton Collins. (Nash. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Soul of Spain." By Havelock Ellis. (Constable, 7s. 6d. net.)

"Sketches of Life in Town and Country." By Edward Carpenter. (Allen. 5s. net.)

"My School and My Gospel." By Sir Herbert von Herkomer. (Constable. 21s. net.)

"The Story of Milan." By Ella Noyes. The Medieval Towns Series. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

"The Trade and Administration of the Chinese Empire." By H. B. Morse. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Ice-Bound Heights of the Mustagh." By F. B. Workman and W. H. Workman. (Constable. 21s. net.)

"Memoir of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake, Baron Lake of Delhi and Laswaree." By Colonel Hugh Pearse. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

"The Sword Decides!" By Marjorie Bowen. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

"Américains et Japonais." Par Louis Aubert. (Paris: Colin. 4fr.)

"Musiciens d'aujourd'hui." Par Romain Rolland. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

"Croyance religieuse et Croyance intellectuelle." Par Ossip-Lourié. (Paris: Alcan. 2fr. 50.)

"Veuvage blanc." Roman. Par Marie Anne de Bovet. (Paris: Nilsson. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

WORDSWORTH AS A LETTER WRITER.*

Wordsworth, except by virtue of one quality, was not remarkable as a letter-writer. His happiest moods were those "trances of thought and mountings of the mind" which came to him when wandering among the hills or seated upon some old, gray stone. The act of penmanship was always a distress to him; in his elder years he was troubled with inflammation of the eyes, and he often dictated his letters. He could chain his mind to record facts, but to do so implied a state of servitude. He cared little for the letters of great writers, and expressed a wish that his own might be destroyed. He had no pleasant malice eager to escape from the tip of the pen, such as Horace Walpole had. He had no bubbling mirth which will not be repressed like that of Lamb. He could not engrave an exquisite vignette for a friend's delight and his own, like Cowper. His pen was not an etcher's needle, nor a dagger to stab, nor a sword to cut, nor a hobby-horse on which to canter. But to set over against all this, Wordsworth could write the truth, and the truth he invariably wrote.

He had the rare virtue of veracity. Here are three volumes of letters—mainly his—containing some fifteen hundred pages, which touch upon a multitude of topics, and it is safe to say that there is not a lie, whether black or white, to be found from the first letter to the last. This is marvellous; but with Wordsworth some of the inducements to tell lies, pleasant or unpleasant, were absent. He was not apt, like Shelley, to see palm trees over illusive wells in the waste, and on arriving confess that only sand was to be found. There was nothing in Wordsworth, as there was in Coleridge, which must skulk. Our feet, as we move through these records, are upon the rock or wholesome turf, not upon sinking peat, with a glazed and stagnant pond to right and to left. It is often the simple, grave, and thoughtful dalesman, with a cottage and a wife and children in it, whom we encounter here; but the dalesman was also a great poet, and dalesman and poet were of a piece, the one being as veracious as the other.

Wordsworth is at his best when his letters least resemble what our ancestors named epistolary correspondence. Occasionally some large theme occupies and rouses his mind, and he writes what is almost an essay, or at least—as he described "The Happy Warrior"—"a chain of valooable thoughts" upon a set subject. In a well-known letter of May, 1807, to Lady Beaumont, it is his own mind as a poet and his own poetical creations which he studies and broods on, until his prose becomes suffused with lofty passion. Another letter to Lady Beaumont of inordinate length exhibits his genius as a landscape-gardener. A third, from which no extract is given in these volumes, sent in March, 1811, to Captain Pasley of the Royal Engineers, opening with a criticism of his correspondent's Essay on the "Military Policy and Institutions of the British Empire," rises before the close to the same prophet-like tones which are heard in the pamphlet on the Convention of Cintra. Wordsworth longs that the military power of France should be reduced, while the nation should itself remain intact; he looks forward with hope to the unity of Italy and the unity of Germany. He desires for England a new system of martial policy. And then the patriot assumes the prophetic mantle:

> "But England, as well as the rest of Europe, requires what is more difficult to give it—a new course of education, a higher tone of moral feeling, more of the grandeur of the imaginative faculties, and less of the petty processes of the unfeeling and purblind understanding, that would manage the concerns of nations in the same calculating spirit with which it would set about building a house. Now a state ought to be governed (at least in these times), the labours of the statesman ought to advance, upon calculations and from impulses similar to those which give motion to the hand of a great artist when he is preparing a picture, or of a mighty poet when he is determining the proportions and march of a poem—much is to be done by rule; the great outline is previously to be conceived in distinctness, but the consummation of the work must be trusted to resources that are not tangible, though known to exist."

Such words as these could have been translated with a little rehandling into one of the lofty strains of "The Prelude."

But the good homely prose of the pedestrian letters has an attraction of its own. Through it we remain for a time in contact with a life of perfect integrity, in which the darkest crimes were that Mr. Wordsworth sometimes kept a correspondent too long in expectation of an answer, or William forgot, while tramping the roads and hills, that Mary had his dinner ready for him at a fixed hour. We see a man of profound and even passionate affections, whom sorrow could shake to the centre and indignation could possess with a solid core of heat; a man not illiberal in his sympathies, giving in general just esteem to the work of others, but testing all things by the highest standards, and in a certain sense anchored to his own greatness. We grow into familiarity with his grave and well-considered opinions—on public events, public persons, national policy, religion, literature, art, the characteristics of landscape. His sister, some of whose letters are charming, with as fine an eye, had not an equal power of reflection or analysis. We are guided by these letters to the sources, occasions, dates of many of Wordsworth's poems; we see the objects which reappear in the poems, but see these divested of "the light that never was, on sea or land." These documents are essential to a complete knowledge of the poet and the man.

Dr. Knight is to be congratulated on the completion of a labour of love. Everyone who cares for Wordsworth must feel that a large debt is due to him for his zeal in bringing together what was scattered through many volumes and what lay hidden in manscript. He could easily have made this liberal selection of letters and passages from letters larger, but the public will not borrow Gargantua's mouth for things of a past generation. It seems a part of true respect to the editor and his work that some of its defects should be noticed. The text of the letters has not always been correctly given. Indications of omissions, contrary to Dr. Knight's intention, are frequently absent. Dates, as the editor seems to be aware, are too often erroneous. The statements in Dr. Knight's notes are sometimes incorrect. The sources from which the letters have been derived are seldom recorded. Dr. Knight speaks as if this would have been impossible to accomplish, but no difficulty exists in the case of letters taken from books previously published, and it is not easy to see why much could not have been done to indicate the sources from which manuscript letters at some time or another reached him. To illustrate what has been stated—in Volume III., on p. 75, a letter is said to have been written on "15th April" to "H. Rogers," and again in the Index, H. Rogers is named as Wordsworth's correspondent. In Clayden's "Rogers and his Contemporaries" (II., 119), this letter appears as addressed to Samuel Rogers on April 5th. On the next page (p. 76) is printed a letter to Southey telling of the death of Wordsworth's sister-in-law, dated by Dr. Knight "June 25, 1835." It was in fact written a year later, on June 24th, 1836. The text of this short letter is substantially but not exactly correct. On p. 77 a letter to Crabb Robinson is dated "June 26, 1835"; it was in fact written on the same day as the preceding letter to Southey, June 24th, 1836. The letter which immediately follows (p. 79), also to Crabb Robinson, is again a year astray. Such errors do not trouble the person known as the general reader, who perhaps is the literary "man in the street"; but they create needless difficulties for the student of Wordsworth. No one will regret them more than the editor of these volumes, who is to some extent cognisant of the presence of inaccuracies of this kind. Why fragments of two letters, printed in "Letters from the Lake Poets" as addressed to Daniel Stuart, should be entered by Dr. Knight as "to Correspondent Unknown" (I., 458 and 464) puzzles an exact reader. The editor may have some reason with which we are unacquainted. Such criticism could be pursued much further, but many causes, for which an editor cannot be held responsible, may produce errors, and in the end we should have to return our cordial thanks to Dr. Knight for a valuable gift.

Edward Dowden.

* "Letters of the Wordsworth Family from 1787 to 1855." Collected and edited by William Knight. 3 vols. Boston and London: Ginn & Company. 31s. 6d. net.

LOISY'S APOLOGIA.*

M. Loisy's latest book is of the nature of an Apologia pro vita sua. In a series of letters, addressed for the most part to private friends, he explains his relations with ecclesiastical authority since the condemnation of his works in the beginning of the present pontificate, giving an account of the conclusions to which he has been led, of their incompatibility with official Catholic teaching, and of the situation created by the controversies to which they have given rise. It cannot be said of him that he is "no striker." Nothing so scathing has been written since Newman's famous answer to Kingsley. Were the quarrel one of individuals this vehemence might be open to criticism. The contest is unequal. The little men at Rome, so small for all their purple, with their thin unction and their text-book learning, have fallen into the grip of one of another stature than theirs. But it is a battle not of men but of ideas. The Steinhubers, the Merry del Vals, the Pontiff himself, are puppets. We are concerned not with them but with the forces at work behind them, Good and Evil, Truth and Falsehood. And it is a false charity which shrinks from denouncing evil as evil and a lie as a lie.

The salient quality of those Letters is their terrible, their appalling sincerity. Satire, scorn, pathos are there; but the keynote is the bare, impersonal statement of unadorned fact. It is not our way. No English divine would treat the subjects discussed with this cold austerity; no English public would endure their discussion on these lines. We desiderate edification, which is good; but we sacrifice to it—and this is not good—if not fact, certainly proportion and perspective. We compromise in the interests of practice; not seeing that in its own province thought is paramount, and must be followed, lead where it will. This is why English theologians are at fault in dealing with M. Loisy's work: the "Times'" review of "Les Evangiles Synoptiques" may be referred to as an example of their criticism. Provincial, insular, it is wanting in insight—it might almost be said in generosity. He does not sacrifice to our idols, and we distrust him. "Vais-je verser dans le monisme, dans le panthéisme? Je l'ignore. Ce sont des mots. Je tâche de parler des choses." We seem to be listening to Carlyle. North of the Tweed men think and speak in this way; not on the Isis and the Cam.

It is this uncompromising truthfulness which has led to the final rupture with the Roman hierarchy: he is excommunicated because, in plain words, he refuses to lie. It is an ugly word, but an uglier thing. "He is not required to cease writing, but to write in defence of tradition," —what does not this cover?—"as St. Remigius bade Clovis, 'Worship what thou hast burned; burn what thou hast worshipped.'" Thus the Pope. That is to say, this great Catholic scholar is called upon under pain of damnation, in so far as Pius X. can damn, to commit intellectual and moral suicide, to call truth falsehood and falsehood truth. To a summons to this apostasy one answer only can be made: "J'ai toujours regardé comme un devoir de rester dans l'Eglise, mais aussi de ne pas mentir pour éviter d'en être chassé." From personal sacrifices he has not shrunk. Had he broken with the Church, the scholar's fame was open to him; had he been false to his convictions, the Church herself presented a career. His retirement from the Sorbonne in 1904 was dictated by consideration for others: "Ce qui m'a décidé a été la considération du très grand nombre de jeunes prêtres qu'une catastrophe aurait consternés, ou exaspérés, ou compromis." But the sacrifice of principle is another thing. "Il ne faut pas me parler de sacrifices que la conscience interdit. Ce qui m'a toujours empêché de donner à l'autorité ecclésiastique la satisfaction qu'elle réclame c'est l'impossibilité où je serais de me supporter un seul instant si j'avais publiquement confessé que je tiens pour faux ce que je sais être vrai, et réciproquement." The Vatican does not understand such motives. "Ces bons Romains ne conçoivent pas que l'on interroge sa conscience pour les affaires où l'on peut avoir un intérêt. . . . Il est fort heureux pour nous que Dieu voit nos cœurs."

M. Loisy stands in the front rank of critics. The substance of his criticism is as radical as its form is trenchant: that it would be out of place in a parish pulpit few will deny. It is not intended for such use. He writes as a scholar for scholars. To many of his opinions he would be the last to ascribe more than provisional value: they are open to revision; they may be, in fact, revised. But to submit them to the test of the Procrustes bed of traditional dogma is stupid and irreligious: the first because the two are incommensurable; the second because such a stereotyping of tradition makes the Word of no effect. The Republic has no need of chemists; nor, it seems, the Church of scholars: the spirit of the Committee of Public Safety and that of the Vatican are one. It is the spirit that goes before a fall. It is not by the force that they can command—in our day a diminishing quantity—but by the reason which they embody that institutions, religious or civil, live.

That novelty is often error to those who are unprepared for it, from the refraction with which it enters into their conceptions, is true. But the scandal of the Pharisees is not to be confounded with that of the weak. The latter, so far as it exists—and in an age of so varied a culture as ours, in which the medieval mind survives side by side with the modern, it would be rash to set it down as non-existent—is best met by the reminder that religion does not consist in opinions, however true, or in observance, however useful, but in a fact of spiritual experience, which is to be distinguished from its intellectual re-statement. But it is seldom the simple and single-hearted who are scandalised: rather it is the faux dévots, the half-believers who hang on to the Church from custom, from sentiment, from disinclination to accept personal responsibility for thought and conduct—it is these who resent the disturbance of their dogmatic slumbers by inquiry, by revival, by anything that threatens to recall them from the world of dreams to that of reality. "La mediocrité fonde l'autorité." It is the wish to evade the law of the higher self that brings about that religion of the second order, priestly, statutory, ceremonial, which so soon becomes second nature: it is easier to do than to be. The vitality of a community in which this secondary religion is dominant is at a low ebb: its union in Catholicism with a powerful hierarchical element bent at all costs on the preservation of its threatened privileges and emoluments has alienated all that is best and most living in the modern world from the Church.

> "Le grande scandale en nos jours, je n' hésite pas à le declarer hautement, c'est l'opposition permanente, radicale, intransigeante, souvent cruelle et déloyale, que l'Eglise a faite, qu'elle continue de faire à tout le mouvement intellectuelle et scientifique, on peut ajouter même social et politique, des derniers siècles. Voilà le vrai, l'unique scandale, et j'en suis innocent. Autant qu'il était en moi, j'ai essayé, de l'atténuer, de la faire cesser. Mais je ne veux pas, au terme de mes jours, m' y associer, y coopérer. Je ne veux pas aider l'Eglise à perdre les nations catholiques, ni à se perdre elle-même, en s'aliénant ce qui lui reste de fidèles dans le monde civilisé."

The comments on the separation of Church and State in France will be read with peculiar interest. The action of the Vatican, in M. Loisy's judgment, would not have been tolerated by the most Catholic of governments under the old régime.

> "On finira par comprendre que les décisions pontificales n'ont pas été dictées par l'intérêt véritable de la religion, mais par l'intérêt, très mal compris d'ailleurs, de la papauté politique. Je souhaite me tromper, mais il est à craindre que l'Eglise de France ne se relève jamais de la condition infirme, équivoque, tourmentée, où Pie X. vient de la jeter, et que la crise actuelle n'annonce la fin très prochaine du catholicisme parmi nous. Et ce n'est pas l'Etat, ce ne sont pas les Evêques, si ce n'est par leur obéissance au Pape, qui auront amené ce triste résultat: c'est l'absolutisme romain qui, pour sauver ses prétentions, aura perdu ce qui restait de l'Eglise où brillerent saint Bernard, saint Louis, et Fénelon."

Of the larger question of the future of Catholicism M. Loisy has little to say. A reaction, he believes, is impossible: beyond this who can go? But as the whole policy of the Papacy is based on the hope of such a reaction, the prospect is gloomy. An English Catholic novelist describes the Roman Church as reduced in the course of a generation or two to the Pope and a handful of adherents in a Syrian village. These things are an allegory; but his prophecy may be nearer the truth than he knows.

---

* "Quelques lettres, sur des questions actuelles et sur des événements récents." Par Alfred Loisy. 3fr.
Chez l'auteur. Ceffonds, près Montier-en-Der, Haute Marne.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

MODERN EGYPT

BY THE

By the EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait and Map. Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

Athenæum.—"A book which all students of contemporary statesmanship, and still more all who have followed the marvellous regeneration of Egypt under Lord Cromer's direction, will read with eagerness."

Punch.—"Lord Cromer, writing as well as he works, has contributed to history one of the most important chapters added during the present generation."

Black and White.—"A work which is destined to be a classic while the English tongue is spoken and Egypt and Britain have places upon the map. . . . It is not too much to say that as a contribution to the literature of the world it is fit to be placed with the greatest works of the great historians."

MR SIDNEY LOW in the Standard.—"The book is not only absorbing in its interest, but it is a contribution to contemporary history of the highest importance. . . . To those who want to know how modern Egypt came into being, and to those who would learn what modern Egypt is, the book is invaluable. It may be supplemented; it cannot be superseded."

Westminster Gazette.—"A fascinating book—a book through which the central stream of narrative runs broad and clear, and in which our guide is no mere historian piecing together the records of others, but himself the chief actor in the scenes that he describes."

MR. SPENSER WILKINSON in the Morning Post.—"Stands almost alone in literature. . . . Of absorbing interest. It tells from beginning to end a story which is perhaps the most dramatic that has passed before the eyes of Englishmen now in middle life."

THE STORY OF THE GUIDES.

By Col. G. J. YOUNGHUSBAND, C.B. With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Recounts the most notable achievements of the famous Indian Regiment from its foundation by Lawrence and Lumsden in 1846 to the Malakand Expedition of 1897.

GENERAL HISTORY OF WESTERN NATIONS

From 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D.

By EMIL REICH, Doctor Juris, Author of "New Student's Atlas of English History," &c. Part I. ANTIQUITY. Vols. I. and II. 8vo, 15s. net.

The two volumes treat (1) of the method of history; (2) of the great inland empires of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, the Hittites, &c.; (3) of the border nations called the Hebrews, the Phœnicians, and the Archaic Hellenes; (4) the historic Greeks; (5) the Romans.

ATLAS ANTIQUUS.

In forty-eight Original Graphic Maps, with Elaborate Text to each Map, and full Index. By Dr. EMIL REICH. Crown 4to, 10s. net.

MACMILLAN'S GUIDE to Greece, the Archipelago, Constantinople, the Coasts of Asia Minor, Crete, and Cyprus, being a New and Thoroughly Revised Edition of the Guide to the Eastern Mediterranean. With 33 Maps and Plans. Globe 8vo, 9s. net.

[Next Week.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN HAMPSHIRE.

By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. CONNOR. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN.

With Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3s. 6d. Or Limp Leather, 5s. net.

[Globe Library.

LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN.

By JOHN MORLEY. 2 vols. Globe 8vo, 8s. net.

[Eversley Series.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS

THE CHILDREN'S EASTER BOOK.

NOW READY. Crown 4to, 2s, 6d. net.

EASTER EGGS:

An Easter Idyll for Children.

By CHRISTOPH VON SCHMID, with many Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White, by

Miss M. V. WHEELHOUSE, and specially-designed Title and End Papers.

"Christoph von Schmid's account of the origin of Easter Eggs makes a very charming tale, and, in its present guise, embellished with exquisite full-page coloured illustrations, it is as attractive an Easter gift-book as can well be imagined."
—Observer.

Prospectus and Specimen Plate on application.

NEW WORKS BY ABBOT GASQUET, D.D.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net each.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE BLACK DEATH IN 1348 & 1349. New and Revised Edition.

"By far the most interesting and exhaustive record to be found of this most appalling visitation."—Morning Post.

THE LAST ABBOT OF GLASTONBURY, and other Essays. Illustrated.

IN THE PRESS.

THE OLD ENGLISH BIBLE, and other Essays.

Prospectus on application.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

DECORATIVE HERALDRY. A Practical Handbook of its Artistic Treatment. By G. W. EVE With about 200 Illustrations. New and Revised Edition.

"He treats his subject with a width as well as a depth of knowledge that renders this volume amongst all modern writings the treatise on heraldry par excellence for artists."
—Magazine of Art.

Prospectus on Application.

GOETHE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. ("Dichtung und Wahrheit.") Revised Translations by M. STEELE-SMITH, Head Lecturer in Modern Languages at Newnham College, Cambridge. With an Introduction and Bibliography by KARL BREUL, Littt.D., Ph.D. 2 Vols., fcap 8vo., cloth, 2s. net.; limp leather, 3s. net. (The York Library.)

[Ready Wednesday next.

EASTER ON THE CONTINENT.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CITIES AND SIGHTS OF SPAIN. A Handbook for Tourists. By E. MAIN (MRS. LE BLOND), Author of 'The High Alps in Winter.' With 56 Illustrations and a Plan of a Tour in Spain.

"A clever and artistic contribution to a country which has been too much neglected since Don Quixote's days. Her 214 pages of clear type are bound in a form that any traveller can put in his pocket, and will consider cheap at five shillings. There is an index, and an excellent map of a suggested journey. The hints on how to get about and what to do are extremely valuable."—St. James's Gazette.

Prospectus on application.

Fcap. 8vo, 2s. net.

ROMAN PICTURE GALLERIES. A Guide and Handbook to all the Picture Galleries in the Eternal City. By ALICE ROBERTSON.

THE ART GALLERIES OF EUROPE.

With numerous Full-page Illustrations and a Plan. Each in One Vol. Large cr. 8vo, 6s. net.

THE ART OF THE VATICAN. By MARY KNIGHT POTTER.
THE ART OF THE PITTI PALACE. By JULIA DE W. ADDISON
THE ART OF THE VENICE ACADEMY. By MARY KNIGHT POTTER.
THE ART OF THE LOUVRE. By MARY KNIGHT POTTER.
THE ART OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY. By JULIA DE W. ADDISON.
THE ART OF THE DRESDEN GALLERY. By JULIA DE W. ADDISON.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

BELL'S HANDBOOKS TO CONTINENTAL CHURCHES

Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net. each.

Chartres. | Amiens. | Mont St. Michel.
Rouen. | Paris (Notre Dame). | Bayeux.

Detailed and Illustrated List on application.

London:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

TWO STUDIES IN LIFE.*

The main reason for the increasing hold that fiction has over the masses is that it serves as an endless series of dissolving views of human nature. Town life is too busy and hurried for people to study their neighbours with the inquisitive watchfulness of country folk, and fiction is a natural substitute, which widens their field of vision indefinitely. The superior persons who deplore the supremacy of fiction to-day over other kinds of literature, have failed to recognise that there is nothing so subtly educative as a good novelist's skilful representation of life and character. Conduct and human relations, that is what the novelist is analysing and presenting to us all the time, whereas most branches of "serious" literature are concerned primarily with imparting information. "Let me write the people's ballads, and I care not who makes the laws," is a saying that our educationalists have failed to turn to account. They have poohpoohed the function of the novel, but fortunately the control of fiction, unlike that of our stage, has not yet fallen into the hands of "business" middlemen. This indirect educative function of fiction is illustrated by the majority of novels of insight, and almost any couple we may pick out may be classed as justly under the head of "educative" as under the head of "light reading," according to the disposition of the reader.

Mr. Archibald Marshall, for example, whose last novel "Many Junes," is not so happily conceived as his "Exton Manor," has some striking chapters that bear admirably on the national vice of snobbishness. Hugh Lechaleur, his hero, in youth loses his inheritance, Foyle Manor, his rightful career, and the society of his equals, through the rash speculations of his father, Admiral Lechaleur, who dies a broken-hearted bankrupt. Hugh is forced to enter the ranks of City clerks, and the author shows some psychological skill in showing us how in the course of many years, having missed that free development of his natural talents and social instincts which a life of leisure gives, his hero shrinks into the shell of a solitary middle-aged man, reticent and over grave. Mr. Marshall has, however, used too cramped a canvas to do justice to the whole perspective of his picture, and we confess that we find the gradual development of Hugh's mental isolation inadequately sketched. There is nothing more difficult to indicate than the subtle changes that a man's character undergoes between twenty and forty, and the author has got his foreshortening wrong. The fifty pages, however, of the novel, which deal with Hugh's relations with Mrs. Churton and her daughter Mabilia, are almost worthy of George Gissing. All the unworthy sacrifice of inner sincerity on the altar of snobbish pretence is exemplified by the figures of this modern mother and her daughter. The picture is plain and direct, but the spiritual deadness and commonness of this British matron is admirably expressed by the shades of her relations with her daughter Mabilia, whose happiness she is quite ready to mortgage to any man of family, like Hugh, who can claim to be actually a first cousin to Sir Richard and Lady Lechaleur of Wyse Hall. We need not trace the story. Hugh entangles himself with the Churtons, and, too late, discovers that he is in love with another woman. We think that there is false morality preached in Hugh's surrender of the girl Margaret Paston to the unreal claims upon him of the woman he does not love, Mabilia Churton, but the point we wish to dwell on is that Mr. Marshall's novel, in its strength as in its weakness, is educative in the best sense. It forces the reader to decide for himself the delicate points of conduct that it raises, and in this respect it has a direct influence on its readers' heart and conscience, a personal influence which the most weighty volumes of biography, history, travel, &c., can exercise only in a far more abstract form.

Not less educative is the effect of Mr. Fletcher's "Mothers in Israel" on the reader's mind. The theme of the novel, briefly stated, is the vice of uncharitableness and evil speaking so rampant in an ordinary agricultural parish. The narrowness and pettiness of the provincial outlook are both expressed and relieved by the intense curiosity of village folk, farming folk, and even the squire's wife, and the Vicar's better-half, concerning their neighbours' doings. It is a fact, frequently to be met with in rural parishes, that the more independent-minded and original people gravitate to the big towns, to escape the prying comments and uncharitable judgments of Little Peddlington.

The "Mothers in Israel" in Mr. Fletcher's story are Mrs. Hancock and Mrs. Gill, the bustling, shrewd, and self-righteous wives of two substantial Yorkshire farmers. These two ladies practically rule, between them, the parish of Applemarney, and so keen is their struggle for precedence, that their cautious spouses have to come to a secret agreement and put their heads together when anything fresh is on the tapis. There is a pleasant fresh flavour about all Mr. Fletcher's descriptions of Yorkshire ways and habits of life, and the rugged straightforwardness of the people which makes them so likeable is well contrasted with their prosaic mind and their terrible respect for "folk as has brass o' their own." Young Mr. Warwick, the London clergyman who comes to Applemarney, has "brass o' his own," and his cool independence soon brings him into conflict with Mrs. Hancock and Mrs. Gill. He has the audacity to fall in love with Miss May, the village schoolmistress, and the Hancock and Gill factions unite for the purpose of driving the offending lovers out of the district. Slander is the weapon chosen, but fortune favours Warwick and Miss May. A passage typical of Mr. Fletcher's mastery of the Yorkshire bluntness of thought and speech may be cited from the conversation of Warwick's old housekeeper, Elizabeth Wright:—

> "Well, I'll give you a little bit o' good advice, seeing 'at ye look so young and innocent. Ye mun mind some o' these here lasses i' t' place, or else they'll wed ye afore ye know wheer ye are. Now, there's Mestur and Mistress Gill's dowter—Maud Mary they call her—shoo's just come back fro' boardin'-school, and can play on t' pianny, and what not; shoo's none a foul-looking lass, an' t' Gills would none be sorry to see her wed. Then theer's Mestur and Mistress Hancock's dowter—her name's Ruth—shoo's at what they call a marriageable age, and a varry nice young woman shoo is, an' all, but homely like. I lay t' Hancocks 'ud none object to her wedding a likely young feller, specially if he wor i' t' ministry, like yoursen. An theer's that theer little school-teacher, Miss May—Little Sunshine, as our Joa calls her—shoo's on the look-out for a man as keen as ever I seed a lass to be—I lay you've nobbut to say the word i' that quarter. I could ha' wished 'at ye'd been an owder, steadier sort like; there's some sad pitfalls for a good-looking young man i' this village, and young women's none but flighty, when all's said and done. I ha' no patience wi' 'em. I'm sure I never wanted to ha' nowt to do wi' t' men."

It would be superfluous to point out that no treatise on morals or conduct could possibly give us the shades of Elizabeth's philosophy, and that it is just by this æsthetic pleasure that the author communicates to us that the moral of "Mothers in Israel" is driven home. What the moralists have always boggled at accepting is that pleasure is the great legitimate instrument through which Nature herself gets her creatures to do her bidding. Why then should the artist be looked upon askance by the over-superior person for employing the same means? The stupidity of this distrust of the stage and fiction, as educative forces, is well exemplified by the last generation's neglect of Meredith and exaltation of Ruskin and Carlyle. The two last were hailed as teachers and prophets, because they appealed to their generation in the form of serious and weighty essays, while Meredith was neglected till the young generation came into contact with his "novels." Let us hope, however, that this distrust of all art that is not avowedly packed with moral purpose will by and by be a thing of the past with the English people.

* "Many Junes." By Archibald Marshall. Methuen. 6s.
"Mothers in Israel." By J. S. Fletcher. John Murray. 6s.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

A volume called "A Mind that Found Itself," by Mr. C. W. Beers (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net), describing the personal experiences of an educated American, a Yale graduate, who, losing his "reason" for a time, became an inmate of several private and public asylums, claims a double interest, as a psychological document and as a humanitarian appeal. In our judgment Professor William James, two commendatory letters from whom are used as an Introduction, overrates the

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN THADEUS DELANE,

Editor of "The Times," 1841-1877. Containing hitherto unpublished Letters of Palmerston, Disraeli, and other Statesmen, and numerous Anecdotes of the Court and London Society in the Reign of Queen Victoria. By his Nephew, ARTHUR IRWIN DASENT. With Portraits and other Illustrations. 2 Vols. Demy 8vo, 32s. net. [Ready immediately.

CATHERINE OF BRAGANÇA,

Infanta of Portugal and Queen Consort of England. By LILLIAS CAMPBELL DAVIDSON. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

This is a life not merely of Queen Catherine, but also of Charles II. from the Restoration to his death, and a history of his Court, of its intrigues and cabals, of the reigning favourites, and of their baneful influence. The Duchess of Cleveland, Nell Gwynn, the Duchess of Portsmouth, Frances Stuart, and the rest are all pourtrayed. The true story of Catherine of Braganca is here told from original sources. Over eighty letters in her own hand, never before given to the public, afford most interesting glimpses into the private life and character of the much injured Queen.

FROM PEKING TO SIKHIM.

By COUNT DE LESDAIN. With Maps and Illustrations based on the Author's Surveys and Photographs. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

This is the record of a remarkable journey, all the more remarkable in that it was carried out by a newly married couple. Several parts of their journey were through districts scarcely known to Europeans, and were performed under severe hardships.

THE TRUTH ABOUT PORT ARTHUR.

By Monsieur E. K. NOJINE, accredited Russian War Correspondent during the Siege. Translated and Abridged by Captain A. B. LINDSAY, Translator of "The Battle of Tsushima," &c. Edited by Major E. D. SWINTON, D.S.O. With a carefully prepared Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Ready immediately.

"The Truth about Port Arthur" caused a sensation in Russia last year. M. Nojine, the author, was the accredited Russian war correspondent in Port Arthur, and has been recently honoured by the Tsar in recognition of his services. The book is important to military men and students of the art of war, and it contains many secrets.

INDIAN PROBLEMS.

By S. M. MITRA. With an Introduction by Sir GEORGE BIRDWOOD, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., LL.D. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Ready immediately.

Mr. Mitra is distinguished amongst our Hindu fellow-subjects for his knowledge of India and as a loyalist. He has a thorough acquaintance with the whole history and system of our administration, and has lived and worked not only in his own country but also in the Nizam's territory. He disapproves of Congress methods, dearly appreciates the benefits derived from the British Raj, but at the same time is able to point out some of the reasons of the unpopularity of the English, and to suggest means for the removal of them.

THE PLEASANT LAND OF FRANCE.

By ROWLAND E. PROTHERO, M.V.O., Author of "The Psalms in Human Life," &c. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

These Essays deal with life in a provincial town in France; French farming, with special reference to the condition of peasant land-owners in the various districts; the curious and little-known story of French agrarian outrages which have anticipated the familiar features of land agitation in Ireland; a faggot of French folk-lore gathered in Touraine, Berri, Poitou, and Périgord; an interpretation of the life, times, and work of Francois Rabelais; a study of the Palace and Forest of Fountainebleau, and their associations with the most brilliant periods of French history; and a chapter on some modern French poets, including Théodore de Banville, Lecomte de Lisle, Sully Prudhomme, and Francois Coppée.

STUDIES in the HISTORY of VENICE.

By HORATIO F. BROWN, Author of "Life on the Lagoons,' Demy 8vo. 2 Vols. 18s. net.

"We have all read books on Venice, not a few of them mere book-making, but Mr. Brown's new book is a monument of great learning, pleasantly presented. One rises from it a wiser man—the one test of such volumes as these."—Sphere.

A New Novel by the Author of "A Lame Dog's Diary."

THREE MISS GRAEMES.

By S. MACNAUGHTAN. 6s.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE INTERNATIONAL

APRIL No. NOW READY. 1s. NET.

The Contents include the following, among other important articles—

THE CITIZEN, THE MUNICIPALITY, AND THE STATE. By PERCY ASHLEY.

SELF GOVERNMENT IN THE OVERSEAS DOMINIONS. By the Hon. B. R. WISE.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO. By NICOLA SALMERON.

UNIVERSITIES FOR THE PEOPLE. By the EDITOR.

THE EMANCIPATION OF WOMEN IN ISLAM. By PROF. A. VAMBERG.

THE CANADIAN ANTI-STRIKE LEGISLATION. By PROF. O. D. SKELTON.

NOTE.—A specimen copy of No. 1 of "THE INTERNATIONAL" will be sent free on receipt of 3d. for Postage.

Address—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

ORIENTAL CAMPAIGNS AND EUROPEAN FURLOUGHS.

The Autobiography of an Indian Mutiny Veteran. By Colonel EDWIN MAUDE, late H.M. 2nd (Leinster) Regiment. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

HISTORY OF IRELAND TO THE COMING OF HENRY II.

By ARTHUR UA CLERIGH, M.A., K.C. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

This volume is complete in itself. It is a record of Irish History from the earliest times to 1171.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE

(B.C. 29—A.D. 476). By H. STUART JONES, M.A. With Maps and many other illustrations. 5s.
A new volume in the "Story of The Nation" series.

T. FISHER UNWIN, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and

PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,
30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.
Specimens free on application.
PERCY L. PARKER.

psychological value. The numerous evidences of graphomania and of the survival of elation during the period of the preparation of this work, though by no means nullifying its worth as a veracious narrative of facts, make that value very difficult to estimate. In other words, we cannot tell how far the temporary state of disease with its persistent delusions may have affected the impressions of fact, and so, through the memory, the records of those facts: nor can we feel sure that these abnormal conditions, many of them differing in degree, not in kind, from the normal, have so entirely passed away as to enable the writer to sift fact from fancy in his narrative, or to avoid that tendency to heighten interesting experiences which is common to most men who have had an unusual record. At the same time we agree that many of the inner incidents carry their own verification, and that so subtle an observer of subjective conditions does well to place his observations in permanent form. Accepting his account of the treatment of the insane as correct (and there is nothing unreasonable in this acceptance) we hold that his plea for a more rational treatment and for a better public control over asylums is essentially sound. We doubt not that physical restraints, mechanical methods of routine, and all the dehumanising influences of institutional life are as noxious in the case of the insane as in that of criminals. The vice is in essence the same, the fatuous attempt to apply mechanical remedies to delicate psychical diseases. The other defect to which Mr. Beers devotes so much attention, the abuses of injustice and of actual physical violence which spring up when coarse untrained men and women became warders or nurses, is quite as serious. The problem "quis custodiet custodes ipsos" nowhere presents itself in graver form than in asylums, prisons, poorhouses, and other institutions, where the detailed conduct of affairs is of necessity left to authorities upon the spot, and where effective exposure of wrongs must always be difficult. Mr. Beers is right in insisting that two chief reforms are necessary; first to substitute well-chosen, trained, and properly-paid persons for the work of caring for the insane; secondly, to organise a wholesome, watchful public opinion which shall operate, through inspection and through the informal action of the medical profession, in substituting more humane and more reasonable modes of treatment. Much stupidity and much positive cruelty still survive not only in America but in this country in the treatment of the insane.

* * *

In "The Thirteen Colonies of North America" (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net), Mr. Reginald W. Jeffery deals with an instructive section of our Colonial history. Though these colonies now form the Atlantic seaboard of the United States, their fortunes from Raleigh's abortive expedition to Virginia in 1585 to the capture of Montreal by Amherst, Haviland, and Murray in 1760, belong to British history. Mr. Jeffery's spirited narrative begins by a concise account of the English voyages to North America in the sixteenth century. This is followed by a series of chapters on the separate colonies, the adventures of the early pioneers being described as far as possible in the words of contemporary writers. The northern colonies, with their yeomen and trader settlers, naturally came to the front much more rapidly than did Maryland and the Carolinas, which, besides being handicapped in some degree by Locke's unworkable Fundamental Constitutions, suffered from the hostility of Virginia and from recurring disputes and insurrections. In spite of religious troubles Massachusetts enjoyed great prosperity from the very first, and in 1643 united with New Haven, Plymouth, and Connecticut in forming the New England Confederacy, the first United States of North America. The struggle with the Dutch for the New Netherland Settlement forms an interesting episode, though scarcely less so is the early history of the Quaker settlements of Delaware and Pennsylvania. The foundation of Georgia by Oglethorpe brings this section of the book to a conclusion. Two useful chapters are given to a discussion of the social and economic history of the colonies, and Mr. Jeffery ends by a fine description of the long conflict with France, which culminated in the capture of Quebec and Montreal.

* * *

Although we have already had several books in which Mr. Meredith's work has been interpreted and appreciated, there was room for Mr. Richard H. P. Curle's fresh and well-balanced study, "Aspects of George Meredith" (Routledge, 6s.). Mr. Meredith's exact position in the history and genius of literature is, as Mr. Curle says, a question that cannot be settled till many years have passed. At the same time every real addition to the body of criticism that has grown up round the novels and poems brings us a step towards that final estimate. Mr. Curle describes his book as an interpretation, and declares that the last thing it could properly be called is a criticism. This is true, if we use the word in a narrow sense, but in the broader sense of the word it is undoubtedly criticism, and criticism of the type that is most needed in the case of a writer like Mr. Meredith. It owes much to Mr. Trevelyan's brilliant volume, but while in Mr. Trevelyan's book it is the poet and the philosopher who occupies the foremost place, Mr. Curle, while not neglecting this aspect, also brings prominently forward the purely artistic side of Mr. Meredith's achievement. On the other hand, the book differs from Mrs. Sturge Henderson's recent volume in that the novels are not subjected to a detailed examination. We are given instead a number of chapters in which Mr. Meredith's view of nature, of love, death, the comic spirit, his insight into character, his sense of humour, and so forth, are discussed and explained. Mr. Curle's style is not always happy, but on the whole his book is marked by real critical insight and suggestion. Every lover of Mr. Meredith's work will read it with pleasure, and it can be heartily recommended to those who feel the need of guidance through the mazes of the Meredithian philosophy.

* * *

A very seasonable volume for young children is "Easter Eggs" (George Bell, 2s. 6d. net), translated from the German of Christopher Von Schmid, and illustrated in line and colour by M. V. Wheelhouse. The Bavarian author of this and many other pretty stories for the young, lived during the first half of the nineteenth century, and enjoyed a popularity that is still preserved in his native land. "Easter Eggs" is romance with a moral and religious flavour. It tells of a valley inhabited mostly by charcoal-burners, to which comes a mysterious and sorrowful lady with her two children and an old attendant. She seeks and easily obtains the peasants' hospitality, and in return, contrives to introduce a hen-coop full of birds, for their edification and instruction. Her gift to the children of coloured Easter eggs comes at the proper season, and the rest of the story relates how one of these eggs is the means of restoring to the beautiful Lady Bountiful the knightly husband whose absence had brought sorrow and exile upon her. The atmosphere of the tale is fragrant and wholesome, and Miss Wheelhouse's dainty illustrations in colour are reproduced excellently.

* * *

Mr. William Archer and Professor Herford are to be congratulated on the completion of their "Copyright Edition of Ibsen, with the issue of Volume I., containing "Lady Inger of Osstrat," "The Feast of Solhoug," and "Love's Comedy" (Heinemann, 4s.). The edition runs to eleven volumes, and is far the best form in which Ibsen's works are accessible to English readers. Ibsen has practically transformed the European stage-craft of the later nineteenth century, and Mr. Archer's part in introducing him to the English world of art and the drama, represents one of the great modern feats of our scholarship. Professor Herford's translation of "Brand" is, in our view, one of the most admirable in the language. No lover and student of Ibsen can afford to leave this edition out of his library.

* * *

A cheaper edition of Mr. Benjamin Kidd's "Principles of Western Civilisation" (Macmillan, 5s. net) has been issued. Mr. Kidd has written a new Introduction, in which he gives his reasons for not having replied before to his critics. He points out that he was one of the first to maintain that the view held by Western peoples of the intellectual superiority of their own races, when compared with other races in the world, rested upon no adequate foundation, and he shows that his theory is supported by the recent emergence of Japan as one of the great military powers of the world. Mr. Kidd's suggestive examination of the laws of progress in organised societies has been the theme of much discussion, so that the publication of his book in this cheaper form will be welcomed.

APRIL ISSUE 300pp., of Financial Review of Reviews

CONTAINS—

The Case for Free Trade.

By LORD AVEBURY, P.C.

INDIA'S FINANCIAL HANDICAP.

By SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE, K.C.I.E.

HOW TO SIMPLIFY AN INVESTOR'S ACCOUNTS. By the Editor of the "Accountant."

Safeguarding Invested Capital.

By H. LOWENFELD.

One of the main objects of the Review is to point out to investors how their own personal interest can be secured by adopting sound financial methods in the management of investments, and this article indicates some of the chief dangers which beset the investor.

Other Contributions by Lord Boston, Sir R. Hamilton Lang, W. H. Mallock, Dr. Paton, Arnold White, &c.

ONE SHILLING. 2, WATERLOO PLACE, LONDON, S.W.

NOW READY.

The April "BOOK MONTHLY"

6d. net.

It contains a new feature, which should be useful to many people—namely, a list of the Contents of the April Reviews and Magazines.

It also contains an article in which Mrs. Clayton Glyn, the author of "The Visits of Elizabeth," gives her impressions of America.

Finally, the April BOOK MONTHLY has all the book news and many beautiful illustrations.

Publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.,

Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will be glad to send a specimen copy of the magazine free of cost.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—

Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

OUR LAND

The APRIL NUMBER is now ready at all Bookstalls and Newsagents, price 3d. net.

CONTENTS.

Municipalities.
Agricultural Co-operation: The Depot.—I.
The Management of Farms. By W. M. Tod, M.A.
Rural Housing and Sanitation.—III. By a Civil Engineer.
The Farmer and the School.
Cow Clubs and Pig Clubs. By W. L. Charleton.
The Poultry Industry.
Wheat.
The New Domesday Book.

NOTES:
County Councils and Housing.
The Lighting of Villages.
Milk Records.
The Arrangement of Buildings.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

Insurance.

THEATRE RISKS.

Theatrical managers, led by the astute Mr. Stanley Boulter, have been much concerned of late concerning the premiums they pay for fire insurance to the tariff companies. They have even gone the length of fathering the Theatres Mutual Insurance Company, which with all the boldness and inexperience of youth, has come to the rescue in this particular class of fire hazard. They have rushed "where angels fear to tread." Undoubtedly this class of risk, through the action of the London County Council and other local authorities begotten of the appalling loss of life in past years, have yielded later a lighter loss ratio. That same past is not insufficiently ancient history to call for examples or details. Experience imperatively demanded public attention and remedy, and got it. The fire offices awaited the result, anxious to see whether remedies for the protection of life went on all fours with those which the more prosaic mind might suggest as precautions against the spread of fire. The two views did not necessarily run alongside. It seemed, however, proved that the remedies had effected a substantial improvement, and thereupon the fire offices, of their own accord, hardly two years ago, made a considerable reduction in the rates hitherto existing for theatrical and music-hall risks.

It is obvious that the use of the stage proper presents a great variety of risks, and that that variety is met by differential rating. Assuming that the construction and surroundings of the theatre are alike, the representation of a modern society or drawing-room comedy has fewer elements of fire risk than those plays where there are big "sets," involving the use of complicated machinery and ever-changing and elaborate scenery, or even pantomimes where goblins and fairies are surrounded with displays of fire or light, all of which have to be reckoned with by the fire underwriter. The rate fixed marks his view of the risk, and it can be imagined that they differentiate almost as much as the views of man in general. Their assessment may not be perfect, but as they represent the collective experience of the oldest and most reliable insurance offices, they afford more satisfactory data than the guesses of new ventures, or even the experience of theatrical managers themselves. As these gentlemen must be presumed to know their own special business best, they must give the fire offices credit for like common sense.

Following hard upon a recent deputation comprising such notable actor-managers as Sir Charles Wyndham, Mr. Beerbohm Tree, Mr. George Alexander, and Mr. Cyril Maude to an important representative meeting of leading insurance men, when, it is understood, the hardships of even the reduced rating for theatres were urged, comes a powerful object lesson in the total destruction of the stage portion of Drury Lane theatre, as well as serious fires at Windsor and Leicester theatres. The fire waste at Drury Lane theatre, repeating its disastrous experience of 1672 and 1809, is alone estimated at £20,000, and with £2,500 at Windsor and £2,000 at Leicester, make up an unpleasant total for the two months which have intervened since the deputation gave expression to their views. It is sufficient to point to Drury Lane stage alone, which has been described as "practically a fireproof chamber, armed with steel doors, steel staircases, fire resisting furnishings, and an asbestos curtain." Here every device the ingenuity of man can suggest have proved of little avail, and can be upset by a scene-shifter's pipe or defective electric installation. It is only fair to add that the fireproof curtain, as at the Theatre Royal, Windsor, sufficed to prevent the spread of the fire to the auditorium, and except for severe blistering of the decorated work round the proscenium by heat, practically no damage was done to the principal part of the theatre. It should also be stated that the fire waste was also materially checked from spreading to the dressing-rooms, paint-rooms, and large scenery stores which were shut off from the stage by metal-clad doors some twenty feet high. Foresight had certainly prevented a much larger total, but when it is remembered that the fire did not break out until the morning, that about 27 engines were working on the flames, and that, besides 160 men of the Fire Brigade, some 60 members of the Salvage Corps were in active requisition, it can be seen that a theatre fire, under the best conditions, when once it gets a hold, can prove a very serious loss. The Sun Fire Office carried an insurance of £75,000 on the building, being on the Duke of Bedford's estate, but it is a notable fact that the contents were covered in non-tariff ventures, of which the freshly-fledged Theatres Mutual Insurance Company had secured £3,000.

Before leaving the subject, which has a moral outside insurance circles, one cannot altogether refrain from referring to another aspect of the case. It is a further evidence of there being cycles of fires in theatre risks as well as in most other classes. These same cycles are self-evident to the fire underwriter, and also ever-recurring. But the reason for them passes his comprehension, the determining cause being delegated to that world of averages which no "twen-cent man" can compass or explain. To the lay mind such an idea would be laughed to scorn. But the indisputable fact remains.

The Week in the City.

Until Thursday no event of very great importance occurred in finance, but the Stock Markets were enlivened by an American see-saw. It seems there has been a fight between Mr. Harriman and Mr. Morgan as to whether the Erie railroad should be forced into the hands of a receiver, and in that case who should enjoy the lucrative task of "reorganisation." The line was "Morganised" years ago, and now it seems likely to be Harrimanised without the interposition of a receiver. But the uncertainty of the situation dominated Wall Street, and Eries, with most of the gambling counters, rushed up and then down, and then up again. On Thursday a wet blanket came upon the City in the shape of a German Imperial 4 per cent. loan for £12,500,000, and a Prussian 4 per cent. loan for £20,000,000. Whether the German credit system, which has for weeks and months been suffering from severe tension, will stand this added strain is doubtful. Anyhow, London is rather struck by the fact that the Kaiser has to come to our money market, cap in hand, to borrow money for his naval programme.

Bad Trade in the United States.

The position of manufacturers and workmen in the great towns and industrial districts of the United States is probably worse now than at any time since October, when the crisis began, or for many years past. The iron trade was the first to go, and furnaces were shut down with such rapidity and on so huge a scale that matters can hardly be worse. The cotton manufactures of the United States suffered less at first; but the mills both in the North and South are now faced with a most alarming crisis. Some are being closed, and the majority are curtailing their output by from 25 to 40 per cent. Even the hands who are fortunate enough to remain partially employed have to submit to reductions of 10 or 15 per cent. in their wages. I see that a fortnight ago, before adjourning its session at Fall River, Massachusetts, the Executive Council of the United Textile Workers of America passed the following resolution as to the reductions in wages proposed or recently made:

> "The action of the manufacturers in reducing wages at this time is premature, and the Council reaffirms its previously expressed opinion that curtailment in wages is not the best remedy for the present condition of this industry."

The Council also voted approval of the Bill for 54 hours for women and children now before the Massachusetts Legislature. The Secretary was instructed to write to Mr. D. Shackleton, advising him to impress upon mill hands in England the inadvisability of immigration to the United States during the present business depression.

Lucellum.

Flesh Reduction.

My Method.

WITHOUT DIETING OR DRUGS.

Those who will follow my advice, and do as I direct for only fifteen minutes per day for a few weeks, can rid themselves of all superfluous flesh. This statement is backed up by thousands of satisfied clients. The "Clease Method" is a reality, and the only natural means of reduction now before the public. It has stood the test of years, and to-day it is more popular than ever. I have no wish to appear sensational in my statement, or to make claims for the "Clease Method" that sound ridiculous. What I say I can prove conclusively to be the absolute truth.

If you are seriously desirous of reducing your weight, removing your superfluous tissue, and at the same time improve your health in any direction, increase your strength and possess a symmetrical body, then you will take up the "Clease Method" without delay. What I have done for others I can do for you.

I Speak Conservatively.

The testimony of hundreds of business and professional men of the highest standing verifies my statements, and I back up my claims by a positive guarantee to refund my entire fee if I fail to accomplish the results I promise.

Freedom from Sickness is not Health.

Don't think that you enjoy health just because you are not sick. Health is a comparative term, and there's as much difference between the real thing and the health of the average man as there is between sunlight and twilight.

Give me a few minutes a day and I will give you the health that makes living a joy, work a pleasure, and business a success. My elaborate and interesting book, "The Art of Physical Beauty," will be sent free if you ask for it. It is of absorbing interest, and well worth anyone's time. WRITE FOR IT TO-DAY.

F. MEREDITH CLEASE, Ph.L.D.

282, CLEASE BUILDING,

74, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TANGYE

OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

EXHIBITIONS.

FRANCO-BRITISH EXHIBITION, 1908.

SHEPHERD'S BUSH. MAY to OCTOBER.

THE GREATEST EXHIBITION EVER HELD IN LONDON.

Demonstrating to the World the Products and Resources of the British Empire, and of France and her Colonies.

His Majesty the King has expressed his warm approval of the Exhibition.

The DUKE OF ARGYLL, K.T., Honorary President.
The EARL OF DERBY, K.G., President.
Vice-Presidents.—The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Devonshire, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Earl Cadogan, Earl Cromer, Earl Egerton of Tatton, the Earl of Jersey, the Earl of Minto, Viscount Knutsford, Lord Avebury, Lord Rothschild, Lord Strathcona, Sir Ernest Cassel, and the Lord Mayor of London.

VISCOUNT SELBY, Chairman } Executive
SIR JOHN A. COCKBURN, Vice-Chairman } Committee.
LORD BLYTH, Chairman Organising Committee.
LORD WELBY, Chairman Finance Committee.
LORD DESBOROUGH, President Olympic Games and Chairman Sports Committee.
Commissioner-General: IMRE KIRALFY, Esq.
Chairmen of Group Committees:

Charles C. Allom, Esq.	Prof. W. Gowland.	Alfred Mond, Esq.
Sir Hugh Bell, Bart.	H. Percy Harris, Esq.	Sir Edward J. Poynter
The Earl of Bessborough	Henry E. Jones, Esq.	Lieut.-Col. D. Grain.
Sir Alexander Binnie.	Sir William Lee-Warner	T. Hurry Riches, Esq.
H. Cosmo Bonsor, Esq.	Sir Thomas J. Lipton, Bart.	Sir Boverton Redwood
Frank Debenham, Esq.		Sir Clifton Robinson.
Maurice Deacon, Esq.	Sir Norman Lockyer.	Sir C. E. Howard Vincent
James Dixon, Esq.	Sir William Mather.
Dr. Francis Elgar.	Sir Charles McLaren Bart.	The Lord Weardale.
Dr. R. T. Glazebrook.		Sir William H. White

Great Exhibition in London, 1851, 21 acres, 16 acres Buildings
International Exhibition, London, 1862, 23½ acres, 16½ acres Buildings
FRANCO-BRITISH EXHIBITION, 1908, 140 acres, over 40 acres Buildings

Four of the best British and French Military BANDS will perform daily.

The most novel and refined attractions ever presented in London will be placed in the Pleasure Gardens of the Exhibition.

SEASON TICKETS { for Ladies or Gentlemen, £1 1s. each. for Children under Twelve, 10s. 6d. each.

Now on sale at all the principal agencies and libraries. These Tickets will also admit on the Opening Day of the Exhibition, and to the dedication of the Stadium.

THE GARDEN CLUB.

In the Central Gardens.

Ladies as well as Gentlemen are eligible for Membership.
Subscription: Gentlemen, £3 3s.; Ladies, £2 2s.

Membership of this club includes admission to the Exhibition.

The ALLOTMENT of Exhibit SPACE in the various Exhibition Halls is now approaching completion.

CONCESSIONS for the erection of PAVILIONS in the various Gardens of the Exhibition, for the sale of Confectionery, Cigars, Cigarettes, and Tobacco, and numerous other Concessions, are now being concluded.

Exhibitors and Concessionaires desirous of securing the remaining available space should apply immediately to the Secretary.

EXCURSIONS from all parts of the UNITED KINGDOM and the CONTINENT are now being arranged.

Educational, Scientific, and other CONGRESSES and CONFERENCES will be held in the Congress Halls.

Full particulars on application to the Secretary, 56, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

THE OLYMPIC GAMES,

In which 22 Nations compete, will take place in the Great Stadium capable of holding over 100,000 people.

INTERNATIONAL AND NATIONAL SPORTS. ALL BRITISH CHAMPIONSHIPS.

OLYMPIC TRIALS.

Amateur Athletic Association.
National Cyclists' Union.
Auto-Cycle Union.
Amateur Fencing Association.
Amateur Swimming Association.
Royal Life-Saving Society.
National Wrestling Association.
London Private Fire Brigades.
National Physical Recreation Society.

Finchley, Polytechnic, Highgate, and Queen's Park Harriers, Essex Beagles, Amateur Swimming Club, and Zephyr Swimming Club, &c., &c., Sports Meeting, and many other Meetings, before and after the Olympic Games.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL,

Near the British Museum.

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL,

Opposite the British Museum.

Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements, at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses—
Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANSGATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

RUGBY SCHOOL.

THE EXAMINATION FOR SCHOLARSHIPS

Will Begin MONDAY, JUNE 1st.

Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been Opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters," Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD

(Via NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the { PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. / OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. / TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the

GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,

London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.;
City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.;
And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS WANTED.—£20 each offered. Guy Mannering, 1st edit., 3 vols. 1815, in boards uncut. Thackeray's Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48. Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols., Salisbury, 1766. Walton's Angler, 1653. Paradise Lost, 1667. Lamb's Shakespeare Tales, 2 vols., boards, 1827, 30/- each offered for. Scrope's Salmon Fishing, 1843. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Ireland's Napoleon, 4 vols., coloured plates. Jesse's George Selwyn, 4 vols., 1843. Books with inscriptions written inside by Carlyle, Meredith, Keats, Lamb, &c. All books with coloured plates by Ackerman, &c. Special list of wants free, high prices paid. Please let us know your wants. We can supply everything.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Experts, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.

[Bargain, Harmsworth's Encyclopœdia, 10 vols., 25/- cost £2 16s. net.]

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones. Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each).—Saint Jude's Depôt, Birmingham.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

THE DEARTH OF CONVERSIONS.

"Sick souls need not a Lecture on Medicine, but an Individual Prescription."

Earnest Christian Workers Should Read C. G. TRUMBULL'S New Book

TAKING MEN ALIVE.

Studies in the Principles and Practice of Individual Soul Winning.

Just Published. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"We do not want to use exaggerated words, but the volume is a fascinating one."—Life of Faith.

POCKET COMPANIONS.

THE QUIET MOMENTS SERIES.

New Issues. Bound in smooth sheepskin, fcap 8vo, 1s. 6d. each net.

A Series of little Books on great themes, veritable gems of devout and cultured thought, full of Evangelical fervour, yielding food for mind and heart, and "admirably suited for the quieter moments of our busy and hurrying day."

Meditations for Quiet Moments. By the Rev. J. H. Jowett, M.A.
Musings for Quiet Hours. By the Rev. G. S. Barrett, D.D.
The Way Into the Kingdom. By the Rev J. D. Jones, M.A., B.D.
The Gates of Life. By the Rev. H. Elvet Lewis.
Fruitful or Fruitless. By the Rev. Canon Hoare, M.A.
Methods of Soul Culture. By the Rev. J. A. Clapperton M.A.

THE ULTIMATE AUTHORITY.

CAN WE TRUST THE BIBLE?

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. CONTENTS:

Is the Bible Inspired? By the Rev. Hubert Brook, M.A.
Invulnerable Certainties. By the Rev. George Hanson, D.D.
Facts and "Facts." By the Rev. R. Sinker, D.D.
Discoveries Confirming the Old Testament. By the Rev. R. B. Girdlestone, M.A.
Deuteronomy and the Higher Criticism. By the Rev Matthew Leitch, D.Litt., D.D.
Are the Gospels True? By the Rev. Frank Ballard, M.A., B.Sc., D.D.

HOW TO GROW OLD GRACEFULLY.

THOUGHTS ON OLD AGE FROM MANY MINDS.

Selected and arranged by HESBA STRETTON, Author of "Jessica's First Prayer," &c. Large post 8vo, cloth gilt, deckled edges, 2s.

The Westminster Gazette says: "It is an interesting collection, made with care and taste, and though the passages selected are on the whole of a serious nature, there is also here and there the same sparkle of wit and humour which runs through all Hesba Stretton's own thoughtful work. This spirit of cheerful hope and courage is the leading idea in what is a stimulating and suggestive compilation."

The Manchester Guardian says: "It is a book which will be welcome to many of the older generation whose pleasure it has been to put before their children this authoress's unpretentious and charming tales."

SPRING-TIME BOOKS.

ADVENTURES IN BIRDLAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Home Life in Birdland," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," &c. With Coloured Frontispiece, 4 Photogravures, and 64 Plates, containing 100 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. The Text is embellished by 100 Pen Sketches by E. RICHMOND PATON, printed in monotint in the margins. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

The Guardian says: "Excellent illustrations and text in an alluring format make a delightful volume."
The Times says: "It is a pleasant book."
The Amateur Photographer says: "It is an ideal gift-book."
The Manchester Guardian says: "Every boy and every man who loves birds will be delighted with this book."

BY MEADOW, GROVE, AND STREAM.

An introduction to Nature study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With 2 folded Colour Plates and 171 Figures in black and white from Original drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Times says: "It is a serviceable book for the young and their teachers."
The Church Newspaper says: "It contains much valuable information, given in a delightful manner."
The Glasgow Herald says: "It is a thoroughly useful and genuinely interesting Nature book."
The Liverpool Post says: "It is full of interest and information."

POPULAR STORIES.

IAN MACLAREN'S "ST. JUDE'S."

With 10 full-page illustrations by HAROLD COPPING. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

The British Weekly says: "In literary power 'St. Jude's' is equal to the best of Dr. Watson's writings."
The Daily News says: "In this book there is that sense of the minutiæ of humour that has pleased thousands of readers."

Mrs. O. F. WALTON'S THE LOST CLUE.

By Mrs. O. F. WALTON, Author of "A Peep Behind the Scenes, &c., Illustrated. Cloth gilt, 6s.

The Methodist Recorder says: "It is a capital story, interesting from start to finish."
The British Weekly says: "It is a romance brimful of incident, written with cleverness and charm."
The Crown says: "'The Lost Clue' is cleverly written."

S. R. CROCKETT'S THE WHITE PLUMES OF NAVARRE.

A ROMANCE OF THE WARS OF RELIGION.

Illustrated. Cloth gilt, 6s.

The Scotsman says: "It is one of the most powerful and engrossing stories that have come from Mr. Crockett's prolific pen."
The Guardian says: "It is a story full of adventure and sentiment."
The Athenæum says: "The characterisation is in Mr. Crockett's best form."

AMY LE FEUVRE'S THE MENDER.

With 11 Illustrations by W. RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

The Christian says: "The story is a good one, bright and interesting throughout."
The Glasgow Herald says: "In 'The Mender' Miss Amy Le Feuvre is as good as ever."
The Churchman says: "It is a most readable story."

JOSEPH HOCKING'S THE CHARIOTS OF THE LORD.

With 15 page pictures by ADOLPH THIEDE. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Standard says: "'The Chariots of the Lord' is certainly one of the author's triumphs."
The Daily News says: "The first chapter grips the reader, and the interest is maintained to the end. The book is well written, the characters skilfully drawn, and the incidents are full of life and movement."

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, and 65, St. Paul's, LONDON, E.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 2.] SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
The Diary of the Week ...	33
Politics and Affairs:—
The Late Prime Minister ...	36
The New Prime Minister ...	37
The Use of the Lash	38
The Break-up of American Parties	39
Life and Letters:—
Easter in Seville...	40
The Complete Anarchist ...	41
The Ethiopian's Skin	42
Garden Primroses	43
The Boat Race	44
Sketches of Travel:—
"Los Peares, un Minuto!" By R. B. Cunninghame Graham	45
Fiscal Fallacies:—
II. The Single Trade Test. By J. A. H.	47
Letters from Abroad:—
Austrian Policy in the Balkans. By Joseph Redlich	48
The Drama:—
The New Shylock. By H. W. M.	49
Letters to the Editor:—
"Fiscal Fallacies." By J. A. H. and Frank Bowly	50
Tariff Reform and Motor Cars. By T. Palmer Newbould and G. G. Desmond...	51
"The Victory of Free Trade Finance." By "Cobdenite"	51
"The Simple Life." By "Home Counties"	51
Are Armaments Necessary? By Hugh Pennington ...	51
The Detection of Fire. By Frank Rowley	52
Protection and Public Plunder. By R. Shindler...	52
Hamburg. By D. M. Stevenson	52
Peckham and Mr. Stiggins. By C. J. Back	53
Women and the Suffrage. By A Woman Conservative and E. P.	53
Poetry:—
A Chancery Ward. By Valentine Barlow	53
The World of Books ...	54
Books to be Read	54
Reviews:—
Bonapartism	55
A Glimpse of Sin	56
A Fragrant Past	57
The Cambridge History of English Literature	57
The Manchester Ship Canal	58
Books in Brief	60
The Week in the City ...	64

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

We are glad to note that "The Times," following a long and honourable tradition of independence with regard to Royalty, has spoken with freedom on the King's absence in Southern France during the change of Government. Such an incident seems more in consonance with the custom of the Angevin Kings than with the House of Hanover, and many must feel that it involves a grave slight on constitutional tradition. British Ministers are Ministers of the Crown, they are appointed by the Monarch, and they kiss hands on appointment. Already it has been necessary for the new Prime Minister to interrupt the sitting of Parliament for over a week, to suspend the most vital business of the session, to lose days when hours were precious, and to leave the great departments of the State with only nominal heads. Such a dislocation has no parallel in our politics, and, we believe, is equally distasteful to both constitutional parties. Had the King been present in England, the new Cabinet might have been reconstructed, and Parliament might have proceeded, with only the briefest interval, with its unusually heavy duties. Both the King and the Prime Minister have thus been deprived of the advantage of communication with friends, advisers, or colleagues at a time when, as everybody knows, such communications are hourly necessary. The country is glad to know that the King's absence is unconnected with his health. But it is still more pleased to hear of his return to London, and that such an unheard-of expedient as the holding of a Council in Paris has been abandoned. The frequent and prolonged absences of the Monarch from this country recall the days of the early Georges rather than of Victoria, but no one anticipated that they would be permitted to delay the solution of a Constitutional crisis.

* * *

The event of the week has been the resignation of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Asquith's succession as Prime Minister. Sir Henry's action has, unhappily, long been foreseen. Mr. Asquith, in announcing it to the House of Commons on Monday, said, with truth, that no man ever laid down the highest public office "more universally or more deservedly beloved." Lord Ripon added his tribute to the ex-Premier's "unrivalled hold" on the House of Commons, which was the secret both of his power as a Minister and of the fact that so unprecedented and heterogeneous a majority has shown little or no signs of fissure. On Monday night, after an adjournment of the Commons till Tuesday, Mr. Asquith left for Biarritz, and on Wednesday kissed hands on his appointment as Prime Minister. His succession has been accepted by all sections of the Liberal Party, though Mr. Keir Hardie has criticised it, and the tone of the Nationalist Press is cold, Mr. Redmond taking occasion on Monday to emphasise his predecessor's attachment to the Home Rule cause. We may mention, in illustration of this attachment, that at an earlier stage of his illness Sir Henry was with difficulty dissuaded from rising from his sick bed and speaking, at the risk of his life, to the Home Rule resolution on the day for which it was originally fixed.

* * *

The composition of the new Ministry is at present matter for conjecture. But we believe that the main features of the coming combination represent an agreement amongst leading statesmen in the old Cabinet as to the balance of forces to be maintained in the new, and that it may be taken for granted that neither the Irish nor the general policy of the Administration will differ in any material respect from that of its predecessor. It would, of course, have been impossible to place all the chief posts in the Cabinet in the hands of members of the Liberal League. The general character of the changes will probably be twofold. They will involve the displacement or transference of one or two of the older or less successful members of the old Cabinet and the infusion of newer blood. We believe that they will be followed by a redistribution of the powers and duties of the great interior departments, such as the Home Office, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade, and that the steady and permanent forces in Liberalism will not be passed over or slighted.

It is expected that the personnel of the new Government will be somewhat as follows:—

Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury	Mr. Asquith.
Lord Chancellor	Lord Loreburn.
Chancellor of the Exchequer	Mr. Lloyd George.
Foreign Secretary	Sir Edward Grey.
Indian Secretary	Mr. Morley. (with a peerage).
Colonial Secretary	Lord Crewe.
War Secretary	Mr. Haldane.
Home Secretary	Mr. Gladstone.
First Lord of the Admiralty	Mr. McKenna.
President of the Board of Trade ...	Mr. Churchill.
President of the Local Government Board	Mr. Burns.
Postmaster-General	Mr. Buxton
Lord President of the Council ...	Lord Tweedmouth.
Secretary for Ireland	Mr. Birrell.
Secretary for Education	Mr. Runciman.
First Commissioner of Works ...	Mr. Harcourt.
Chancellor of the Duchy	Sir Henry Fowler (with a peerage).
Lord Privy Seal	Lord Elgin.
Secretary for Scotland	Mr. Sinclair.
Minister for Agriculture	Lord Carrington.

It will be surprising if so able a Minister as Mr. Harcourt remains in his old position. Lord Elgin's retention appears to be doubtful. Mr. Morley receives no fresh distinction through his peerage, but confers one on the House of which he will in future be a member.

* * *

The Macedonian question continues deeply to stir the diplomatic world. The French Foreign Minister, M. Pichon, perhaps the least progressive member of M. Clemenceau's Administration, sharply rebuked by M. de Pressensé for his opposition to Sir Edward Grey's policy, has replied that France could not support it because it was "isolated." But France has a strong body of politicians friendly to reform in the Balkan States, and they may be expected to move public opinion in its behalf. M. Pichon was forced to pledge himself to the Russian proposals. Meanwhile, the countries most closely affected are moving. In Sofia there has been a demonstration in support of the Grey programme by 5,000 Macedonian emigrants, who passed resolutions gratefully recording the revival of active British policy in the Near East. The White Paper published on Tuesday exhibits the Foreign Minister's attempt to establish a basis for joint action by Great Britain and Russia. This is made difficult by the inadequacy of the Russian proposals on finance. Sir Edward Grey would make the civil needs of Macedonia the first charge on the revenues, and hand over the balance to the Porte for the maintenance of its garrison. He also threatens by withdrawing British consent to the 3 per cent. increase in the Customs duties to compel it to pay the £300,000 deficit which it promised to make good. He accedes to the Russian desire to make Hilmi Pasha (whose record is doubtful) the Inspector-General, but only on condition of his independence of the Porte. The weak point of the British case is the lack of means to restrain the bands; but the demonstration in Sofia is hopeful.

* * *

The "Morning Post" has published the text of the Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty which now awaits ratification. It is to be a five years' Convention, of a limited character. Four subjects are expressly excluded, questions of "vital interests," of "honour," of "independence," and those affecting third parties. Other questions are excluded in a note by Mr. Bryce. The Convention will also require special agreements between the two parties, defining the procedure and the powers of the arbitrating tribunal, and even these agreements will be without force until confirmed by an exchange of notes. As a compliment to Canada, Great Britain publicly announces that she will consult a self-governing Dominion of the Empire when its interests are concerned. This is caution indeed.

* * *

The Portuguese elections took place on Sunday, and the results were as previously arranged by the Government. The Monarchist coalition got the 138 seats it had allotted itself and the Opposition the remaining seventeen which had been allotted to it. The Republicans took their allowance of five seats—four in Lisbon and one in Beja. A fair amount of shooting was done in Lisbon, but the elections were "made," for the most part, without the use of ball cartridge. The Ministry, which was going to reform the rotten system of government, has adopted the electoral methods of its predecessors. It was in a dilemma. A free election would certainly have resulted in a Republican majority, and the hands of a Republican majority could not have been kept off the Monarchy unless a programme of genuine reform were laid before it. The Ministry has escaped from the dilemma by seeing that the Republicans were kept out of Parliament. That was very simple, only the prestige of the Monarchy has not benefited. The Republicans expect their Republic within a twelvemonth. They may or may not be too sanguine, but the elections have not damaged their prospects.

* * *

M. Jaures on Monday utilised the approach of the municipal elections as the occasion for moving a vote of censure on the Government, on the ground that it was making no serious attempt to realise its programme of reforms, and was chiefly anxious to gain the support of the enemies of these reforms. The motion was rejected by 442 votes to 80, and in its place a motion was carried calling upon the Government to push forward its reforms, and to rely only upon the Republicans of the Left. Despite the voting, the day was a very bad one for the Ministry. M. Jaurès' speech had the sympathy of many Radical Socialists, and M. Dubief, the leader of that party, declared that "a wind of uneasiness and impatience was passing across the country," and that everyone was asking whether the Government was really doing its best, and whether it was not compromising the Republican Left by association with the Conservatives. The motion which the Government accepted was really an ultimatum, and unless M. Clemenceau reverses the course he has been following for many months his further tenure of office will not be long.

* * *

President Roosevelt seems to think that all ills can be cured by eloquence and impulse. He has now addressed a message to Congress calling for legislation to suppress anarchism. He favours the seizure, through the Post Office, of Anarchist periodicals, on the ground that it is a crime under the common law to circulate literature advocating murder, arson, and treason. These papers he would exclude from the Federal mails, instead of leaving them to be dealt with by State action. On the advice of his Attorney-General, he proposes to take the strong step of prohibiting their circulation. This is rather close to government by ukase.

The Moderate chairman of the London County Council Finance Committee found himself in an awkward situation last Tuesday. He had to face the Council with a largely increased expenditure and an increased rate, in spite of the fact that his party was returned to power upon the strength of emphatic promises to reduce both. The temporary rate reduction of last year was due to substantial balances that were inherited by the Moderates from their predecessors. The increase this year would have been more than twopence in the pound instead of a penny but for the fortunate circumstance that a considerable proportion of these accumulations is still available. The estimated expenditure is more than ten and a-half millions. The most satisfactory feature of the statement was the disclosure that Progressive predictions concerning tramway profits are being fulfilled. Last year's profits are estimated to reach £66,547, and next year's £110,883. The Moderates propose to allocate the whole of these sums to the Renewals Reserve Fund. But even this provision will be insufficient, according to the recent report of Messrs. Peat & Pixley, the commercial auditors. It is clear that the report, having served its party purpose, is to be conveniently forgotten, together with the promises of lower rates to which the party now in office owe much of their success at the polls. The Moderates are spending more money than the Progressives spent, and they are giving London less for it. They are starving the schools; they have wrecked the Works Department; they refuse to build working-class dwellings and to construct new tramways. Mr. Hayes Fisher's Budget condemns his party as bad administrators and convicts them as spurious economists.

* * *

The Reichstag on Wednesday passed the third reading of the new Associations Bill. The law of association and public meeting in Germany has, up till now, varied from State to State: in the South it has been fairly Liberal, elsewhere reactionary. The new Bill, which makes provision for the whole Empire, marks, but for one exception, a real advance. The exception is the 7th clause. In its original form, the 7th clause, which is aimed against the Poles, required that the proceedings at public meetings should be conducted in German. In this form it was rejected in Committee, but the Radicals subsequently agreed to a compromise hardly less grossly tyrannical. Where a non-German-speaking element is more than 60 per cent. of the population, for the next twenty years it may, on giving notice, hold public meetings in the mother tongue, and the States may make further relaxations. It is obvious that this last provision is of no value to the Poles, for the Prussian Landtag will not make use of it, and the twenty years' respite cannot be enjoyed by them in the Rhine provinces, nor even in many of the Eastern districts. Radicals have lent themselves to this violation of their own principles, partly because they obtained in return modifications of the new Stock Exchange Bill, and partly because, having once entered the bloc as "practical" politicians, they had not the courage to break from it. Their action is severely criticised by the "Frankfürter Zeitung" and the "Berliner Tageblatt," and it is obvious to all that they are now far along the same road which led the National Liberals to the extreme of reaction.

* * *

The skull and bones of Emmanuel Swedenborg were removed on Tuesday from the vault before the altar in the Swedish Lutheran Church, where they have rested, with one interval, since 1772, and conveyed to Sweden. It seems a pity to dissociate his dust from the country in which he died, and where he found many followers. His greatness, however, belongs to mankind. To other than students and disciples, he is chiefly known by an essay of Emerson's; but minds so diverse as Kant, Emerson, Balzac, and the Brownings were all influenced by him. His most popular work—the series of extracts from the "Arcana Cœlestia," known as "Heaven and Hell"—illustrates his governing ideas and conclusions; but the greater book, veiled in its dress of cumbrous Latin, would furnish forth a hundred poets and speculators. No modern writer—save, perhaps Balzac, who was almost a disciple—achieved a wider range, or more profoundly searched the secret springs of human thought.

* * *

Sir Howard Vincent died on Tuesday at Mentone, in his fifty-ninth year. Most men, seeing and hearing (especially hearing) him in the House of Commons would have classed him with the cheery, eupeptic country gentlemen, and thought no more of him. But he was almost a prophet (and not at all a veiled prophet) of modern Toryism. He possessed a certain driving force that yielded visible results to his persistent method. He was one of the first of the new Protectionists, the new Imperialists, the new anti-foreigners. When his powers of agitation were, once in a while, tested in action, as in the Merchandise Marks Act, they worked in precisely the opposite direction that this simple-minded man desired. His activities were not confined to politics. He made a good head of Scotland Yard, and he was almost a generalissimo of the Volunteers. He was a typical representative of the kind of Toryism that comes from Sheffield. Personally, he was the most amiable of men, and the least bitter of partisans.

* * *

We regret that the Home Secretary has refused to interfere with the sentences of flogging, amounting in all to over 170 lashes, passed by Mr. Justice Lawrence on fourteen prisoners at Cardiff Assizes. We deal with the subject elsewhere.

* * *

A representative of the new literary order seems to have accompanied Mr. Asquith to Biarritz in the service of the "Daily Mail." He (or she) tells us that on the boat Mr. Asquith "drew a rug over his knees and opened a book resembling a 6s. novel" (unnamed). At a quarter to one in the morning he "closed his book." He also "pulled up his coat-collar and opened the door." At Paris he bought a "yellow-backed French novel" (named). Emboldened by this feat, he "seated himself comfortably in a corner seat, with his back to the engine." And so on. This is the new journalism.

* * *

The Boat Race ended in the expected victory of Cambridge by about 2½ lengths. The winning boat was not seriously pressed, and led from the start. Oxford showed resolution, but its shortness in the forward swing told against it, and the crew proved to be hardly quick enough to row down Cambridge in the first part of the race, when its choice of station gave it an advantage. The later spurts were therefore useless. The time was good, but not extraordinary—19 min. 20 sec.—and the Cambridge crew seemed to be rowing well within its strength.

Politics and Affairs.

THE LATE PRIME MINISTER.

The Liberal Party would be at once thankless and thoughtless if it failed to emphasise its sense of the blow it has received in the withdrawal from public life of the man who two years ago led it to its greatest electoral victory. For the loss is in the two chief departments of its activities. We believe we are right in saying that no Cabinet of modern times led so harmonious an existence as that which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman formed and conducted through the most critical years of its existence. We are certain that no man was so fitted to control the House of Commons which issued from the election of 1906. The party, therefore, stands doubly bereaved; and it also experiences, on its executive side, the loss of a singularly broad and sane judgment and of a temperament whose natural sweetness made smooth a hundred difficulties associated with the conduct of affairs in our intricate political life. But we think that it will feel especially the absence of the leader who saw it through its time of distress and unpopularity, and took, for it and for himself, the right course when it was so easy to take the wrong one. Such service was of inestimable value. It fortified Liberalism for its success, creating the men and the opportunity for its revival, and imparting to it the qualities of strength and self-respect on which, in spite of some adverse influences, it will continue to flourish. It would not be easy to say precisely why Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman succeeded where others failed. Time, doubtless, and the Nemesis that awaits an ill-considered policy, favoured him. But in the main the late Prime Minister re-made Liberalism because he had the character by which men stand in times of difficulty and before which lighter and more subtle temperaments give way. Having made up his mind, he kept to it, and so kept others in the path he had chosen. It was said of him that "he had no nerves." He certainly had an unrivalled serenity of temper and calmness of mind. For years he had to face a powerful Government, backed by an irritated public opinion, with half a party. Without special gifts of expression, he had constantly to counter in debate two of the readiest vocabularies and most ingenious intellects in Great Britain. Not a great thinker, he maintained belief in liberty and in human rights, in progress and a progressive party, when it had almost died, and when every kind of faithless compromise was in the air. He had to endure the insults of slight or common minds, unresented by those who should have been his friends. He had as open rival one of the most naturally attractive men in England. He defeated him. He re-knit his party, maintained its wavering allegiance to its old convictions, and broke the opposing forces, the forces within and the forces without. Feats such as these are usually associated with great men. In this case they were linked with a personality rather than with a governing talent of the supreme order. But few leaders have done for their followers what the late Prime Minister has achieved for his; few have better shown how serviceable the right use of powers, practical rather than brilliant, can be made.

Nor have these services been less conspicuous since the Government was formed. Able as was the Campbell-Bannerman Ministry, it went very near, on occasion, to committing capital errors. It might have gone wrong on South African Government, on Chinese labour, and on the legal status of trade unionism. We believe we are right in saying that on all these questions the Prime Minister's steadiness saved it. A little deficient in the power to take long views of policy, and to order a large disposition of forces well in advance of the critical time, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman rarely failed to do the right thing at the right moment. His decision then was instinctive; depending at once on good sense and good feeling. Hence he interpreted the most enlightened opinion in his party, distrusting over-ingenuity, and having the immense advantage that he was never afraid and never flurried. Had he been a soldier he must have been a good general, resembling in these respects the old and wary Russian commander, Kutusoff, who wore down Napoleon in 1812. When he thought he had good advice he took it. But he often did best when he acted on his own intuitions.

Mr. Asquith did well to suggest that the House of Commons and the world of politicians took leave of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in a spirit of affectionate regret. For the most part, the leaders of men inspire their admiration or their fear. Few win their love. The late Prime Minister possessed this quality of moral attraction, and retained it to the end of his career. It helped him to govern a House of Commons full of independent and even turbulent and jarring elements, as it has never been governed by men more highly trained in the arts of debate and intellectual strategy. One reason was that the new House of Commons represented a certain strain of simplicity in life and experience that corresponded to the late Premier's unostentatious habit and tastes. Society, which ignored and disliked him when he was out of power, despised him for his outspokenness about a terrible incident in the war, and did its best to avert his headship of a Liberal Government, turned to him readily enough when he came into his kingdom. But by character and temperament he had little sympathy with the classes who seek to govern Great Britain in the intervals of their amusements. In this respect he was the first of the democratic Prime Ministers, and men who represented something fresh in the grouping of political forces, like the Labour Party or the Irish Nationalists, felt especially drawn to him. What he was in his character he was also in his political tendencies. He could not be called an idealist, and he exercised a shrewd and close judgment on the average partisan and his ways. But he showed an unaffected interest in the causes which lay outside the regulated enthusiasm of party politics. A friendly and warm-hearted man, who found a home of rest for his old horses and allowed no killing of animals on his Scottish estate, he cared much for international peace, for the spreading of modest comfort and happiness among the mass of the people, for all that men in power, if they have firm wills and good intentions, can do to soften the cruelties and inequalities of life. He possessed indeed, the true art of governing men through their affections no less than through their intellects. For this reason his arts of management, which were remarkable, and his judgment, which rarely went astray on occasions of critical importance, served his party well, for they were founded on a knowledge of the abiding and governing sides of human nature. He lived to destroy or greatly to qualify the political power of three men, all of them intellectually abler than himself, to re-fashion a broken and distracted instrument into a powerful engine of progress, and to witness, to shape, and to nourish the re-birth of British democracy.

THE NEW PRIME MINISTER.

Those who value the smoothness of our normal political life may find something to admire in the ease with which Mr. Asquith has attained to the Premiership and formed a new Government without a break in the unity of his party. The change, indeed, is not so great as that involved in Lord Rosebery's replacement of Mr. Gladstone fourteen years ago. But it is considerable. In a sense Mr. Asquith is a "newer" Liberal than his predecessor. His career dates from the period when Gladstonianism was finishing its work, and re-constructive rather than liberating ideas were filling the nation's mind. In the popularising of these ideas the Prime Minister, who was also the best Home Secretary of our times, has had no mean share. The contrast with the late Premier is rather in temperament and outlook, as well as in relationship to Liberal feeling, and to some forces, like those of Labour and Irish Nationalism, most closely akin to it. Till the Free Trade controversy arose, Mr. Asquith was less closely in touch with those forces than Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman or Mr. Morley. Now he succeeds to the first place not only because of a distinguished service of talent and Parliamentary skill, but because the party itself has recovered its true relationship to the national life, which the South African war suspended. But there is no need to disguise the fact that Mr. Asquith's elevation has called for a re-adjustment of the balance of power, which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's retirement had disturbed, and that this necessity of the situation has been cheerfully conceded. The new Prime Minister, therefore, has started fairly and wisely on his course. The Chancellorship of the Exchequer, which he relinquishes, was properly offered to Mr. Morley, the most famous of the Gladstonian statesmen, and, on his refusal, to the most brilliant and conspicuous member of the Radical Opposition of 1900 to 1905. We hope, too, that when the personnel of the new Government is fully determined, it will be found to represent fairly the general balance of forces in the party. We wish that it could include a representative of the new Labour movement as well qualified for Cabinet responsibility and for the intellectual work of Government as is Mr. Shackleton, and we are glad to think that had such an appointment been feasible, it would willingly have been made.

There is a further sense in which Mr. Asquith's Premiership is opportune. The Liberal Government of to-day is a busy factory of legislation. It wants a master-workman at its head, and the faculty of workmanship is Mr. Asquith's special qualification for public life. We may think him a little wanting in imagination, in intuition, and in those special gifts of speech which go to the inspiriting of men or belong to the diplomacy of politics. On these lines Mr. Asquith's gifts do not compare either with Mr. Balfour's or with his predecessor's. But as an executant of policy he is unrivalled, and among recent statesmen deserves comparison only with Gladstone. It is safe to say that he has been the best devising head in the late Cabinet, and that his services in constructive work have been equally loyal and able. And it is unjust to call him a heartless or a spiritless politician. He has sometimes offended through a certain precision and dryness of speech. But there are cases in which rigid phrasing implies carefulness rather than hardness, a failure in tactics rather than in sympathy. What we hope he will consider during his tenure of power is that the standing of his Government in the House of Commons depends in no small degree on those groups of members who represent a disinherited nationality, or hard-driven and dependent forces in the community. He has in his day done good service both to labour and to Ireland. He can render them a still greater service by keeping them in touch with the general forces of progress.

For these reasons the Liberal Party may well be disposed to accept and to further the momentous change of direction which has befallen it. There are many, indeed, who feel that if they are bound to the new allegiance, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's successor is no less bound to them. We should not call Mr. Asquith a man of the Right. He belongs to what Continental politicians call the Centre of the party, with, of late, an increasing inclination to the Left. He is in the thick of the fray, for he has the management of the most hotly contested of the Government's Bills, and he has defended it in language which shows no weakness. And it is only by and with the Left that Mr. Asquith will be able to govern. Five-sixths of the Liberal Parliamentary Party are Left wing; not that any marked, or abrupt, line separates it from the Moderates, but that the evolution of Radicalism within the Liberal Party is fairly complete, and that the democratic advance on both sides, and the shifting of practical issues, have almost destroyed both Whiggery in Liberalism and pure Conservatism among the Unionist Opposition. Reaction may appear in full activity among the Tories, and fears of Socialism, artfully blown abroad for electoral purposes, now and then make weak Liberals shiver. But with us democracy is in full development. The neo-Tories are demagogues as well as Protectionists, appealing to the street-corner, and facing the prospect of large social changes like old-age pensions with alternative plans, and criticisms not of policy, but of detail.

Mr. Asquith's course, therefore, is marked out for him by the circumstances and necessities of the time no less than by the policy and temper of his predecessor. Radicals would, we believe have no objection to the suggestion that such a measure as the Education Bill should be taken out of the area of party controversy, and settled, if it can be settled, by an agreement between the churches whose quarrel has caused the whole difficulty. We should even be prepared to see the withdrawal of both the Bills now before the public, with a view to an eirenicon, to be arranged in the autumn. We want no large scheme of contracting out, and we do want a national system, if the country and the religious parties are ready for it. But we suggest that the general course and policy of the Government are governed, not merely by Mr. Asquith's Premiership, but by the choice of Mr. Lloyd George as the Chancellor of the Exchequer. and, therefore, as deputy leader of the House of Commons, and by the inclusion of Mr. Churchill in the Cabinet. Mr. Asquith has shown wisdom in associating Mr. George's quick and apprehensive genius, his remarkable fertility in expedients, with the most critical post in the Government, and he has secured a fresh asset in Mr. Churchill's rich eloquence and broad and rapidly maturing powers of thought.

These events, the strengthening of the younger element in the Cabinet, and the general infusion of fresh blood into the outer limbs of the Government, are sufficient indications of Mr. Asquith's view of the future of Liberalism. The new Government starts well. It has put forward three large measures of social re-construction—the Housing Bill, the Irish Universities Bill, and the Port of London Bill—which, with the Children's Bill, awake no partisan feelings, and yet are in line with the conscience or the practical needs of the community. If it can pass these measures, with the Eight Hours Bill for Miners, if it can settle the Licensing question, and make straight the way for an educational peace, it will have deserved well of the country, and prepared it for the over-mastering task which awaits it the next year and the year after, the reform of the Poor Law. In this great undertaking, four Ministers, Mr. Asquith himself, Mr. George, Mr. Churchill, and, if he remains at the Local Government Board, Mr. Burns, will be deeply concerned. On their success may depend the view which the people of Great Britain will take of the case for Free Trade. That case is unassailable by logic and is deeply concerned with the material welfare of the workmen. But if it is associated with mere praise of the status quo, and with indifference to the condition of the depressed mass of the wage-earners, it may fail. On a policy of Liberal-Conservatism Mr. Asquith's Government could not last a single Session. Progressive causes live by "admiration, hope, and love," and if they fall back to an attitude of timid adherence to things as they are, they loosen the roots of their strength. If, therefore, we accept the view that the new Ministry, like the old, is charged with the guardianship of Free Trade, and with the defence of the people from the alternative policy of public plunder, we hold it no less bound to continue its predecessor's course of constructive legislation. The answer to what is called the menace of Socialism is to establish a party which offers practical remedies for social evils, and can make the people realise that it feels and works for them, as well as for the commercial and industrial power of the nation.

THE USE OF THE LASH.

THERE are superstitions which die hard and resurrect easily. No superstition is so easily re-born as the belief that flogging is a right and proper penalty for crime. The use of the lash appeals directly to a sentiment which supposes itself to be moral, but is, in the main,. a compound of primitive vindictiveness and the love of excitement with a certain dash of sensuous cruelty thrown in. "The villain had his flogging at the gangway and we cheered." It is the cheer of the natural man who, when injured, wants to hit, to hit physically, directly, literally; who, when he sees another injured, equally needs to discharge his emotion and carry off the surplus excitement. It is the cheer which arises partly from less reputable emotions. "It was always so funny when anyone was going to be whipped," reflects Tant' Sannie, if we remember right, in the "African Farm." Schoolboys in the old days crowded to the best places to see the flogging of one of their number. If the castigation is private, as is usual nowadays, the excitement is scarcely less intense. The victim, if he has restrained his tears, is a hero, and he will recount with pride the number of strokes and the mode of their laying on. All physical violence done to a fellow-creature stirs a wave of excitement, in which elements of gloating satisfaction mingle with pity and horror. Nay, there is an element of emotional luxury in pity and horror themselves, which only true tragedy "purges" in the genuine sense. The feeling is mixed; disgust and attraction are strangely commingled at the sight of bloodshed. The first time a man sees a hanging, as Boswell somewhere recounts, he is inexpressibly shocked. Yet he goes again and again, and each time, as the shock is lessened, the more pleasureable elements gain the upper hand. Were our executions done in public we should soon have the old crowds and the old merry-making over them. Do not men gather in numbers for the mere thrill of seeing the black flag? Hanging is exciting. But flogging is even more exciting, and less grim.

The time will, we hope, come when all flogging of adults, but particularly the use of the birch, will be suppressed as an indecency. It might conceivably be just to sentence some men to be flogged for some actions. But it cannot be just to sentence any man to flog another. The better opinion gravitates in this direction, as may be inferred from the fact that when a man in ermine suddenly sentences eleven criminals to the lash we are told that he is a humane and careful judge. We know that defence. We know that "humane" official. It is always the peculiarly humane man whose high character is the defence of the indefensible. If farm-buildings are burned in war, it is always by the most "humane" general. If a pauper is ill-treated, it is by the most "humane" master of a workhouse. If a child is killed on the highway, it is by the most humane and careful motorist. May Heaven preserve us from the humane! With the unpretending we can get on well enough. Meanwhile we take Mr. Herbert Gladstone's defence of Mr. Justice Lawrence's action in flogging eleven men at Cardiff as a tacit admission that those sudden and sporadic resorts to methods of barbarism cannot be justified on their merit. The act must skulk behind the character of the agent as guaranteed by the unimpeachable testimony of the Home Secretary.

Argument on behalf of such a series of sentences there is none. To begin with, the case for flogging itself has been riddled. The story that flogging put down garrotting has been exploded over and over again. The belief that flogging was necessary to army discipline has been disproved by an experience of nearly thirty years. The dogma that flogging is necessary for prison discipline is disproved by the fact that it is precisely the offences so punished which show an increase. The belief that flogging is a cure for robbery with violence is disproved by the continuance of that crime after campaigns of flogging by judges with a tendency in that direction. The view that it is the one punishment criminals dread is exploded by the cases in which men who have been flogged return to the dock. Flogging is a bad punishment for the criminal because, more than any other, it breaks a man's character to pieces. What chance there is of reform depends wholly on the possibility of building up again the shattered self-respect of a convict and restoring him to orderly industrial life. All punishment which degrades a man makes this difficult. Flogging makes it more difficult than any other. It is bad for society, because it spreads abroad the contagion of violence. It cultivates an excitement that in our crowd-psychology propagates itself in rapidly widening waves. It is the fitting method of fostering an epidemic of violent crime. Hence it is that in proportion as the ferocity of punishment diminishes, so, on the whole, does the extent and the savagery of crime. Crime is to be extirpated in the end not by vengeance on the criminal, but by the improvement of the social order, and by the gradual prevalence of milder and more civilised dealings between man and man. The society which, while civilising itself in other ways, resorts to barbaric methods of self-protection against criminals, guards and cherishes a plague spot in its bosom.

But were it otherwise, were flogging in itself a desirable or a permissible punishment, there would still be no defence for the sporadic flogging administered at random by particular judges. There is no special reason why robbery with violence should be singled out for this form of retribution. There are cases of wicked fraud, in particular there are cases of cruelty to children, which have much stronger claims to this bad eminence. But even if this particular crime were to be singled out for barbarous treatment, there would still be no justification for the utterly casual and indiscriminate manner in which the punishment is now applied. If a punishment is to deter at all, it must be regular, and as certain as law and police can make it. If every man who robbed with violence knew that the lash awaited him, the fear of it might at least frighten him. As it is, he knows that he has nine out of ten chances of escape. In the normal course of things, he will be sent to prison. It is only if a particularly humane and careful judge arrives on the scene, that his back will be reduced to pulp. What might be gained by a bad form of punishment is lost by its random administration. Fortunately, these are the last cases of the kind. The Court of Criminal Appeal comes into existence in the course of two months, and in future sentences will at least be reduced to uniformity. The eccentricities of the humane will no longer have it all their own way, and, whatever the rule of punishment may be, wise or unwise, barbaric or civilised, it will be reduced to a standard and administered with a uniformity which will at least secure the elementary conditions of its operation as a deterrent.

THE BREAK-UP OF AMERICAN PARTIES.

That quadrennial cataclysm which Americans vainly seek to attenuate by calling it a Presidential election is now in full swing. It promises to be, in one respect, unique. When appeals to the country are regulated not by the needs of politics, but in obedience to an immutable time-table, there is no certainty that there will be any real issues to set before the people. In 1896 an election and a worthy issue had the good fortune to coincide. In 1900, though the election punctually put in its appearance, it found only the tail end of an issue waiting to receive it. In 1904 the contest, so far as political questions were concerned, was wholly factitious and decided nothing except that the American people preferred Mr. Roosevelt to Judge Parker. This year, not even an attempt is being made to disguise the fact that personalities and not policies are to be the pivot of the campaign. The three most prominent candidates before the electorate at this moment are Mr. Taft and Mr. Hughes on the Republican and Mr. Bryan on the Democratic side. All three subscribe practically without reservation to the Roosevelt policies. Mr. Bryan claims that he blazed the trail which Mr. Roosevelt has since macadamised. Mr. Taft, as the President's right-hand man, himself shares in the responsibility for the measures and policy of the administration. Mr. Hughes endorses all Mr. Roosevelt has done and tried to do. It is abundantly clear that no candidate less Radical than Mr. Roosevelt stands any chance. It is equally clear that the people wish the President's programme to be carried on. All, therefore, that they have to decide is whether it is to be carried on by Mr. Roosevelt himself, with Mr. Taft's thoroughness, with the somewhat milder methods that seem more consonant with Mr. Hughes's temperament, or with Mr. Bryan's declamatory and often ill-balanced intensity. Such an agreement on measures has not before been known in American history. The platforms that are now being adopted by the State conventions, whether Democratic or Republican, are in substance indistinguishable. Mr. Roosevelt's message of last week advocating amendments to the Anti-Trust laws, an employers' liability Act, and further labour legislation, was nowhere received with more favour than among his nominal opponents. The leader of the Democrats in the House has pledged the support of his followers in giving effect to the recommendations of a Republican President. Parties have, for the moment, ceased to exist. There is just Mr. Roosevelt and his programme and nothing more.

The phenomenon is unnatural, is unhealthy, and cannot endure. It represents not a fixed condition, but a phase in a great and deeply interesting process of transformation. For the past thirty years the American parties have been nothing but rival electioneering bodies. One might have searched them in vain for anything in the nature of a veritable creed. They derive a certain momentum from history and tradition; they owe much to local and sectional exigencies; and the mere immensity of their organisations and the fact that they have acquired a definite legal status have done much to keep them in being. Party spirit is probably deeper and more bitter in the United States than in Great Britain; party organisation has certainly reached a higher state of mechanical finish than we even dream of; and the discussion of politics, or, rather, of what is confidently assumed to be such, is at once more pervasive and more personal than with us. But, in spite of this, it is true that until Mr. Roosevelt's accession the American parties were merely guilds or fraternities of politicians fighting for the spoils. There was no such thing as a distinctively Republican or a distinctively Democratic policy or frame of mind. Of beliefs and principles, of everything, indeed, that one might exalt by the name of a political religion, they were all but wholly destitute. They had lost everything that we in Great Britain are apt to think essential to a political body, except office or the hope of it. That did not, of course, prevent them from behaving as though they were really parties with a faith. It did not prevent them from lining up in battle array, with banners and leaders all complete, and fighting one another as though something serious were at issue between them. They took sides, but which side each would take was determined by the accident of chance. Their alignment on the questions of the day was purely arbitrary and fortuitous, dictated, not by convictions, but simply by a sense, often shrewd, often amazingly at fault, of electioneering needs. There was no atmospheric change when Republicans succeeded Democrats or Democrats Republicans. Politics were make-believe, and parties existed to manœuvre among unrealities.

The social protest which was the backbone of Bryanism was the first large and clear sign that the era of a mechanical factitiousness was drawing to a close, and that American politics would before long be penetrated by a spirit of vitality and earnestness. Under Mr. Roosevelt's régime the signs have multiplied. His policy of the "square deal" cut clean across the traditional lines of party division. It fitted in with none of the old formulæ and catch-words. It was a national and not in any sense a factional policy, not a movement of Republicans against Democrats, but of the people against the plutocracy. Mr. Roosevelt has initiated two campaigns against the American money-power. One is aimed at capital, the other at capitalists. The first campaign, by an unsparing investigation of the Trusts, by an increasing strictness of Federal supervision over their conduct, and by the resumption of franchises and concessions heedlessly granted in past years, essays to bring under public control whatever is excessive and against the commonweal in the powers of organised wealth, and to prevent the promoter and the financier from profiting at the expense of the community. The second campaign deals rather with the millionaire as a private citizen and is designed to extract from him a fair return for the wealth he has been enabled to amass. Those who opposed these policies did so not as Republicans or Democrats but simply as Conservatives, speaking the universal language of Conservatism. Those who favoured them did so as Radicals sans phrase. Mr. Roosevelt, in short, has been the means of launching issues that appeal more to men's fundamental opinions about politics and society than to their party affiliations. He has brought home to the people the emptiness of the old parties and their lack of correspondence with the facts of America's economic conditions. We see many tokens that Republicans and Democrats with their obsolete mummeries will soon mean less than nothing to a nation that is girding itself to wrest its liberties from the plutocratic grip. A process of realignment is going on. Not all Republicans are Conservatives, nor all Democrats Radicals. The pervasive social unrest, the new turn of the people for open-minded cross-examination of themselves and their future and their institutions, the dawning sense of the inadequacies of an eighteenth-century Constitution in the face of twentieth-century problems, the emergence of a definite Labour Party fired by the example of Great Britain, and the horror and shame of the financial and commercial scandals of the past few years, are agencies that are slowly splitting American politics into a party of Conservatives and a party of Radicals, possibly into one of the Haves and another of the Have-nots. The present identity of Democrats and Republicans has in it nothing stable. It signifies not precipitation but the moment of pause before a new departure.

Life and Letters.

EASTER IN SEVILLE.

At this time, all Spain, much of Europe, and a considerable proportion of America is fighting its way southward into Seville, to see the Holy Week and Easter ceremonies with rites as yet unmaimed. Madrid at evening is the last vision of the north, the mountains behind it rising clean-cut in that clear air, against a sullen horizon, grey cloud slashed with crimson and purple. When you awake next morning you find the train running smoothly and quietly through the south; with the southern palms and cactuses scattered over the brown parched land; and each tiny village of dazzling whiteness; and the air luminous as if the very earth were shining; and, above all, unchanging blue sky, turquoise rather than sapphire, as if some white had become mingled with the blue—the sky of Andalusia. The leagues of the great plain sink backward without a change; then a tall tower appears on the horizon, below a cluster of white roofs, green gardens; round it is a brown river. It is Seville; a white city, set by a brown river in green gardens, serene, smiling, very content.

At Easter, the hotels laugh openly at your demands for accommodation. Every available house room is packed from floor to ceiling. Municipal schools, disused stables, and private lodgings are converted into temporary hostelries, in which the casual traveller is welcomed, ill-treated, fleeced, and dismissed with an extraordinarily agreeable courtesy and good temper. In the city the people are occupied with two interests, and plying a lucrative trade in two commodities: the first, seats to witness the Holy Week processions; the second, seats to witness the great bull fight on Easter Sunday. Down the famous narrow Sierpes, past the Ayuntamiento, outside of which are reserved places for the Mayor, notables, and their guests in full evening dress, and along the narrow Genova and Gran Capitan, cane wicker chairs line both sides of the streets, and windows are purchasable above, for this is the route of the processions to the Cathedral. Long before sundown all work is suspended, and the whole city has collected there, seated comfortably on their chairs or wedged in the poorer crowds behind; the men in smart, glossy clothes, the women, always hatless, dark hair with the flare of a red flower in it—carnation or rose—with a vision of happy beautiful children, with roses and carnations in their hair, looking down from the balconies above. The processions, in isolated groups, have been wandering about the streets all day; and any moment, on turning a sudden corner, the traveller may encounter an enormous image—Christ on the Cross, or the Blessed Virgin—surrounded with flower garlands and lighted tapers, advancing towards him propelled by no visible agency. In the evening they assemble for the procession to the Cathedral. In slow and solemn dignity they emerge from the narrow Sierpes: first a band wailing forth wild and mournful music; then those who are accompanying the particular sacred image, men and boys dressed as masqued monks, with high conical hats and garments of scarlet or purple or green, covering all their faces except two tiny eye openings; carrying tall lighted candles which scarcely flicker in the windless air. The huge images are each carried by twenty-five or thirty men, poor workmen, whose bare feet and tattered clothing are just revealed beneath the rich canopy and ornament; who advance but forty or fifty yards at a time and then sink down to rest. Children, clothed in white with white veils, scatter flowers and sing hymns to Christ and the Virgin. The advance is slow, solemn, and seemingly endless; hour after hour passes, with the crowd absorbed, contented. Behind is the sound of the sweetmeat sellers and the water carriers with their rapid, sharp cries of "Agua! Agua!" In front, as the sky darkens and the light glimmers and fades in the west, these twinkling candles surrounding the vast standing figures, lifted high over the crowded people, as they uncover their heads before "Our Lady of Dolors," or bow the knee to a gigantic painted Crucifix, swayed slowly forward through the gathering night.

The whole world is in the streets. But on eluding the crowd and entering the enormous gloom of the great Church, the whole world appears to be in the Cathedral. The original builders here had boldly decided to build a basilica "so magnificent that coming ages should call them mad for attempting it." And whatever criticism may be lavished on its external appearance, few will challenge the assertion that this is the most magnificent and most impressive interior in Christendom. Here, in this April twilight, the dominant vision is of soaring arches all straining upwards in an obscure darkness; roofs, towers, and domes lost in a vast encompassing canopy of mystery and silence. The whole countryside has poured into Seville, and the peasants, with a few rugs and bundles, are encamped on the stone floors, where they will contentedly pass the night in an ecstasy of emotion. The gloom and silence is but revealed rather than broken by the immense erection of glass and crystal and dim light which has been built under the dome to receive the Blessed Sacrament, no longer (until Easter) reserved on the High Altar. An enormous black veil shrouds that sacred spot; black veils cover all the altars and images: the Church is in mourning for her Dead Lord. No bells sound during these days of lamentation. Through the vast, silent crowds in the darkness the great images are borne by their unseen bearers, each saluting the altar and passing away down the long aisles and naves, with their set faces and twinkling candle lights. Estava's solemn "misereres" wail down the corridors and echo in the high arches of the roof: men and women and children go softly, with laughter for a moment stilled; because their God is dead.

So pass the hours of the night before Holy Saturday: with the whole people in the streets, and the exaltation of religious ardour near the surface. In the morning the sorrow has suddenly vanished. The blessed veil in the Cathedral is rent asunder: the fire is kindled and the Sacrament is restored in solemn procession to the altar: the great bells of the Cathedral ring joyfully out over the white city, answered by the bells of all the other churches: a storm and torrent of swinging bells, exultant under the renewed sunlight and blue sky. The city is no longer mourning for the dead, but giving itself to dancing and merriment. Christ is risen.

And on Sunday, after the Easter High Mass at the Cathedral, an unforgettable vision of colour and solemn pomp of ritual, the celebration of such rejoicing is exhibited in the first Bull Fight of the Year. Every street leading to the Plaza de Toros down by the Guadalquiver is packed with happy crowds, full of chaffing and merriment and easy laughter, with carriages and various weird forms of vehicles moving slowly through the dense throngs of pedestrians. Special crowds collect outside the hotels where the bullfighters are staying, and cheer them as they emerge—lithe, splendid figures, richly dressed in the traditional Spanish costume of colour and ornament. On the Marina outside the entrance to the Bull Ring is a solid wedge of carriages and coachmen, as the aristocracy of Seville drive down to grace the popular entertainment. Within that immense arena, the brown sand of its great circular centre confronts a white circle of stone cutting the blue sky, with the Giralda tower peeping over one corner, alone connecting that limited horizon with any known reality. Tier on tier of people, in numbers defying calculation, and amid an increasing hum of excitement, await the moment of expectation. In a moment one has dropped back through the centuries, and sees the spirit and expectation and mingled ardour and reluctance of a gathering under the Roman Empire, assembled to see how Christian or Barbarian can die.

A very little of the actual experience of the fighting will satisfy an uninitiated spectator, admiring, as he is compelled to admire, the extraordinary courage, agility, and skill of the bull-fighters; sickened by the slaughter of the horses and the apparent complete indifferent to their agonies. So he will wander out under the sunshine of late afternoon into the white ways of the half-deserted city, till the cries of that vast crowd left behind him sink into silence. He will seek relief, perhaps, in the Alcazar gardens, the very embodiment of all Eastern delicacy and enchantment, in which the air is heavy with the scent of syringa and roses, and thus early in the year, in the narrow walks between deep, clear fountains of water, and along the tree-lined avenues, the ground is covered with lilac and scattered rose leaves. Or he will be very content to wander at random through the maze of the city, through street after street, with its whitewashed walls, and only the wrought-iron gateways exhibiting the fascination of the life within, the little courtyards of the houses with their trees and flowers and tiny orange groves and palms. He will essay the Cathedral again, now empty and wearied after its tremendous efforts of the preceding days, but still dominating in its vast spaces and stillness: with its eighty altars and variety of decoration proclaiming the rich glories that once were Spain, the spoil of a new world; and the pathetic tomb of Columbus, brought back from that new world when the last fragment of its Empire was rudely torn from this now shattered kingdom, proclaiming that those glories have departed. And at evening it is expedient to attain the high tower of the Giralda, up that broad, sloping pathway upon which a horse and carriage can easily ascend. For the summit offers a panorama which few similar cities can equal: Seville, a limited gathering of friendly white houses, set solitary in the vast plain of Andalusia, cut by the river from which stand out the masts of tall ships and the lights swinging and dancing in its quiet waters; with pigeons and innumerable doves circling round the tall tower; and the song of singing birds dying down in the green gardens; and the storks sailing homewards under the red sunset sky, with at the last the evening lit only by one large star.

THE COMPLETE ANARCHIST.

Towards the end of Kropotkin's "Memoirs" there is a remarkable description of the change that he found in England on his second visit in 1886. During his first visit, only five years before, he had felt an exile indeed. No one took the smallest interest in the questions which alone interested him. Social thought, so active in this country during the 'forties, appeared to have died of dull contentment or despair. There seemed no one to whom he could ally himself, no one to whom he could turn for sympathy or co-operation in the social aims on which his life was concentrated. Being at that time strange to the English language and people, he was wrong, for in that very year Mr. Hyndman founded the Democratic Federation, as we think it was then called. But still, it would be hard to exaggerate the astonishing change of the next few years, for during them a true revolution in thought was set on foot, and we are living upon the impetus of that revolution now.

The appearance of a new collection of Mr. Edward Carpenter's essays and verses ("Sketches from Life," George Allen, 5s.) recalls us to those eager and adventurous years, when, if ever in our history, our young men dreamed dreams and our old men saw visions. For his was among the most hopeful and stirring voices of the time. He knew more than other people, and he wrote the very best prose, though, to be sure, those advantages were never necessary to salvation. He was one of these highly educated, middle-class people whose presence in the social movement Kropotkin notices as almost peculiar to England, and he brought to the question something of those "general principles" in which the Russian found our people so lacking, compared to other races. But it was not his knowledge or his prose or his general principles that gave Edward Carpenter so strong a hold upon the social enthusiasts of the day. The secret of his power over their affections and convictions was that he lived the life he taught.

"This noble ensample unto his scheep he gaf.
That ferst he wroughte, and after that he taughte."

There lies the touchstone that discredits sounding brass, and even if Edward Carpenter had possessed none of the other advantages we mentioned, this would have sufficed him for followers.

To be sure, he was followed in all manner of queer ways, whether of dress or food or farming. It is so easy to emphasise the unessential, and become a ritualist in fads. But if some people made too much of his saying about the little toe, and counted sandals for salvation; if some people insisted too apostolically on the rival advantages of seeds or leaves for human diet; if some took too literally his advice in favour of an occasional debauch, and saved themselves from self-righteousness by spending a Saturday night in the gutter; if most of the communistic farms have ended in charming failure, none of these things matter very much. People might have taken to worse, as Mrs. Carlyle's servant said of two maiden ladies and religion, and certainly no one who lived through that time of gay and devoted experiment will account mere failure any reason for regretting the years. We speak in the past tense, not that Edward Carpenter's influence has passed away; we have found it from the Peak to the Caucasus; but that first fine careless rapture of the 'eighties we shall not feel again, and the spirit was the thing.

In economics he was ordained to heretical succession by Ruskin. He was not so fine in spirit as his master, not so pathetic in yearning indignation, but full of hopes and more pugnacious. "England's Ideal" and "Civilisation: Its Cause and Cure" were his heretical books. In them he brought to bear on modern life a criticism as penetrating and revolutionary as Ruskin's own, and more plain-spoken. It was through evidences of physical and spiritual sickness that he opened his attack. The very numbers of the doctors for body and mind proved what invalids we are. Crawling phenomena like policemen showed the rottenness of our state. Compared to the cat, we are degenerates of nature, who have lost our unity, our integration. Compared to the fox or Bushman, how self-conscious, distracted, and ugly. Even our moral sense, that perception of sin which we boast as distinctively human, goes with a certain weakness, and as to our way of life, he wrote of the civilised man:—

"He disowns the very breasts that suckled him. He deliberately turns his back upon the light of the sun, and hides himself away in boxes with breathing-holes, which he calls houses. . . . He muffles himself in the cast-off furs of the beasts, every century swathing itself in more and more layers, till he ceases to be recognisable as the Man who was once the crown of the animals, and presents a more ludicrous spectacle than the monkey that sits on his own barrel organ."

But the return to Nature and the beauty of the savage had been proclaimed by many voices since Rousseau's, and, from America, Whitman's barbaric yawp had sounded over the roofs of the world.

"Do the feasters gluttonous feast?
Do the corpulent sleepers sleep? Have they locked and bolted doors?
Still be ours the diet hard, and the blanket on the ground.
Pioneers! O pioneers!"

The glories of Nature and the simple life had been sung before, and they have been since repeated, almost to satiety. The distinction of Edward Carpenter's teaching was that in the years when dogmatic Socialism was sketching out its phalansteries and piecing together its rather inhuman machinery of by-laws and regulations, experts and officials, proletariats and doctrinaires, he almost alone among the leaders of social thought stood firm for liberty. His protest, indeed, lay not only against a centralised Socialism, but against Government and Law in general. Most of us are content to accept Government for fear of what might happen else, and to accept Law as a shorthand summary of public convenience—a rough summary but passable. But Carpenter would hear nothing of external Government and external Law, so continually at variance with the internal powers that alone inspire great action. Compared to those powers, all the common aids to decency and duty, such as laws, judges, policemen, prisons, experts, officials, and inspectors, appeared to him hindrances to be abolished. With his own teacher, Walt Whitman, he said:—

"Where the men and women think lightly of the laws,
Where the populace rise at once against the never-ending audacity of elected persons,
There the great city stands."

"External law," he proclaimed emphatically, "must always be false."

In the history of man he could discover no permanent code of moral action. He attacked the customs and habits which blind and bind us, as earnestly as he attacked the Criminal Statutes and the folly of prisons. Even the Decalogue, that most reformers skip, did not escape him:—

"The Decalogue, he wrote, may have been a rough and useful ready-reckoner for the Israelites; but to us it admits of so many exceptions and interpretations that it is practically worthless."

We may call him the Complete Anarchist. In the anarchy of individualism he goes further even than Tolstoy, for he demands a faculty of antagonism in a man, so that the full value of personality may be preserved. Among merely unselfish people he finds a certain dulness, a kind of charity which is really parasitic and lives on the objects of its pity. To the passive resister he replies that turning the cheek to the smiter only encourages smiting. A Communist in society, his real object is not the community or the State, but the noble personality, "untamed, untranslateable," as Whitman said:—

"O I could sing such grandeurs and glories about you . . .
I am larger, better than I thought;
I did not know I held so much goodness."

That is the ideal of life to which Edward Carpenter has pointed us with all his power of thought and word and life—an ideal of true Democracy, as he calls it, in which External Government and Law will give place to Internal Government and Order. Before that stage is reached, when mankind will have passed beyond our dreary region of duties and rights, there is, he admits, a toilsome and long ascent to be made. We are grateful to him for that Pisgah sight, but here we are struggling as best we can upon the toilsome and long ascent. Man, we know, was made only a little lower than the angels, but we do not seem to be catching them up very fast.

THE ETHIOPIAN'S SKIN.

Imperialism, in its distinctive character, as the government of subject peoples, is tested for us in South Africa as nowhere else. For there alone do we see a large genuine settlement of dominant whites among primitive races which neither merge with them nor die out by contact with civilisation, but, preserving their racial integrity, multiply in numbers. In India, the problem of empire, not less grave, is different, for there no true colonisation of whites is climatically feasible, and the same holds of nearly all our tropical possessions: in Canada and in Australasia, where true colonisation has taken place on lands containing lower peoples, the latter form a small and a dwindling proportion of the inhabitants. Hence the Kaffir question stands out alone in its supreme practical importance. Neither civilised diseases, nor drink, nor clothes kill out the Kaffirs, though small-pox and pneumonia play havoc where they once get root, and drink, unchecked, still might do the business. Their numbers continue to grow at least as fast as do the whites. If they were so backward as to be virtually incapable of education along European lines, like the Bushmen and the Hottentots, the issue would be plainer. But they have attained a real, strong, stable, though simple, civilisation of their own, and appear in some ways very capable of taking on those aspects of our civilisation most likely to bring them into competition and possible conflict with the obvious self-interests of the dominant white races.

Such is the situation Mr. Dudley Kidd delineates in his new and searching study, "Kaffir Socialism" (Black), the value of which consists in its serious attempt to apply scientific methods to the interpretation of matters which hitherto have been the prey of short-range opportunism, tempered by a somewhat barren sentimentalism. No writer has done fuller justice to the fine qualities contained in the feudal Socialism of the clan-system which, with slight variations of form, was everywhere evolved as the type of social order among the Kaffirs. A system which, based on community of land-tenure, made destitution impossible and secured "a general and uniform state of medium prosperity," removed all grievances of taxation, established an absolute acceptance of the word of the chief as the fount of justice, inculcated a powerful and abiding spirit of unselfishness and good fellowship, and, most invaluable of all, succeeded in imposing a wonderful restraint upon the appetites and passions of so vigorous a type of humanity, must be regarded as a remarkable achievement. It is, indeed, evident that to Mr. Kidd the disintegrating influence of the individualism which the white man is gradually bringing to bear upon this stable system has in it many of the elements of historic tragedy. A little civilisation is a dangerous thing, especially when the process is conducted without clear knowledge or intuition by self-seeking business men or blind philanthropists. The clan system is sapped simultaneously by land concessionists, mine-owners, traders, farmers, missionaries, educationalists, and politicians: some want the tribal lands, others the labour of the individual Kaffir, others are genuine believers in individual elevation under the influence of competitive industry and Christian instruction. Piercing boldly the surface of phrases and sentiments, Mr. Kidd makes a close and serious endeavour to state and to answer the two related and underlying questions: "Is there reason to suppose that Kaffirs as a race are capable of taking on at a tolerably rapid pace this individualistic civilisation?" And if so: "Is this result consistent with the maintenance of white dominion in South Africa?"

That there is much force in the ordinary white colonist's contrast between the raw and the newly trained native cannot be doubted. "The raw native is a fine, big, burly, dignified, merry, courteous, picturesque specimen of humanity. He is one of nature's gentlemen; he gives himself no airs; he is frank and natural in his behaviour; he is unaffected, and yet holds himself in a manner that shows he has plenty of self-respect." "But the moment the Kaffir embraces civilisation he gathers a smattering of 'knowledge'; he dons dirty, frowsy, patched, second-hand clothing; he looks slovenly and untidy; he presents either a ridiculous or a sordid appearance; he looks mean and shabby in the extreme. As he ascends the educational ladder, all the man's natural self-respect vanishes, and in its place there is found an aggressive, unnatural, and unpleasant self-assertion and effrontery. Coupled with this, the fellow wears for the first time in his life a hang-dog expression, as if he felt the need of apologising for his existence."

Doubtless with many exceptions such are the normal fruits of the rapid dissolution of the clan system in individual character. Alike in politics, education, industry, religion, and social organisation, we are led to an apparent impasse. Larger and larger numbers of Kaffirs taken from the protection of the clan are thrown on their separate personal efforts for a livelihood and a home: yet no equal franchise or full civil status is to be accorded them without endangering social order. The only sound education is one in which industrial training goes hand in hand with intellectual; but skilled trades "belong" to white men, who will not consent to be displaced by Kaffir competition. Even Christianity, unless carefully administered by white superiors, so as to guard against dangerous doctrines of the brotherhood of man, is a disturber of the public peace, as the recent spread of "Ethiopianism" indicates. It would be much simpler if we could come to the conclusion that the Kaffir was, after all, only capable of a veneer of purely imitative culture, and that since this is bad for him (and bad for us), we had better leave him undisturbed in his primitive clan-life.

But there are two fatal objections to this course. In the first place, as we see, certain dominant interests of white men have need of the individual Kaffir, and persist in their assaults upon clan-life even where it has hitherto survived, as in Zululand and in Basutoland. They want his labour and they want his land. Secondly, if our civilisation really contains important elements which the Kaffir nature is capable of assimilating, we cannot and we ought not to withhold them. Now Mr. Kidd believes that he can discern, not in abnormal specimens, but broadcast among the Kaffirs, "a sort of general simmering of latent faculty" stopped from attaining full actuality by unwise handling. His study of Kaffir child psychology in relation to kraal life leads him to the conclusion that the mortal error of our educational system consists in sending back the young "educated" Kaffir to the kraal just after he has entered upon manhood, and thus cancelling all the gains of early individual culture.

A sane scientific policy of industrial and moral education would perhaps liberate "the latent faculty," and secure for large numbers of Kaffirs the intellectual and moral advancement to which a few have hitherto attained. But what then? Are we nearer to any pacific satisfactory solution of our root problem? Not at all. Break down the clan system, and really elevate Kaffir personality, you necessarily transmute the old clan sentiment into a wider nationalism, which will surge incessantly against the industrial and political supremacy of the white race. If perfect wisdom could be applied to a disinterested policy, it might be possible to contemplate a gradual peaceful realisation of the doctrine which Mr. Kidd subjects to such remorseless criticism, "Equal rights for all civilised men," so as to maintain a stable harmony of colours. But here we are confronted by the fatal logic of imperialism. It is idle to speculate upon the possibility of wise, disinterested education of a subject race, without turning our analysis upon the question whether the very fact of race dominion, political and economic, does not disable from the performance of this delicate and essentially spiritual task. The subtle poison of race domination foredooms to failure an education imposed by the master-race, for it will always be secretly and instinctively diverted from purely disinterested and scientific methods into protective means of supporting and promoting the profitable domination of the masters. Such, at any rate, has been the plain lesson of all history, nor can we see reason why it should be reversed in the story of South Africa. Where no fusion of races is possible, no moral harmony supports the structure of society. This is the dark basic fact in the situation in South Africa, as in the Southern United States. No sound, truly progressive civilisation is possible where two physically and morally separate races occupy the same area. Ultimately one must quit, and the final question which such a book as Mr. Kidd's raises is the question whether South Africa is in the last resort a Kaffir or a white man's country.

GARDEN PRIMROSES.

In the cool recesses of the thickening woodland the primrose clumps are spreading rapidly. The plant does not make the whole of its flowering growth before the winter and then go to rest with an easy conscience. Its somnolence is half feigned. Often, when one looks into the heart of what seems to be nothing but a tuft of weather-worn old leaves, a half-developed, tender green leaf is seen to be lurking there, not so much shy as suspicious of the permanence of the warm weather which has induced it to start. For the primrose is a wise plant, and, what is more, full of supreme confidence in its ability to make good any delay consequent on a "late" winter. It is motionless, and yet quivering with alert and eager life, like a sprint runner couched on toes and finger tips awaiting the crack of the starter's pistol. The moment comes, and the primrose is up and away. It starts into growth as it speeds into bloom. It multiplies its members as it flashes along. A month ago it consisted of one "crown"—just a thickened central growth, surrounded by a tuft of big, soiled, somewhat dingy-looking leaves. To-day it is a thick mass of flowering parts. Crowns have multiplied, fresh, softly-tinted foliage has come. And every new tuft gushes flowers, as a dozen little unsuspected submarine pipes gush water where a long-dormant spring re-appears after a spell of wet weather.

The making of a pergola in February afforded the writer many opportunities of watching the behaviour of certain covies of coloured garden primroses. To get solidity for the pergola on a wind-swept slope, and to afford a means of providing manured earth in place of dry chalk, holes almost large enough to be described as pits were made, and this necessitated the uprooting of the primroses. They were lifted in large clumps, and packed together on a spare bed, there to remain until the pergola should be complete, and their old quarters made ready for them again. But snow came—snow in great, solid flakes; and then rain—rain in floods. The two of them rang the changes week after week, and work had to be suspended, so that April had come before the last larch-pillar could be erected.

The primroses did not resent their temporary ousting by any peevish act, such as dying; but they were plainly curious what it was all about. Never a plant but opened a bright, observant eye or two and watched the proceedings. In fact, the whole bedful of them kept up a relay of sentinel flowers. Beyond this they did not apparently go; but, in reality, they were all agog for progress. Every little crown fairly bristled with greeny-yellow spikes that were not flower stems, but incipient leaves; and when the flowering time came what an explosion of blossom! Every plant reeled out flowers as champion lady typists reel out words. The plants were packed with blooms like pins on a cushion. They surged in frolicsome crowds, like troops of week-old lambs gathered for high-kicking, and back-arching, and sudden rushes at racing speed. Some of the flowers had stems of their own, which ran right down into the heart of the plant; these were primroses proper. Others had stemlets only an inch or so long, converging on a main stem as thick as a cigarette; these were polyanthuses. They grew and bloomed; and bloomed and grew, in a riot of satisfaction.

It is when the lucky grower has a deep, cool soil, in a mild, moist district, that he sees what garden primroses are really capable of doing. It is a race between them and the rock cress (arabis) as to which shall spread the faster. The primrose strikes a solid thirty-five to the minute, and pulls them through; the rock cress stabs out forty, and with a pretty feather makes way. The Arabis covers the greater amount of surface, but the primrose forgets its native lowliness, and goes up like a sturdy wallflower. The blooms it produces are almost as big as prize pansies, and even that richly-marked flower cannot excel it in beauty of colour. We have the pallid yellow of the wild primrose in a bloom as large again. We have rich, buttercup yellows; we have shades that are deeper than saffron, and others that hardly fall short of orange; we have white, and cream, and blush, and pink, and rose; we have madder and magenta, lilac and lavender; we have mauve, and purple, and violet; yes, and we have blue—real, deep, rich blue; a blue as true as the blue of sweet pea "Lord Nelson," or of viola "Blue Gown," and only by a degree or two falling short of the perfect blue that is found in Gentiana acaulis and Salvia patens. "But not in primroses!" the astonished reader may ejaculate. Yes, in glorified garden forms of that same modest wilding which is now in evidence at every street corner.

In case a London rate-payer should rise in wrath, and demand to know how it is that, with him paying nine and fourpence in the pound, we are not taught all about these floral gems through the medium of the Spring displays in the parks, but are fobbed off with hyacinths and tulips, it may be well to mention that the primrose does not love town life. In the great nursery garden which the London County Council has at Avery Hill—once the home of the late Colonel North—many thousands are raised every year, but they do not enter into races with the rock cress when they have got planted in the Embankment gardens and elsewhere; it is rather a case of sauve qui peut. The embankment sparrows get inordinately fat—too fat to chirp, almost. But they podge about among the primroses, and pull off all the flowers they can while the policemen are not looking; and occasionally they contemptuously hop right over one of the poor, maltreated plants. Fancy a bloated embankment sparrow hopping over a real country primrose! He would never even attempt it, for he is a bird of discretion, and does not endanger his life by futile efforts, even in fighting. He likes to pull off yellow primroses much better than coloured ones, and he has a way of pecking them off at the top of the stalk, and disposing them in neat ranks all round the plant. They suit his taste better that way, and the plan has the additional advantage of exasperating his natural enemy, the gardener.

The country grower saves his primroses after they have flowered, of course. He divides them, and plants them in a reserve bed in a cool corner against the time when the autumn beds shall be made up; but he also raises fresh plants from seeds in late Spring. Seedling plants have a way of giving very large, fresh, brilliantly coloured flowers; besides, the florists keep on adding new colours, and improving their "strains" in size and form.

Other primroses than these glorious descendants of the woodland flower will engage the affections of those who admire the Primula genus. They will find a damp, cool spot for the April blooming species rosea, a lovely flower of softest rose; and a similar corner for the dusky Japonica, with its flowers in tiers ("whorls") up the tall, strong stem. They will grow the exquisite little lilac-coloured "bird's-eye primrose," as primula farinosa is called; and which they may have found in some secluded haunt among the northern fells. Surely, too, they will grow the snowy nivalis, so dainty, so hardy, so full of blossom, and so appealing in its virginal purity.

These flowers of the April garden have a winning charm of growth, form and colour that the massive hyacinth lacks, and they bring garden and woodland into happy union in the heart of the flower lover.

THE BOAT RACE.

The result of last Saturday's race was entirely in accordance with the expectations of all qualified observers who had watched the crews during their practice. The vigorous hearty rowing of the Cambridge men, their cheerful endurance, and the dashing generalship of their stroke-oar, Mr. Stuart, had commended them alike to the expert critics and to the general public who thronged the river-bank in multitudes every day while the oarsmen were going through their allotted labour. Oxford had suffered many misfortunes during the early part of their practice. Influenza had temporarily laid by several members of the crew, and they had not been able to do as much hard work as their rivals. Now hard work, by which we mean long stretches of genuine rowing, is, no doubt, exhausting and often disagreeable, but it is absolutely essential if a crew is to come to the post in good racing condition. In this respect Cambridge had been both judicious and fortunate. No illness disturbed their training, and their coaches were thus able to inflict upon them a great deal of toil and to turn them out in splendid physical trim. We doubt if any University crew of the last few years has done so much work or been equally fit.

During the race the wind was against the crews nearly all the way to Hammersmith. From the Doves it began to favour them, and as they turned from Barnes towards the finish they once more found it opposed to them. Fortunately, it was of no great strength, and gave no special advantage to one station above the other. Owing to the conformation of the river the Surrey station, on which Oxford rowed, is in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the better of the two, for the crew possessing it can command the inside of the protracted corner which begins just before Hammersmith Bridge. To do this, however, the Surrey crew must be level, or, at any rate, not more than a length behind at Hammersmith Bridge, so that the Middlesex crew may be kept out and have the longer distance to travel on the outside of the bend. Obviously, therefore, it was to the interest of Cambridge to obtain such a lead as would enable them to cross over in front of Oxford and secure the inside berth. Oxford, on the other hand, should have endeavoured, at all costs, to prevent Cambridge from executing this manœuvre. In the race they were unable to do this. While Cambridge raced away as if they had only a quarter of a mile to go, Oxford started at a comparatively slow rate and almost immediately began to drop behind, until at the Crab Tree the light blues, being then two lengths ahead, were able to come over and to take Hammersmith Bridge and the bend beyond straight in front of their opponents. It was not until Hammersmith Bridge was left behind that Oxford began to show any real racing vigour. Their repeated spurts after this were an excellent exhibition of pluck, but with a crew so strong and fit as Cambridge well ahead of them their case was by that time hopeless. They had allowed themselves to be out-generalled.

In spite of conspicuous merits, which every judge of rowing must concede to them, it cannot be asserted that as a crew Cambridge were of the very highest class. They had strength and life. Their stroke in the water was a powerful one, and their beginning, though not yet swift enough, was an improvement on last year. Rough water did not put them out, and they were so confident in their bodily condition that they did not shrink from rowing a fast stroke. They were not, however, welded together with that beautiful uniformity which is found in the very best crews. In their body movements there was a distinct "break" in the forward part of the boat, and the time of the blades, especially in the case of No. 7 and No. 6, left much to be desired. Their vigour and their racing ability were admirable. For these qualities they were very largely indebted to their stroke, Mr. Stuart, who has thus once more proved his brilliant capacity as a leader in spite of the carping and not very generous criticisms to which he was subjected by a prominent Oxford oarsman and coach in the columns of more than one daily newspaper.

About the "secret trial" of the Oxford crew we should have preferred to say nothing more. Our duty, however, as veracious and impartial historians compels us, in view of the strange justifications that have been put forward, to add something to what we said last week. We may admit that the proceeding had its rise in thoughtlessness, in the schoolboy notion that it would be a pleasant "rag" to bamboozle the newspapers, the rival crew, and the public generally. Such thoughtlessness, however, cannot be permitted to those whose duty it is to guard the high traditions of manly openness and courteous rivalry for which this race is celebrated. It appears that once before, in 1893, a similar secret trial was rowed by an Oxford crew, but there was great disapproval of it at the time, and it has been looked upon rather as a warning than as a precedent. All the other alleged instances that have been cited in excuse utterly fail upon examination to support the case of the excusers. It is the deliberate intention to deceive that makes all the difference—that and the silly dodges resorted to for throwing everybody off the scent. After what has happened we may hope and believe that no University crew will ever again make use of these methods.

One final comment we are bound to make. We cannot believe that it is in the interests of this contest that the oarsmen who take part in it should write daily criticisms in the papers on the doings of their crews. Perhaps the two University Boat Clubs will themselves take measures to make this impossible in the future.

Sketches of Travel.

"LOS PEARES, UN MINUTO!"

The line ran close beside the Minho, which foamed and brawled in the deep channel it had cut between the hills. Along the banks thickets of oleanders grew, mixed here and there with tamarisks. Clouds of white mist, raised by the sun after a touch of frost, hung over everything, shrouding the chestnut forests, half-way up the trees, leaving their tops, as it were, detached and floating in the air.

It lingered in the stacks of maize, making them look like bee-hives. About the curious little hutches of rough stone, in which the peasants in Galicia store their Indian corn, it clung, leaving their squat stone crosses, suspended in the air without a base, as if, by a perpetual miracle, they were sustained, through some mysterious power. Then, the sun rose in all its glory, and as the train slowly crawled past, jangling and creaking like a bullock-cart, all the old agricultural life, such as that which Theocritus or Columella have described, was plain in all the beauty of its old-world simpleness and charm. Impassive men stood herding sheep, leaning upon their sticks.

Girls held sleek, coffee-coloured cows by a long rope to graze, and twirled their distaffs, as they watched them eat. Women washed clothes, at great stone tanks fed by a rill that issued from the rocks, conducted in a cane, and over-arched with vines.

As they knelt in a row, dressed in bright red and yellow petticoats, with scarlet handkerchiefs upon their heads, their wooden shoes appearing like canoes behind their tucked-up skirts, they sang, a natural, harsh, wild song that penetrated to the marrow of the bones. Sometimes from other working places or from fields, other high voices answered them, and so a dialogue went on, just as it passes between birds unseen in a deep wood, all in a minor key. Primitive bullock-waggons, with solid wheels, and sides of wicker-work, like those on Roman coins, slowly crawled on the roads. The gentle oxen, swaying to and fro, just as a man walks, wrapped in a Spanish cloak, appeared fabulous as they turned towards each other, when the driver touched them with his goad, or called them by their names, exhorting them to be themselves and pull. The wheels creaked with a jarring sound, and seemed to sing as if a swarm of bees had been imprisoned in the axle, making a noise which, as the peasants say, both stimulates the beasts and frightens wolves, and is agreeable to those who do not care for progress and modernity, or the sharp whiz of steam.

Under the brown-tiled eaves long rows of maize-cobs ripened in the sun, and on the bushes here and there red and blue rags, and petticoats were hung to dry, and stood out blotchily, like colours on a painter's palette, against the grass, and the metallic-looking scrub of arbutus.

In the minute and old-world gardens grew patches of cabbages, upon high stalks, like that which the old-fashioned Scotch knew as "long kale," and by the steps which led up to the houses plants of red salvia, and underneath the pollard oak trees, the autumn crocus spotted the grass like stars. Up many of the hills terraces of vines, all turning red and purple, mounted in tiers, and through the gorges now and then a distant bagpipe wailed like a soul in pain.

As the train wriggled like a snake through tunnels, the engine taking the short curves just as a bicyclist wheels in and out of heavy traffic in a street, creeping along the edge of precipices, and then emerging once again through woods into the cultivated fields, it passed a village, and drew up at a little station, near the river's bank. A crowd blocked all the place, and on the houses men stood gazing; boys seated in the trees looked down upon the lines; and as the porter, in a nasal voice, called "Los Peares, un Minuto," it was at once apparent that the cry was quite illusory, for piles of boxes, bags, and bedding crowded the platform, whilst the perspiring stationmaster struggled in vain to make a passage to the train. The crowd surged to and fro, and to the questions of the passengers, women in tears, and boys excited by the crush and noise, replied that the whole hamlet known as Val de Cabras was going to Buenos Ayres, taking their priest with them, to found another Val de Cabras, out on the southern plains. As always happens in a country such as Spain, where time is of no value, the people rushed about as if the Day of Judgment were at hand. The stationmaster, who, if no one had been in the train, would have allowed it minutes beyond its time, was sweating blood and water to get everyone on board. Old women hugged their sons, and men stood stifling down their tears, their patched and parti-coloured clothes looking in keeping with the scene. Girls raised an almost Arab wail, and in the midst of the confusion stood the priest, a stalwart, red-cheeked countryman, surrounded by a group of people, who held him, some by his hands, some by the lappels of his coat, and all pressed round him as a swarming hive presses about its queen, conscious he was the centre of their little world, wrenched up from its foundations, and so soon to be absorbed in the mysterious continent beyond the seas, which either swallows up their fellows, just as a fish sucks down a fly, or else returns them, rich and unrecognisable, at the end of years. And as the people struggled round the priest, those who had elected to remain behind, kissing his clothes, the men grasping his hands in theirs—hard, horny and deformed by toil—and asking for his blessing, he turned now and again towards the gate, behind which stood a row of donkeys and of mules, tied up to posts, with coloured blankets on their saddles, and their heads nodding in the sun. Women, with coloured flannel petticoats, red, green, and yellow, like a bed of tulips, clattered across the platform in their wooden clogs, and boys raised the shrill cry they use in Portugal and in Galicia when excited, which sounds like a horse neighing, and from the crowd of hot, perspiring men and women there came a smell as of wild animals, mixed with the scent of bundles of salt fish, which almost all of them bore in their hands. Some dragged great parcels wrapped in striped blankets tied with innumerable knots, and others carried on their shoulders the little ark-shaped trunks, covered with cowskin with the hair on, that look as if they had been made upon the pattern of a medieval coffin, which, on a platform, seem as if they mourned the bullock-waggon where they had passed their lives.

Hard, knotted hands reached out and grasped, for the last time, others as hard and toil-stained, which were thrust towards them through the palings, and men clasped one another with their heads looking over each other's shoulders, just as the patriarchs of Scripture embraced and wept upon each others' breasts, and quite as naturally. A universal sob shook the whole crowd, which billowed to and fro, like water agitated in a tank, resisting all the efforts of the stationmaster to get the train away at its appointed time.

At last, when all the bundles and the trunks, the water-bottles, and the poor household treasures, which the excited villagers, driven from their idyllic old-world life by weighing-down taxation, were taking with them, to wring and salve their hearts in the New World, were put on board, the priest was left alone, holding a bulky umbrella in his hand. The porter clanged upon the bell, the futile horn, which hangs upon a nail in Spanish stations, tootled feebly, and deep down below, the Minho dashing through the rocks, roared a farewell to those who, in the future, would, in the rivers they would know, hear nothing but an oily gurgle, and the occasional hollow sound of the alluvial soil as it fell into the deep and muddy stream, that had undermined the banks.

The emigrants all climbed into the train, and from the crowd assembled rose a cry, "The blessing, father; bless us once more before you go"; but he, standing with one foot on the steps, still looked towards the palings, when through the crowd a breathless boy came forcing his way, and dragging by a string a white and liver-coloured pointer, which, when it saw the priest, rushed forward, and fawned upon his knees.

Handing his umbrella to a woman in the train, he drew his left hand hurriedly across his face, leaving a snuffy mark, where it had met the tear, and then, patting the dog upon his head, murmured: "Adios, Navarro," and with an effort and a gulp, steadily gave his blessing, as the companion of his rambles whined and strained upon the rope.

Rough, friendly hands stretched out and drew the priest into the train, which, after jolting heavily, began to wind about through the deep cuttings in the rocks, emerging now and then close to the road, on which stood groups of people, waving and shouting their farewells. Just as it passed the last house of the village running close to the road, an olive-coloured man upon a mule, stood in his stirrups, and with uplifted hand made a cross in the air, as the train, gathering way, slipped past and, entering a tunnel, was swallowed up and lost to those who, standing on the platform, stood waving handkerchiefs, and gazed with yearning eyes at the last carriages as they vanished from their sight. Then it emerged again into the sun, and a girl washing by a stream, her donkey tied beside her, putting one arm across its neck, waved a red dripping petticoat, and the train, puffing and snorting, resolutely set its face towards that Buenos Ayres which was to make and mar its freight.

It bore them westward towards a land bare of traditions, of vegetation, of everything that hitherto had made their lives; a land in which their children would be educated men, not knowing good from evil, as their fathers in a rudimentary way had dimly comprehended them, where they would eat their fill and lose their individuality, becoming uncomprehending instruments of the greatness of a vast empire, and from whence they would regard Galicia with a mixed feeling of contempt and pity, after the fashion of self-educated men.

But every puff the wheezing engine made, it took the emigrants further away from their old, hungry, but idyllic life; further away from bee-hives, made from the section of a cork tree, and laid in rows amongst the lavender and thyme; further away from the sleek, mild-eyed oxen, and from the "romeria," where they had danced "muiñeiras" to the sound of "gaita" and of pipe.

No more the ploughman in the deserted Val de Cabras would return home at night, carrying his plough, after the fashion of the ploughmen of whom the Georgics treat, or girls at evening time gather round the steps of the stone fountains and gossip as their hooped wooden buckets automatically were filled through long tin pipes, fitted upon the iron nozzle, where the water flowed. Lovers would no more linger in the oak woods of an evening, and tell the tale that never wearies those who tell or listen to it, whether amongst the cistus-carpeted "robledos" of Galicia, or in the alleys of a town. Each jolt and jerk upon the coupling chain, and each white bellowing burst of steam, left the deserted village more deserted, more given over to the decay that soon would settle on it, when in the winter nights the snow would lodge unheeded on the roofs, and the wolves scamper through the streets.

And as it twisted on the track, winding and wheeling through the tunnels, and emerging now and then into the sunshine, the people, sitting hunched amongst their bundles, broke into a high-pitched song, which floated in the balmy, pine-scented air, and was taken up from one end to the other of the train. Cistus and lavender, thyme, burnet, and wild marjoram, germander, and the dead leaves of oak and chestnut, gave out their aromatic scent, and floating in the sun, white butterflies were borne across the Minho, skimming the streams, and soaring steadily across the linns.

Nature had put on all her charms, to make the parting bitter, and to fix more firmly an eternal sad recollection in their minds of their lost homes. Nothing was left of the departing village, but the name, and a few elders, who had remained behind to hunger and neglect; and in some other village, perhaps, Navarro, left to the care of some strange priest, sorrowed and wondered, for the great Power that chastens whom He cares for, extends a hand even upon the dogs of those He blesses with His love.

R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

Fiscal Fallacies.

II.

THE SINGLE TRADE TEST.

NINE-TENTHS of the case for Protectionism is rooted in the fallacy of false distribution, the separatist treatment of that which is inseparable, the contention that whatever is good for each of the parts is good for the whole. Though, superficially regarded, the Protectionist approaches of Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Balfour are wide apart as the poles, they meet in this common fallacy. Mr. Chamberlain's opening plunge into the controversy well illustrates the method. Healthy trade was to be tested by foreign trade alone, foreign trade by exports, exports by manufactured goods, and those only with protected countries, and, among protected countries, with the United States and Germany, and selected trades were to be taken in selected years. A natural cunning of popular exposition thus drove our Protectionists to find their strength in an appeal to the obvious self-interest of separate local trades. In our highly specialised industry the mind of every business man and every worker is necessarily concentrated upon a tiny local section of a single trade, and a public policy which claims to be "practical" is naturally tested by the effect it claims to produce in this trade. If, therefore, the Protectionist can prove by clear illustration the benefit an import duty seems able to confer immediately upon any trade, what more natural than that I should accept his view that what is good for my trade is good for every other trade, and so for trade in general? To the "practical" man it seems invincible logic. But, curiously enough, the philosopher may fall into the same pit. The severely unpractical reasoning of Mr. Balfour's first excursion into fiscal controversy in "Notes on Insular Free Trade," as well as his more recent disquisitions upon "broadening the basis of taxation," are vitiated by the same defect—an utter inability to grasp the unity of commerce. He shows us an enchanted island, under a fatal spell of non-resistance, surrounded by trade competitors which, placing prohibitive tariffs upon her trades, destroy them one by one and suck away her capital and her working population. This is only a fanciful exaggeration of what every Protectionist thinks is taking place here and now in Great Britain. Unless we repent we shall without doubt perish.

Now, in the rough and tumble of platform controversy, whatever weapon of fact or figure comes handy will be used, and the detailed errors of the assailants of Free Trade have been turned against them with immense effect. But the complete and enduring defence of Free Trade depends upon a clear, powerful grasp of the unity of the development of national trade. It is not sufficient to repeat the sound general maxims of free exchange; they must be vitalised and justified by showing how they still serve the cause of national industrial progress. Nowhere has this task been performed with such conspicuous success as in the little pamphlet just issued from the pen of Mr. Russell Rea, who, taking for his title "Insular Free Trade," sets the real island against Mr. Balfour's fiction. More expository than controversial in its method, it upholds the true policy of free imports as inhering in the normal organic development of our national industry. By a masterly analysis of the present conditions of our manufacturing and export trades, Mr. Rea shows, first, that the retention of our early monopoly of mechanical manufactures was impossible, and that the rise of other manufacturing nations has been beneficial not only to themselves, but to the world; secondly, "that this expansion of manufactures has not been at our expense, for, as a matter of fact (1) we are keeping the first call upon the trade of the world; (2) we are keeping the best of the trade; (3) we are keeping as much as we can do in good times." Finally, he shows that, while unemployment in bad times is common to all nations, "our Free Trade policy has to some extent moderated the alternation of good and bad times, which is the main cause of unemployment, and mitigated the severity of the effects of bad times on our industrial population." A further survey of recent tendencies leads to the conclusion that not only are our markets in the world expanding, but that we are trading at an increasing advantage, gaining more than we lose by the modern fall of prices, and that England retains her position as the best seat for manufacturing industries.

These conclusions are reached by a chain of reasoning based upon a genuinely scientific study of the evolution of industry under the changing conditions of modern work and wants. Each link is tested by an appeal to recent economic history, and the result is a complete justification of free imports as the national policy which enables us more fully than any other nation to exploit the natural resources of the world through the application of modern scientific methods of production and of transport. Its force and lucidity of argument, supported by illustrations drawn from a wide range of business experience, render it the most convincing document that can be placed in the hands of thoughtful waverers.

No other method of appeal, except from the part to the whole, from the single trade to general industry, is ultimately valid. The force of Protectionism as an intellectual movement disappears just as fast as one can lead the argument away from the single local instance to a wider and, from the political standpoint, a more genuinely practical view. Mr. Balfour's "subtle" sophisms are exposed in their naked folly by precisely the same method that avails for the man in the street. His notion that surrounding nations could suck the industry from a Free Trade island is, at bottom, identical with that of the most narrow-minded tyro in Fiscal Reform. So long as any one trade in a country got a tariff for itself, it could thrive in present profits; for, by raising its prices, it could take it out of the consumer and out of other trades in three ways—first, by reducing the amount of income left for expenditure upon goods produced by these other trades; secondly, by sucking into the protected trade capital and labour from unprotected trades; thirdly, by raising the expenses of production in any other trades where the protected product served as plant or raw materials. When the grievance thus engendered enabled a second trade to claim tariff support, the value of the tariff to the first trade is proportionately reduced, and the injury done to the body of unprotected trades doubled; and as each other trade is admitted, the gain to those inside the protected ring is reduced, while the injury to the diminishing number left outside continues to increase. Since it is thus evident that the gain to the protected trade depends upon and is derived from the existence of other unprotected trades, the net gain of all-round Protection must be nil, or less than nil, for the administrative costs of Protection must be defrayed. This argument, which, of course, omits the positive advantages of free importation, is only one of several exposures of the self-contradiction of Protectionism. The extraordinary delusions that exports are more desirable than imports and can dispense with them, the whole tangle of misconceptions based on a refusal to define "raw materials," almost all the pathetic confidence of Protectionists in their nostrum as a cure for unemployment, spring from what they conceive to be the "practical" method of considering each trade with each country separately, and arguing that what is true of each is true of all. The person who looks at the whole is a mere theorist. Part of the process of national education required to kill the Protectionist fallacy must be directed to lead business men and thoughtful workmen away from the pelting of single facts and figures to a broader understanding of the operation of industrial forces. For this work the wide diffusion of Mr. Rea's pamphlet will be invaluable.

J. A. H.

Letters from Abroad.

AUSTRIAN POLICY IN THE BALKANS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The question as to the nature and aims of the Balkan policy of Austria is as easy to ask as it is hard to answer. For there is, first of all, a double question contained therein—Do we understand by the Balkan policy of Austria-Hungary the policy of the joint government, or public opinion in Austria and Hungary in relation to the policy of the double monarchy? The official policy has undergone a very real and, perhaps, very important change, through the initiative of the present Foreign Minister. This was made clear by what Baron Aehrenthal said to the delegates. The question now is to what extent this turn of affairs receives the assent and sanction of the main political body.

The characteristic of the Balkan policy of Austria in the last quarter of a century has been the extreme, not to say, painful caution with which Austria has treated the Balkan peninsula in spite of, and since the time of, the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. In the full thirty years which have elapsed since the occupation Austria has laboriously refrained from setting the position of the monarchy on a lasting basis worthy a great Power, in the provinces which she then occupied and has since with great labour restored to civilisation. Not only so, but in the question which, for more than a decade, has been the real essence and the danger of Balkan policy, the question of Macedonia, Austria has only with great hesitation and all possible precautions taken any part in the development of affairs.

The ripest expression of this policy is the Mürsteg programme, of which the finished history now doubtless lies before us. The peculiar weakness in the handling of Bosnian affairs is always explained and excused in Austria as being due to the unfortunate dual form of the monarchy. It is true that Magyar influence, adhering to the tradition of friendship with the Turks, has had a crippling influence in this respect on the external policy of the monarchy. No less clearly, however, in Austria discontent has arisen with this state of things and the preponderance of the Magyars in the affairs of Bosnia.

The policy which Baron Aehrenthal explained in the last committee betokens, at any rate, a break with the tradition of anxious moderation, and at the same time a political advance. The Sandschak railway scheme, over the economic worth of which opinions are divided, has, at any rate, one distinguishing mark of superiority—that it is the first independent measure for dealing with Austrian political or economic interests that there has been for years. That any initiative in any direction, even in the narrower domain of our own interests, should take its rise in Vienna, is in such sharp contrast with the traditions of a whole generation that the astonishment and the stir the measure caused far exceeded what was due to its own individual significance. The fact comes as strange that in the sphere of external policy Austria could take individual action, even when her own nearest interests were at stake.

So far, then, the younger Austrian politicians greeted Baron Aehrenthal's action with approval. Difficult though it is to find a common basis for external policy in a kingdom of our peculiar type, formed from the juxtaposition of so many different peoples and forms of civilisation, still history offers us such a basis for the peaceful development of our political and economic influence in the Balkan peninsula. Even if the sharpness of the internal conflict in each half of the monarchy, as also the conflict of these with each other, has rather thrown into the background in these last decades the interest in a comprehension of this natural direction of our external policy, yet just lately, in the last few years, there have been movements in an opposite direction. The understanding of the great economic interests of Austria in the Balkans has long been increasingly prevalent among the masses of our population, and, as a natural consequence, also the wish, not only to preserve Austria's due sphere of influence in the Balkan States, but also to bring it to an energetic expression in the direction of commerce. In so far, then, the official foreign policy expressed, as it was, in the stronger action of the Freiherr von Aehrenthal, is certainly in harmony with the views and aims of leading political and economic factors in Austria. Fundamentally considered, moreover, the well-known interests of Hungary run parallel with this policy. We cannot, however, deny that, as in so many other domains, the opposition between the specific Magyar policy and the interests of the monarchy as a whole is here also unmistakably latent. But we must hope that a strong lead from our foreign Ministry in this special direction will be able to surmount the difficulties raised by Hungary.

It can be confidently expected that the path Baron Aehrenthal entered upon with the Sandschak Railway scheme will meet not only with the approval of public opinion in Austria, but also with the concurrence of the other great Powers. But the case is rather different with the second great Balkan problem, which occupies Austrian foreign policy, that is the question of Macedonia. Hard though it is in any country to give a sure judgment on the actual diplomatic conditions of the present, in Austria this difficulty is greater than anywhere else. For here, in accordance with a precedent which has scarcely ever been violated, foreign policy lies exclusively in the hands of the Sovereign and his advisers. Neither popular representation nor public opinion are in a position to have much influence. Moreover, if we consider the heterogeneous national character of Austria-Hungary and the different kinds of relations of the monarchy to the problems of the South-East, we shall see that it is impossible to speak of a united public opinion with regard to the actual Balkan policy—Germans and Slavs, Magyars and Rumanians, and among the Southern Slavs themselves again Kroatians and Servians, each stand on a very different footing with regard to the difficult questions which compose the problem of the Balkan policy of to-day. This allows the more free play for a foreign policy guided by the Cabinet in Vienna and immediately dependent on the Crown, a policy which regards as its natural goal the raising of the interests of the dual monarchy, as a whole, above the mass of confused and hostile individual interests of the different peoples, a foreign policy, in fact, which is for the good of the whole State. How far this difficult task succeeds is extremely hard to decide. Now, as to the latest development of the Austrian Balkan policy, there can be no doubt that as the complement of Baron Aehrenthal's forward movement in the question of the improved railway connection of Bosnia and the East, Austria has made a scarcely veiled withdrawal from the first rank of the Powers interested in the reformation of Macedonia. It is extraordinarily difficult for the outside observer to decide what part in the matter was played by the friendly diplomatic relations with Russia which appeared for a moment affected, but are now re-established, and what by the German-Austrian alliance and the peculiar position assumed by Germany in international politics.

But if the question is asked how this development is regarded by Austrian public opinion, it seems very important, especially as it affects public opinion in England, to make clear one fact. This is that it would be dangerous to deceive oneself into the belief that there has ever been a warm interest in Macedonian reform among the people at large. We can even affirm that the Mürsteg programme itself, with its feeble attitude towards the terrible Macedonian conditions which make so forcible an appeal for help—even this was regarded by some Austrian politicians as, perhaps, going a step too far. In England a philanthropic tendency in politics, supported by a strong section of the Liberal party, has busied itself zealously with the final pacification of Macedonia, but in Austria there is a complete lack of a corresponding movement in political life. Thereto must be added that in Austria there is a full comprehension of the enormous difficulties which lie in the fact that the individual Christian nations lead an internecine strife among themselves, and that the final pacification of Macedonia can only be accomplished by compulsion and with vast force and expenditure.

These facts only serve to strengthen the demand of all classes in Austria that she should not let herself be involved in political difficulties through a too bold and active Balkan policy. This explains the fact that a great proportion of Austrian politicians have, after some hesitation at first, greeted the attitude of Baron Aehrenthal as to Macedonian reform with ever increasing approval.

As things at present stand, it seems to Austria, which is urged on by no schemes of imperial expansion, that the most important task of her foreign policy is to help to further the re-establishment of peaceful conditions in the Balkan peninsula, and specially in Macedonia, zealously indeed, but in such a way that the Concert of European great Powers takes part unanimously in the action. There can be no doubt that the Macedonian question behind which, as Sir Edward Grey says, stands the question of Turkey, can never be brought to a final solution by a policy based on transactions with the Porte. For Austria, however, especially in regard to her many difficult problems of internal policy, there is no necessity at the present moment, or for some time to come, to initiate an energetic measure of reform for Turkey, especially as this would bring up the whole question of the integrity of the Turkish kingdom on the one hand, and on the other the whole position of the Monarchy in regard to foreign affairs. There is no doubt that a policy in this direction, which would serve the philanthropic ideals of Western friends of Macedonia, would bring us into direct conflict with the Power to which we are bound not only with a diplomatic bond, but with a union rooted in deep-seated inward need—I mean, of course, the German Empire. This is a possibility which no rational advocate of Austrian interests as a whole would wish to raise as a result of our Balkan policy.

The foregoing exposition will, I fear, appear very unsatisfactory to many English friends of Macedonia. But anyone who sees facts as they are cannot but disappoint the hopes of those who are counting on a popular enthusiasm in Austria for a radical reform policy in the matter of Macedonia. Of course, there is, even in Austria, a small number of politicians who wish intensely for a fundamental and lasting reformation of administration and law in Macedonia, not only on grounds of humanity, but in the interests of an economic strengthening of the Balkan States, from which Austria would benefit more than anyone. But even these few cannot shut their eyes to the pressing necessity for a cautious policy, produced by the web of hostile international interests in the Balkans on the one hand, and the internal state of the dual monarchy to-day on the other. Moreover, it must not be overlooked that the present political supremacy of the agrarian parties, unfortunately, stands in the way of a policy of industrial expansion, at once peaceful and energetic, in the South-East.

In short, the efforts of all European (including all Austrian) friends of Macedonian reform must be directed to bringing about the lasting, if slow, progress of reformation under the pressure of all the Powers. A reckless policy, which might attain the end more quickly, while incurring great dangers, is certainly not, for as far ahead as we can see, either the task or the aim of Austrian policy in the Balkans.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH REDLICH
(Member of the Austrian Parliament).
Vienna, April 5th, 1908.

The Drama.

THE NEW SHYLOCK.

As I watched Mr. Tree's interesting revival of the "Merchant of Venice," I wondered how a director of artists would proceed if he desired to give something like a suitable modern representation of the play. And it seemed to me very difficult to find an answer to such a question. If the action were followed quite literally, no twentieth century audience, gentle or simple, would endure it. The play is so diffuse, the thread of action is so loosely followed (thus the incident of the caskets is twice dropped before it is concluded), some of the humour is so broad, and some, again, so heavy, that any such act of fealty to the Shakespearian legend must needs be terribly avenged. Yet, in acknowledging that some changes and some abbreviations are necessary, we seem to condemn the poet's artistry. Why is it that while we never want to alter anything in Molière, where all is terseness, fitness, symmetry, Shakespeare's luxuriance seems to invite the pruning-knife? Is it because, as Tolstoy insists, Shakespeare wants Molière's moral directness and simplicity, and because his appeal is more sensuous, more confusing, more like the effect of the music that he must have loved, since he is always speaking of it and breaking into it? Whatever be the causes—and the advance of our best dramatic work in compression, logic, psychological truth and subtlety, must be reckoned among them—the critic finds it hard sincerely to blame the manager who "cuts" a Shakespearian play, or even re-arranges and transposes some parts of it.

All this Mr. Tree has done, as others have done before him. But he has not only subtracted from Shakespeare; he has added to him. He has invented a whole scene in which, without actually increasing our store of Shakespearian verse, he occupies the stage for some minutes while, as Shylock, he calls, in hoarse crescendo, on the levanting Jessica, and ransacks his forsaken household, lantern in hand. He has also imagined and grouped a great deal of picturesque "colour." Taking half-hints from the text, or acting without any hint at all, he plants Shylock's house in the Venetian ghetto so that he may introduce all kinds of life-like accessories, melancholy old Jewish music, heard through the doors of the synagogue, groups of Jews in cap and gaberdine, scuttling submissively over tiny painted bridges, or beaten by Christian mummers, stores of yellow and brown linen hanging over the tangle of medieval house-tops, mourning Jewish women sitting mute by Shylock's deserted threshold, and Shylock himself tearing his garments, grovelling on the earth, and sprinkling dust over his grey hairs. And much of this inventiveness, material as it is, is curious and interesting. It is interesting to see the grey-headed Doge walk into the court, featured and costumed like the famous Bellini in the National Gallery, to note that the columns of Portia's palace are framed after Paolo Veronese, and to watch a gondolier, or a gay follower, decked out as Carpaccio would have decked him. Such things consort with our modern ideas of "scholarly" art, our love of sumptuousness and decorative splendour, which, even though they lose half their effect in the hurriedly envisaged stage-picture, please our imitative modern souls and consort with Shakespeare's aristocratic art. Moreover, they are not purposeless; they do heighten the impression of the vivid, brilliant life of the Renaissance, running in mixed currents of refinement and ruthlessness, in which Shakespeare, its child, delighted.

But if these accessories to a gorgeous Shakespearian play be in some tune and keeping with its creator, one would think that an intelligent spirit like Mr. Tree would not be less alive to the necessity of giving full value to Shakespeare's qualities of charm and intellectual distinction. That, with this end in view, he would only engage actors and actresses trained to speak his verse with due emphasis, as, for example, Mr. Brydone, making a really magnificent entry as the Prince of Morocco, speaks it. That he would not allow Portia to hold converse in the pretty, clipped, mincing accent of a modern drawing-room. That he would make his Lorenzo rehearse the scene with Jessica in the moonlight until he could move the theatre to realise the beauty of the lines in which Shakespeare's rich but earthly fancy takes on an unwonted spiritual vesture. That he would not cut out one of Antonio's finest speeches in the trial scene—where nothing needs to be cut. Above all, that he would ransack the English stage until he had found a lady able to incarnate the divine Portia, most noble and most modern of all Shakespeare's women, to show her chaste and passionate, free and proud and yet fit companion and consoler to a hero, to speak as she spoke, move, and smile, and jest, and command as her author designed her. This Mr. Tree has not done for us; and until a manager of his resources and not inconsiderable intellectual gift fulfils the more serious of his dramatic tasks, he must not expect unqualified approval of his work.

Of his own Shylock one can speak with less reserve. It seems to me a very good Shylock, rightly, if over-ingeniously, conceived. It is more full-blooded than Irving's, more massive, more in keeping with Shakespeare's broad, direct, but not always subtle, vision, of human character and society. In passages, it was indubitably fine; the malignant rationality of the Jew's bearing at the trial could not have been better expressed. The figure towered, grim and menacing; in its fall it excited pity and even sympathy, for it revealed the hard pagan atmosphere of the play, with cruel Christian pitted against cruel Jew. Shylock's ironic Oriental salutations (a trifle Fagin-like these), his cold triumph, his defeat and despair, were truly, not merely sensationally, pictorial, as Mr. Tree chose to represent them; they showed feeling, not merely elaborated, carefully thought-out effects of melodrama. It is hard to say how far Shakespeare meant his audience to sympathise with such a man, how far he embroidered a mere anti-Jew story with the Christian philosophy of the barrenness of revenge, or how far he worked, as he seemed often to work, without a moral aim at all. Mr. Tree's Shylock leans, not too heavily, on Shylock's badness. It needed baser stuff than Hebrew patriots are made of to devise the bond with Antonio and to sharpen the knife for its execution, and if the literary spirit has turned Shylock's plea for vengeance into a charter of sympathy for alien races, it has probably read into Shakespeare's eloquence more than the context bears. The greater moral of the play would seem to be that from the ghettos of medieval Europe sprang such poisonous fruit as Shylock's hatred nurtured. All that one can see is that the Jew is frightfully wronged, and that, so far as his daughter's misdeeds are concerned, Shakespeare seems as callous as the virtuous Antonio, or the gallant Bassanio, or as Lorenzo himself, Christian gentleman and receiver of stolen goods. The rebound in Shylock's nature of all this hard-heartedness, envenomed by Antonio's Stock Exchange brutality, is the attraction of the drama; and Mr. Tree's rendering of it wants little in impressiveness. It does not gain in artistic seemliness and power by the invented "business" of the earlier scenes which I have described. But in the trial scene both the exultation and the suffering of Shylock were worthily rendered; and as the misery of the strong is always impressive, more especially when it has the Promethean touch of revolt against unjust governing forces, the actor has here to deal with great literary material. And his treatment was not unworthy of the theme. H. W. M.

Letters to the Editor.

"FISCAL FALLACIES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Laycock may think he "can answer Tariff Reformers all night without losing a point," but in order to do so he must adopt a different line of argument from that disclosed in his letter. It is, of course, quite true that a duty on imported motor-cars will raise their price, and that this rise of price will reduce the "demand," in the sense of the number demanded (or the quality demanded), though it will not necessarily reduce the "demand" in the sense of reducing the money expended on buying motor-cars. It is quite likely that more money might be spent on them, though not enough more to buy the same number as before at the higher price. Mr. Laycock is therefore, of course, justified in holding, as I hold, that the increase of employment in the English motor trade will not be equivalent to the loss of employment in the French trade that will result from the tariff.

But he fails entirely to recognise the plausibility of the Protectionist contention to the refutation of which my article was directed, for he persists in assuming that "the goods which would have gone to pay for these (foreign) cars are not required," and consequently that the labour which would have gone to making them will not be employed. If this is Mr. Laycock's platform reasoning, it is utterly invalid. These goods will not indeed be made for the export trade in order to pay for French motors, but they, or their equivalents, will be made for the increased home trade, in which they will be required to pay for English motors. It was in order to meet this plausible answer of the Protectionist that I wrote my article. Mr. Laycock, by refusing to recognise it, gives away his case.

One word in reply to a point raised by Mr. Phillimore, who denies that "British prices throughout the trade must rise," arguing that "though there may be a temporary rise of prices caused by the sudden dislocation, the increased demand for British cars will bring in fresh capital, and in time prices will fall to the old level." If "the old level" means the level at which the displaced French cars were produced and sold, why are we entitled to expect that fresh capital will enable the British cars to reach this level? When French cars were bought in preference to English under "free competition," we must assume that they could be made better or cheaper than the English cars which failed to get made and sold. Why should time and fresh capital ensure that this advantage of the French over the English economy of production will disappear? How will fresh capital assist? There was no lack of capital, but actually an excess, at a time when not only unemployed labour, but unemployed plant, was standing in the English motor trade.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. H.

April 6th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Two able writers have recently been discussing in your columns the best way of proving to the people the fallacies of Protectionism. They say many interesting things thereupon, but why do they assume that it is necessary to fight the enemy upon his own ground, and with weapons of his choosing? If I had to defend my life against a fencing-master, I should not stand upon the punctilios of the duellist when I had a chance of knocking him down with a cudgel.

It is an easy task for a ready speaker to make a case for Protection that will seem very plausible to an uneducated audience. It is easy for him to show that the makers of motor-cars might be benefited by a duty on foreign cars, while it would require a very clever speaker to explain, and a very attentive and intelligent audience to understand, exactly how and why such a duty would be injurious to the people at large. I doubt whether one per cent. of our population would understand it—but all can understand the old adage that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating." Decline to discuss these trivialities. Come to broad and solid facts. The proposal of Protectionists (or, as they choose now to call themselves, Fiscal Reformers) is to tax all imported manufactured goods, corn and meat. Their impudent assertion is that this would benefit the people.

It is easy to prove by facts innumerable that such measures do not, never did, and never can benefit the people; that they may, indeed, profit the landowners and the large trader, but at the expense of the rest of the community, and that all this misnamed Fiscal Reform agitation is engineered by the baser sort of capitalists in the hope of increasing their wealth by robbing the poor. A picture of the condition of the people in "the hungry 'forties" may touch the most sluggish imagination, and few working men could be led away by any fiscal fallacies if they were informed as to the lives of the proletariat in Protectionist countries.

The tendency of "our friends the enemy" to reckless and light-hearted theorising is amusingly shown by the letter of a "Constant Reader." I commend it to the notice of those who wish to see great national issues treated in the spirit of comic opera.—Yours, &c.,

FRANK BOWLY.

Charlbury, April 6th, 1908.

TARIFF REFORM AND MOTOR CARS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is it not easier to meet the Tariff Reformers by simpler arguments than those put forth by your correspondents?

Our imports of motor-cars and motor-cycles, valued at £2,486,337 in 1906, were only £2,080,166 in 1907. Our exports of the same were £208,041 in 1902, £808,242 in 1906, £1,106,961 in 1907; in words, our exports are steadily rising, our imports have commenced to decline.

If we take the test of numbers instead of values, we arrive at the same result. We imported 7,523 in 1906, only 6,589 in 1907. We exported 2,847 in 1906, 3,738 in 1907.

British resourcefulness is removing any excuse for "Tariff Reform."—Yours, &c.,

T. PALMER NEWBOULD.

Broadway Chambers, Ilford.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Phillimore says that after the temporary dislocation caused by a protective tax on motor-cars, fresh capital would be attracted to the industry, and prices would fall to the old level. If this were the whole truth, the Tariffites would be answered, for they would have to admit that a low price under Protection is less profitable than the same price under Free Trade. But the fact is, as Mr. Phillimore will remember, that when the fresh capital had come, it would, on finding that remuneration was growing less, migrate into other industries or be extinguished by loss.

Thus a protected motor-car industry would give us, first a "sudden dislocation," then a period in which it seemed as though Protection was going to do no good, then considerable losses for some firms, followed by a monopoly for the survivors and higher prices than ever. But the worst thing that happens is that when that second period to which Mr. Phillimore looks forward is in vogue, and the third period of loss threatens, the motor-car manufacturers apply for a second dose of Protection. Thus we go from bad to worse. The story of every tariff in the world is the same, and the prime fallacy at the back of the Tariffite argument is that Britons can arrest themselves on a slippery path that has proved too much for every other nation.—Yours, &c.,

G. G. DESMOND.

4, Pump Court, Temple, E.C.

"THE VICTORY OF FREE TRADE FINANCE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am glad you draw attention to the striking victory of Free Trade finance over Protectionism, as seen in the contrast between our Budget surplus and the German deficit. I am also glad to see that you lay stress upon the robbery and jobbery that every Protectionist tax involves. Incidentally, may I put right a slip, not in the argument, but in the figures? As two-thirds of our corn is imported, two-thirds, not one-third, of the proceeds would at first go into the Exchequer, and one-third would be passed from the pockets of the consumer into those of the landlord. This theft is already perpetrated in Germany. But there the crime is even greater, for the figures are reversed, and only a small fraction of the tax on cereals goes into the Exchequer; the rest is pocketed by the growers. What people do not always realise is that under Protection the larger the industry protected and the smaller the imports the greater is the iniquity; for so long as there is a constant import the price of the article must be raised to the full extent of the tax. Thus the more protective a tax is, and the more it stimulates the favoured industry, the more burdensome it becomes. Less and less goes to the revenue, more and more to the favoured class. No wonder that the German revenues are beginning to dry up as the "scientific" tariff wall is raised higher and higher.—Yours, &c.,

COBDENITE.

London, April 7th, 1908.

[We regret the inversion of figures to which our correspondent refers. It does not affect the argument.—EDITOR, THE NATION.]

"THE SIMPLE LIFE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is very kind of you to make my book, "The Townsman's Farm," the text of an article on "The Simple Life," but I venture to think that your clever contributor has hardly done justice to it as a practical work. I figure amusingly as a "dour man uttering disparaging remarks about country life," a "well-informed writer scattering thistle seeds and couch grass." You say: "The simple life of the country, evidently, has not yet produced the simple soul that makes a free gospel of the good things learned." No one reading your article would imagine that no fewer than six chapters of my book are devoted to considering the advice of experts, including nine professors of agriculture, with regard to training for the country at the agricultural colleges and on farms where they take pupils. There are two other chapters in which a small farmer gives, in the greatest detail, advice to the townsman as to how to succeed, as he has succeeded. Three other chapters show the openings on home and colonial farms. Quite a number of amateur farmers give their experiences in three following chapters; and there are nine further chapters which, whatever their faults, are as full of facts as they will hold, about how to set about fruit-growing, market-gardening, poultry, goat and bee-keeping, and "girl gardenering."

I am very sorry to have to trouble you with all this, but, if you will permit me to say so, your article is a very good illustration of the difficulty which the country expert constantly experiences when he endeavours to speak the truth about rural life and industry. The townsman wants him to start right off with recipes for turning an acre or fifty acres to the best advantage. The expert knows that it is his duty first to impress or try to impress upon the novice some basic facts of rural life. I have honestly put these in the forefront of my book. But if you will examine it you will see that I have "come to the hosses" before the fiftieth page of a work of more than three hundred pages. I expressly say in my preface:—

> "I hope this book may be the means of bringing many people into the country to live. But it will not be my fault if they come, either with an inadequate notion of the realities of rural existence, or with illusions as to the possibilities of making an income. Monetary gain in the country can only be secured by those who fit themselves for the business life of the rural districts with the same pains as they would expect others to take in preparing themselves for an urban commercial career."

and I hardly see how I could have taken more pains. It is the chief aim of my book to show them how to "fit themselves."—Yours, &c.,

"HOME COUNTIES."

April 6th, 1908.

ARE ARMAMENTS NECESSARY?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Does your correspondent really mean what he writes? If he does, he must have a very high opinion of the forbearance and self-restraint of other great Powers, which are girding their loins for the perpetual struggle for existence. Would he also suggest the abolition of the police force, which is a costly institution, but apparently necessary to the welfare of society? His remarks about the vegetable world are hardly correct. If a constant war were not waged on weeds, crops and flowers would stand a very poor chance, as any farmer or gardener could tell him. With regard to wild animals of the carnivorous order, man is constantly engaged in destroying them whenever possible, in order not only to protect his flocks and herds, but himself also.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

A nation contemplating suicide has but to render itself defenceless, particularly if it possesses assets which other nations covet.

I had a letter some time ago from the secretary of a person not unofficially connected with the Labour Party, in which he stated he would rather leave his country undefended than be called upon to kill a human being. Such sentiments may be noble, but are obviously not practical.—Yours, &c.,

HUGH PENNINGTON.

Cliffe Hotel, St. Margaret's, Dover,
April 5th, 1908.

THE DETECTION OF FIRE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reference to the interesting article in your last issue, headed "Theatre Risks," I should like to draw your attention to an important aspect of the subject. No matter what precautions may be taken there will always be fires, arising from causes known and unknown; practically it is the latter only that ever become serious. The two recent fires at Drury Lane and at Harrow School must be classified as being amongst the fires arising from unknown causes.

An analysis of the fires reported from year to year show that nearly every serious fire has its origin in some unknown cause. Loss by fire is a loss to the nation, and it is no argument for the insured to say his loss is covered by insurance. The scarcity of gold in this country during the last year or so must partly be put down to the immense sums of this valuable commodity which our insurance companies had to pay over out of the country in connection with the San Francisco fire.

It is reported that our insurance companies pay out in losses some seventeen million pounds per annum; to this must be added whatever is lost by persons who are uninsured, before we can get the loss of money which is due to fire annually.

The Government do not insure, and it would be interesting to know what has been lost in fires during recent years on Government property, such as dockyards, &c., and in how many cases the cause of the fire was unknown; and the approximate estimate of the time in each case which had elapsed between the starting of the fire and its detection.

No matter how good the construction of a building may be, nor how fireproof, it can still be brought to the ground by fire; but for this to happen the fire must be undetected for some considerable time; in other words, it must start in a portion of the building which for the time being is unoccupied, then it will probably be discovered only when it has gathered sufficient strength to burst beyond the confines of the place in which it originated, then it has body and strength which will tax to their uttermost the fire-extinguishing appliances which are brought to bear on it. A little luck on the side of the fire, such as a favourable wind or a further delay in calling the fire brigade, and it gets beyond control; this is what happened at Drury Lane and at Harrow School. Millions of pounds have been spent in the construction of buildings for the prevention of fire, and almost as much on our fire brigades and their appliances for extinguishing fire, but how much has been spent on appliances for detecting fire? Possibly a few hundred pounds. And yet, if serious fires are to be prevented, early detection is the most important, as a mere bucket of water applied to a fire, which is detected in its infancy, is far more efficacious than the whole fire brigade when the fire is beyond control.

Many firms employ watchmen to detect, report, and extinguish fires. The Drury Lane fire casts considerable doubt on their efficiency; it was left to a passer-by to discover the fire.

An efficient automatic fire alarm should be capable of preventing all serious fires, and there are several automatic fire alarms in use in this country at the present time. The functions they perform are to warn the inhabitants, and at the same time call the fire brigade, whenever the temperature of any part of a building reaches a dangerous heat, such as 200 degrees Fahr. If these instruments can be relied on to do this, serious fires will become a thing of the past. Common sense must admit that the principle of them is right; to see the benefit of them let us apply their action to the Drury Lane fire, and reconstitute the fire as far as one can.

A workman going into one of the rooms in which the scenery was stored knocks out his pipe or leaves a smouldering match; for many minutes this smoulders on, then a piece of the scenery starts smouldering. By this time the temperature of the ceiling will have caused the automatic fire alarm to operate and notify the fire brigade, and the watchman, with a bucket of water, could easily have quelled the fire. Unfortunately, there was no automatic fire alarm, and the smouldering fire gathered more and more body, and finally burst into a flame. It is seen by a passer-by; he thunders at the door and calls the watchman, who then telephones for the brigade—here again delay. This fire is typical of other large fires: for the first hour or so a bucket of water would have quenched it; for the next ten minutes a hydrant, or possibly a fire extincteur, could have extinguished it; but afterwards, when it burst its bounds, the whole force of the best fire brigade in Europe was necessary to save the adjoining buildings and property.

A little more money spent on apparatus for detection would mean the expenditure of less for extinction, and a large saving to the nation.—Yours, &c.,

FRANK ROWLEY.

Hampstead, April 8th, 1908.

PROTECTION AND PUBLIC PLUNDER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In dealing with Tariff Reformers the main thing that has, in my opinion, to be made clear is that their movement is not directed towards public good, but toward the private profit of certain individuals. No doubt there are many genuine believers in Protection. There are the retired Colonels and other people of that sort who write letters to the papers explaining how they would re-arrange our commerce. But these people, with all their zeal and all their ignorance, do not really amount to much, and could not of themselves keep the movement alive for a week. What gives it its vital force is something very different.

The men who are subscribing huge sums to pay lecturers, and to buy up newspapers, are not vexed with economic doubts or troubled with any anxiety about the good of the nation. Their object is simple, clear and straightforward, namely, to plunder the public by means of artificially increased prices. Their talk about unemployment rather reminds one of what was said many years ago about a certain Chancellor of what was probably a very modest exchequer: "This he said, not because he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief." Protection in most countries is nothing but a form of robbery; and it is not an economic fallacy, but a solid fact, corroborated by the experience of all the ages, that robbing the public when it can be done by legal means is a most lucrative form of employment.

The Tariff Reformers may be hazy in their economics, but they have got firm hold of this great truth. Their prime motive is the desire for plunder. That is what most of all needs to be driven home to the electorate.—Yours, &c.,

R. SHINDLER.

61, Chancery Lane, W.C.,
April 7th, 1908.

HAMBURG.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think that you are in error in stating at the foot of the first column of page 2 of your issue of the 4th inst. that "Incidentally Mr. Balfour showed that he was ignorant of the fact that Hamburg was a free port—a somewhat discreditable omission in his education as an economist."

My recollection of the facts is that Hamburg entered the Zollverein over twenty years ago, and is no longer a free port except in the sense that every port in this country is free in so far as goods may be landed under bond and re-exported without paying duty.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. Stevenson.

April 7th, 1908.

[Mr. Balfour's reference in the debate suggested that he was not aware of the extent to which, as our correspondent correctly states, Hamburg is a free port.—Editor, The Nation.]

PECKHAM AND MR. STIGGINS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. A. J. Marriott, in the closing paragraph of his letter, hits the nail on the head. He says, "Dash Mr. Stiggins. He is really the cause of all the trouble." As I remember, the Mr. Stiggins whose portrait was drawn by Dickens was a gentleman who regularly frequented the "Marquis of Granby" public-house, freely indulging in pineapple rum and other fermented liquors. So far, no doubt, Mr. Marriott is right—perhaps more nearly right than he knew—but when he poses as a constructive statesman he is not a conspicuous success. The Government are to "sweep the country" with a measure providing, among other things, that, at the end of seven years, "brewery companies or brewers must sell their houses." Think of it! Property-owners compelled by law to sell that which is their own, and (because the sale is a forced one) in many cases to sell at a loss. Think of what the "Liberty and Property Defence League" would say; of the effective (and successful) appeals which would be made to all classes of property-owners, with the cry, "It will be your turn next."

No, Sir, let Mr. Marriott concentrate his attention on the one great truth which has come to him, that "the cause of all the trouble" is a certain red-nosed person who spends his time in public-houses, imbibing ardent spirits. Impressed, as he ought to be, with this, let him approach Mr. Stiggins, and show him that under the Bill of the Government he will not be deprived of opportunities for boozing; that, indeed, those opportunities are not likely to be greatly diminished till "that liver complaint" of his, which Mr. Weller foresaw, shall have taken him out of the way. By doing missionary work of this kind, Mr. Marriott will be rendering a great public service, for on the withdrawal of Mr. Stiggins' opposition the Licensing Bill is assured of an easy passage into law.—Yours, &c.,

C. J. Back.

Wolverhampton,
April 4th, 1908.

WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have been much interested in reading the various letters on Woman's Suffrage which have appeared in several issues of The Nation, but there seems to be a divergence of opinion among the Suffragists as to how far women should be enfranchised. I was in Devonshire at the time of the Mid-Devon election, and there the cry was for "Votes for women householders"—a just plea surely! Since returning to London I find at the majority of Suffragist meetings the demand is for "Votes for married women" as well.

I should welcome Woman's Suffrage if I were convinced that it would redress women's grievances, and especially the sweated woman's labour, but the vote given to householders only would be a mere drop in the ocean; they would be in too small a minority to affect English politics at all. If the franchise were extended to married women, home-life would be broken up to a great extent.

The contest over the Licensing Bill at the present moment shows to what a state of bitterness politics reduce us when former friends of different parties cannot casually meet without abusing each other in such terms as "monstrous swindler" and "iniquitous thief." The picture of a husband and wife equally keen for or against such a Bill, absorbed in a whirl of the bitterest agitation on either side, ending with voting against each other, is a pathetic one. I leave aside all question of whether women are fit (physically or mentally) for the strain of public life, and confine myself to the fact that the moment women are pushed into the field of politics they will find themselves deprived of that other sphere of influence—the home.

I hear the cry that Woman's Suffrage would cure the terrible evil of woman's sweated labour, but it is on the strength of their trades unions, and not on their political votes, that men fall back to keep up the standard of their wages. It is the inability of women to combine under one leader, and to support that leader through the trials of a long struggle, that keeps the standard of wages so low. Even this great "Suffragette" movement, which has been a revelation to many in the strength of its organisation, fails because the leaders are not unanimous in their demands; some want one thing, some another, and thus the party is split up into various sections, each intensely scornful of the others. Surely it would be better if the Suffragettes, instead of lowering themselves in the eyes of reasonable people by their undignified demonstrations, were to join the leaders of the anti-sweating movement, to encourage the women of London to combine to stand out for a minimum wage. There is so much they could do in the way of clubs and unions for women workers to show that, if they get a vote, they will know how to use it.—Yours, &c.,

A Woman Conservative.

April 2nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—We have witnessed a rather interesting aspect of the Women's Suffrage question at the last few bye-elections. Standing among the crowd listening to the Peckham result last night, I was astonished to see known temperance enthusiasts and women Liberals shrieking for joy at the result.

What, we are entitled to ask, will be their course if they are admitted to the Suffrage?

They are now suffering wrongs and insults, real or imaginary, at the hands of "men," and feel justified therefore in using all their influence against their principles to spite their oppressors.

Of course, we understand they mean to be "naughty this once" and then "good for ever afterwards," but what guarantee have we?

Most sections of the electorate, even in the best-ordered of democracies, have reason to feel themselves wronged, slighted, even "virtually unrepresented" sometimes. What will be the action of the women voters under these circumstances?

Will they not turn, as they turned yesterday, in a wild passion, and vote (as yesterday they used their influence) blindly against all that they affect to regard as most sacred and lofty in politics?—Yours, &c.,

E. P.

March 25th, 1908.

Poetry.

A CHANCERY WARD.

Averil—your name was; often I forget
Your name, for all the music that it made,
Rather remembering the ivory shade
Pale on your cheek, small hands, grey eyes deep-set,
But warm with light, while your tongue—half-afraid
To prove our strident English—would parade
Some vagrom reminiscence of "Villette,"
'Till laughingly your French with English met.
And all the while you suffered: not your sin,
It was the curious malice of the world
That kept your eyes sometimes with tears empearled,
Or sank the voice that else rang clear and thin:
"If they must strive, who bade me once to be,
Why needs their strife this toll of tears from me?"

Valentine Barlow.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE first two volumes of Mr. Nutt's uniform edition of W. E. Henley's Collected Works will be issued about Easter. The edition is to be completed in seven volumes, two being given to the "Poems," two to the "Essays" in prose which have not hitherto been gathered together, two others to the famous "Views and Reviews," and the remaining volume to the four "Plays" which Henley wrote in collaboration with R. L. Stevenson. The edition has been a long time under way, but it probably arrives at the right moment, for there are several signs of a revival of interest in Henley. One of the best recent appreciations of his work is that by Mr. G. K. Chesterton in the opening number of "The Bibliophile"—a periodical of great promise to which we offer a hearty welcome. Henley, says Mr. Chesterton, was a man thoroughly by nature a poet, who forced himself, against all his own emotional trend, to be a boisterous and topical ballad-monger.

> "Unfortunately in his life-time, and especially in his later years, Henley hid himself behind the mask of what he thought he ought to stand for. Somebody told him, or he somehow got into his head, that he was the representative of rude energy and militant empire. His talents were entirely in the other direction. So far from specialising in strength, he describes in his most penetrating poems a condition of beautiful weakness. . . . He caused his own exquisite voice to be drowned in the clamour of his own quite fictitious reputation as a sort of political ruffian. He drowned his own voice in his own big drum. But anyone who cares to-day to take up one of his books of poems will suddenly find himself in an atmosphere very unexpected and very calm. He will break into a sudden stillness. He will read a few quiet poems about grey streets and silver sunsets. He will find that the poet has a peculiar power of describing the voiceless and neglected corners of a great city; the little grass-grown squares, the little streets that lead nowhere. . . . All will seem full of a kind of quiet irrelevance; and yet the very foundations of the reader's heart will be moved."

This strikes exactly the right note. It is Mr. Chesterton at his best, and it is the criticism which will do most for Henley's reputation.

* * *

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS will issue next month an illustrated edition of Jane Austen's novels, the pictures of which are to be by Mr. Wallis Mills, while Mr. Brimley Johnson has supervised the text and added bibliographical and biographical notes to each novel. Judged by the test of the number of editions that have appeared—not a bad criterion in the case of an author who has been dead for nearly a hundred years—Jane Austen is by far the most popular of English women novelists. Charlotte Brontë probably comes second, and George Eliot third. Another woman novelist who once had a great vogue, but now seems to be unduly neglected, is Charlotte Yonge. Messrs. Macmillan are, however, issuing some of her stories in attractive form at a low price. It will be remembered that Burne-Jones, William Morris, and the Prae-Raphaelites, while at Oxford, adopted as their model Sir Guy Morville, the hero of "The Heir of Redclyffe." Charles Kingsley said that "Heartsease" was the most wholesome and delightful novel he had ever read, and Dr. Whewell classed "The Clever Woman of the Family" as the first of English novels.

* * *

MR. J. GRAHAM BROOKS, whose brilliant series of lectures at the School of Sociology and Social Economics has just come to a conclusion, will shortly issue through Messrs. Macmillan a critical study of the chief criticisms that have been passed upon the United States during the nineteenth century. The book is to be called "As Others See Us," and Mr. Graham Brooks has adopted the plan of examining the views expressed upon American politics, manners, religion, education, and so forth, by about seventy of the leading foreign writers who have concerned themselves with American affairs. By this method the reader will be furnished with a sort of chart or plan of the progress made by the United States throughout the century. As Mr. Graham Brooks is one of the leading authorities upon the sociological problems of the American Republic, his book is certain to be a valuable contribution to social science.

ANOTHER important book on American affairs to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan is Professor A. C. Coolidge's "The United States as a World Power." It discusses in detail and with many comparisons the situation arising from the formation and growth of the United States, the composition of its population, its economic status, the Monroe Doctrine, the Spanish-American War and the acquisition of colonies, the relations of the United States with this country and other European Powers, as well as with Canada and the countries of Latin America. Of special interest in view of recent events will be the discussion of the presence of the United States in the Pacific, and its relations with China and with Japan.

* * *

THE short story, if not one of the highest forms of literature, is at least a literary type whose popularity is assured. There should, therefore, be a large public for a new series, "The World's Story-tellers," which is announced by Messrs. Jack. The aim of the series is to give in handy volumes some of the characteristic masterpieces of English and foreign writers of short stories. The first volume to be issued will contain three of the most famous tales of Théophile Gautier in Lafcadio Hearn's fine translation. This is to be followed by stories of Hoffmann, Balzac, Poe, Chateaubriand, Boccaccio, Cervantes, Tolstoy, and others. The general editor of the series is Mr. Arthur Ransome, whose "History of Story-telling" is to be published during the autumn by the same firm. Mr. Ransome contributes an introduction to each volume, in which he gives a picture of the author's personality and an account of his characteristics as a writer, special stress being laid upon the influence which each author has exerted upon the art of story-telling. The plan is an excellent one, since there is a large number of readers who will be glad to have the finest short stories of the world in cheap and handy form.

* * *

"THE STORY OF BRITISH DIPLOMACY: ITS MAKERS AND MOVEMENTS," by Mr. T. H. S. Escott, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will have ready this month, traces the varying tendencies which have been operative from time to time, and have reflected themselves in the relations between England and other nations, from the period when English diplomacy began to be methodised under the early Tudor sovereigns down to the present time. Mr. Escott begins by a rapid survey of the earlier period of English diplomacy which ended with the Peace of Ryswick in 1697, but the greater part of his narrative deals with the eighteenth century and onwards. The diplomacy connected with British development from the Crimean to the Transvaal War is examined in detail, and the events of the last Hague Conference are also considered. An important branch of the subject which Mr. Escott keeps in the forefront is the progressive organisation of the Foreign Office, and the share that each of its famous servants have contributed to its political traditions and efficiency.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Germany in the Early Middle Ages: 476—1250." By William Stubbs, D.D. Edited by Arthur Hassall. (Longmans. 6s. net.)

"Memories of Men and Books." By the Rev. Professor A. J. Church. (Smith, Elder. 8s. 6d. net.)

"Limbo, and Other Essays." By Vernon Lee. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Tragedy of Korea." By F. A. McKenzie. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

"Montreux." Painted by J. H. Lewis and M. H. Lewis. Described by Francis Gribble. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

"My Belief: Answers to Certain Religious Difficulties." By R. F. Horton, M.A., D.D. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Advanced Golf." By James Baird. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Grey Knight." By Mrs. Henry De La Pasture. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

"L'Idéal Moderne." Par Paul Gautier. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

"Œuvres Posthumes." Par Charles Baudelaire. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France. 7fr. 50.)

"Walt Whitman: L'Homme et son Œuvre." Par Léon Bazalgette. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France. 7fr. 50.)

"L'Education intellectuelle et morale." Par Gabriel Compayré. (Paris: Delaplane. 4fr.)

"Les jours s'allongent." Roman. Par Paul Margueritte. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

BONAPARTISM.*

For suggestiveness of utterance, aptness of illustration, and a condensation which makes it impossible to realise that this is but 120 pages of normal print, it would be difficult to overpraise this little volume. There is here set out in a form more lucid and eloquent than in many voluminous monographs and histories, a masterly analysis of the principles and bed rock powers and weaknesses of the Napoleonic Empires. Bonapartism was no reckless despotism, dependent on military glory and independent of the popular will. It was a definite system of government in which the common people approved a principle fatal to liberty—as liberty is understood in the modern world. It rested upon an autocracy based on the plébiscite. It appealed to the workman and the peasant and the soldier, against the intellectuals; and it never appealed in vain. Four months before Sedan the Liberal Empire received the endorsement of seven millions of voters: and making every allowance for manipulation and official influences, few can doubt that this was indeed Government by consent of the people. The Revolution of Brumaire and the coup d'état have been denounced in passionate invective by the poets and men of genius whose voices they silenced and whose schemes of society they overthrew. They were brutal measures, brutally conducted. But they had France behind them, which had declared emphatically against the poets and the men of genius and the schemes of society which they supported. There was nothing here comparable with the shooting of the crowd by the Russian autocracy, or the suppression of the popular demand for free Government in Hungary, in Italy, or in Poland after the revolution of '48. Before Brumaire, "when Bonaparte landed at Frejus," says Mr. Fisher, "having escaped the vigilance of English cruisers, a thrill of delight and relief passed through France." "Every peasant I met," wrote Fievée from the Bourbonnais, "in the fields, the vineyards, and woods, stopped and asked me if there was news of General Bonaparte, and why he did not come back to France. No one inquired after the Directory." Nearly forty years afterwards, the death of another Republic was received with equal popular approval. In the election of Napoleon III. for Prince President, "How should I not vote for this gentleman," said a peasant to Montalembert, "I whose nose was frozen at Moscow?" "The plot of Brumaire," says Mr. Fisher, "was forgiven in the greatness of the achievements to which it was the prelude, while the bloodstain of December proved to be indelible." It was indelible as a black stain in the current of the spiritual life of Europe, because Victor Hugo and Mr. Swinburne, and other great voices of the century, cried aloud for vengeance and reparation. But the French people had forgiven: had accepted the Bonapartist theory of Government, and had no wish for the return of those fine gentlemen who could write good verses and make eloquent speeches, but could give no lead in battles, nor restore the altars of religion, nor establish, in the interests of the common people, large and practical schemes of social reform.

It is an old antithesis, existing since absolutism first was overthrown, and destined to endure to the end of time. Liberty and democracy were accepted in the theory of sanguine thinkers of the mid-century as being legitimate bedfellows. In practice they are often as far as the poles asunder. Bonapartist France accepted the idea of Equality: in the name of Equality it was content to repudiate the idea of Liberty. The opponents of the Government were gagged and suppressed, the newspapers muzzled, Parliamentary Government reduced to a sham. The first Empire marked "an end of the bold curiosity of the eighteenth century, which played so nimbly over the whole surface of human belief." "The price which France paid for order was the silence of poetry and the death of criticism." And amongst the "ugly features" of the Second Empire, Mr. Fisher notes "the absence of large and generous principles in public life." "As the great issues were removed from the sphere of legislative responsibility, personal jealousies filled the vacuum. 'The present régime,' wrote De Tocqueville, 'is the paradise of the envious and the mediocre.'" The Emperor above, the peasant below, with between a centralised bureaucracy of willing servants: that was the machine in its completion; the most wonderful machine for war and the restoration of order from anarchy that the world has ever seen. The career was to be freely open to all. Men of wealth and birth, if inadequate, were to count as nothing—did for a time count as nothing—before industry, capacity, and personal ability. "The declared principle," wrote Napoleon to Jerome, "is to choose talents wherever they can be found." Even when the bureaucratic machine broke under the stress of foreign invasion, and the weight of the world in arms against him, the peasant soldiers—the Army—never failed Napoleon. He had looked through Paris—the Paris which for the Liberals and cultured appeared to be France—into the France which lay behind it: he read its needs and gave it what it desired. "He looked beyond the clever sophisticated people in Paris, for whom Voltaire represented the sum of human wisdom, out into the fields and the teeming villages." He realised what they dumbly desired, with a kind of patient hunger; security in the land which they tilled, the restoration of the old religion which had been overthrown, "a master who would quell the red politicians, make peace with Europe, and send up the price of Government stock." He gave them all they desired: in return they gave him such devotion and extravagant energy, as not only dragged France back from a dying anarchy, but lifted the nation to the most intoxicating triumph that any civilised nation has enjoyed, and put its master into the position of the overlordship of the civilised world. "When the Empire fell, the imagination of the world was touched by the sudden catastrophe of so much greatness. Here in the field of action, were events more wonderful than the 'Arabian Nights,' the matter for a thousand poems, histories, and centuries." The echoes of the noise of that falling have reverberated through Europe for a hundred years.

And the ultimate problem remains still unsolved. The democracy demand two devotions—their religion, which the intellectuals despise, and more desirable social life, which seems to the Liberals incompatible with freedom. Bismarck, fresh from his astonishing military conquests, thought he could suppress both these demands, and in the name of the Prussian aristocracy fought the Red and the Black Internationalism. Both of them proved strong enough to triumph over and defy the victor of Sadowa and Sedan. Liberalism to-day is fighting an unequal struggle against these two popular movements, embodied in the Catholic Church and an International Socialism. In France it appears for a moment to have triumphed over the one, in Germany over the other. But both these movements think less in years than in generations; and the end is not yet. Bonapartism harnessed both to its chariot wheels, and found strength to drive down all the roads of Europe, with such triumph as that which Heine witnessed when the Emperor, riding into Dusseldorf in 1811, seemed to have written on his face with its hue of marble: "Thou shalt have no gods before me." Will this demand for a religion which Liberalism has repudiated, and for a Socialism of which Liberalism is terrified, lead inevitably to a renewed Bonapartism? The material is there, stronger to-day than yesterday. But the man is the key-stone of it all. It is doubtful if Bonapartism is compatible with a dynasty. Behind the plebiscite and the democratic satisfaction stands the figure of the most wonderful of all the children of mankind. He came in the fullness of the time, to "fuse the old France with the new." With supreme military ability, melodramatic eloquence, a piercing insight, and a power of attracting the devotion of masses of the people, he united "an immense capacity for relevant labour." "I am always working," he said once to Roederer; "at dinner, at the theatre. At night I get up to work. Last night I got up at two o'clock, put myself in an arm-chair before my fire, to examine the field state sent in yesterday by the Minister of War. I found twenty mistakes." "I know more in my little finger," he once declared, "than is known by all the heads in Italy put together." The boast was justified.

A Napoleon II., inheriting a limited and baffled France—if the Fountainbleau abdication had been accepted—would probably have proved the incompatibility of the Bonapartist system with prolonged periods of quietness and security. But the Second Empire was made at St. Helena. The greatest work in many respects which Napoleon accomplished was in the days of his utter overthrow, chained to a rock in the Mid-Atlantic, no longer, in the gleeful rejoicing of the old Kings, able to terrify the world. Many men have altered the boundaries of the world during their lives. This man settled the fate of Europe thirty years after his death. The times of glory and action established the Napoleonic prestige; the times of overthrow and enforced idleness settled the Napoleonic tradition. "The Battle of Waterloo,"—so the echo came from the remote prisoner—"the Battle of Waterloo has been as fatal to the liberties of Europe as the Battle of Philippi was fatal to those of Rome." And the people listened, and wondered, and approved. "Our situation here may even have its attractions," said that "Prometheus of St. Helena"; "the universe is looking at us, we remain the martyrs of an immortal cause. Millions of men weep for us, and glory is in mourning." He declared to the attentive millions what he had fought for. "He stood for the Revolution, he defended the principle of nationality, he never deviated from his love of peace; he respected the influence of religion in society. I asked for twenty years," was his cry; "Destiny only gave me thirteen." "France never ceased thinking of the old things," as Treitschke reminds us, "of the songs which the peasant women had sung at their looms, and of the cottage walls hung with cheap lithographs of the triumphs and the paladins of the Napoleonic Wars." "La France s'ennuie," was Lamartine's fatal verdict on the Bourgeois monarchy. In 1840, when the body of Napoleon was brought back from St. Helena, "the sentiment of the people was so stirred that some onlookers remarked that the Second Empire was already made." A few months afterwards the official representative of Bonapartism was tried for high treason and conspiracy against the existing régime. "I represent before you," he declared to his judges, "a principle, a cause, and a defeat. The principle is the sovereignty of the people: the cause that of the Empire: the defeat, Waterloo. You have recognised the principle, you have served the cause, you wish to avenge the defeat." Seven years of imprisonment, endured with unfaltering faith and patience, a daring escape, a year of exile, led to the most sensational of all triumphs. "He stood as the candidate of the peasantry, and the Army, as the heir of a great tradition, as the pledge of vague, unmeasured aspirations." He received more than four million votes. Lamartine, the poet, orator, and historian, who had saved France in 1848, polled no more than eighteen thousand.

* Bonapartism. Six Lectures delivered in the University of London. By H. A. L. Fisher. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d. net.

Would the Second Empire in any case have stood the test of time? Possibly, it may be safely asserted, except for a singular vicissitude of fortune. Bonapartism might have survived Sedan as it survived Waterloo. It perished in a remote region of South Africa, and the death in inglorious skirmish, of the heir to the tradition, who showed signs of a genius not incomparable with that of Napoleon the Great and Napoleon the Little. Had the stirrup leather of the Prince Imperial in that fatal hour of testing been made of sound material, instead of paper, Bonapartism might today be exhibited as a living and operative system in the world; instead of standing but as a phantom of the past, the memory of a once all-conquering cause.

A GLIMPSE OF SIN.*

Browning sometimes treated history in this dramatic but allusive way. Sometimes he would take a crisis in the story of some historic man or woman, and give the actual words that might then have been used, without explaining the crisis further. His "Cristina and Monaldeschi" is an instance. The words throughout are Cristina's; there is no explanation of any kind. The reader is supposed to know beforehand what is happening, and the method is so allusive that, unless he does know beforehand, it is no good his reading. He had better leave it alone, for from the mere words as they stand he will learn nothing, or, at best, he will learn only a tenth part of what is there.

To Greeks who knew their stories of gods and heroes from babyhood, this way of treating their mythology gave no difficulty; and in the days when the Bible was intimately known among us and formed almost the only literature of the English people, an unexplained allusion to its histories did not seem at all strange. But when the subject is an episode in Cristina's life, or in the story of the Borgias, which Mr. Swinburne has here chosen, only students can understand. It is true that a reader who had never heard of the Borgias could still make something of "The Duke of Gandia." He would understand from the bare words of the dialogue that one brother murders another, and, perhaps, he would discern that there was some horrible secret between the two brothers and their father, the Pope. He might even feel something of their mother's terror, jealousy, and grief. But he would remain blind to the power of these four short scenes, because their power is not in the words as they stand, but in hints and echoes from things outside them—things that the scholar knows, but the ordinary man, untrained in Italian history, could hardly guess. Mr. Swinburne has always been inclined to assume readers as learned as himself. That makes much of his prose essays so difficult, except for specialists. The dramatic poems of "Rosamond" and "Chastelard" are saved from obscurity by the plain and simple situations, but an audience must be something of historians to understand "The Queen Mother," and now it is the same with "The Duke of Gandia."

The choice of time and subject is characteristic of the great poet we have known. In the Papal Court of the Sixth Alexander shone a splendour of sin unequalled since the Imperial Court of Nero reigned in magnificent abomination upon the same Seven Hills:—

> "When thy gardens were lit with live torches;
> When the world was a steed for thy rein;
> When the nations lay prone in thy porches,
> Our Lady of Pain."

In Alexander's Court was seen the same unbounded power, the same abundance of world-collected treasure, the same curiosity in wickedness, the delighted defiance of laws and observances established by ancestral piety, the hideous relationships followed by hideous crimes, the abolition of conscience, the passion for artistic beauty. To Alexander's Rome, as to Nero's, it had been granted to outstep the limits of human pleasure and shatter the holy little bonds that tie mankind together:—

> "To say of shame—what is it?
> Of virtue—we can miss it;
> Of sin—we can but kiss it,
> And it's no longer sin."

Nero perceived the charm of escape from the trammels of dull old laws and the sacred usages of Numa. It was a joy to burlesque the Roman matron and the quiet deities of hearth and road and tomb. But the days of faith were already vanishing far behind; the augurs had almost ceased even to laugh. Even the Good Goddess, even the Vestal Virgins were suspect, and now it seemed a little difficult to discover a peculiar wickedness outrageous enough for delight. It is tame sport to mock a dying god. Already satiety hung suspended by a hair over the head of pleasure, and for the adventures of sin the ruler of the world felt the lack of opposing virtue:—

> "Ah, where shall we go then for pastime,
> If the worst that can be has been done?"

To Cæsar Borgia the solemn restraints of centuries were nearer at hand, and they had been far more stern. Rome and Europe for the most part were bound by them still, or at least professed them sacred. There was still a fresh and added joy in tearing them apart, in defying the recognised sanctions of existence, and shaking one's fist in the face of Powers still enthroned within the skies. In Europe when the fifteenth century was just ending, the strict commandments of heaven and hell had not ceased to sound with authority, and the pathway of sin was still bright with strange possibilities. The Borgias, dwelling in the sacred heart of Europe, could set out along that pathway, like new discoverers, with freshness and the sense of liberty unimpaired. That they dwelt in the sacred heart of Europe, that Alexander, father of Francesco and Cæsar and Lucrezia —all three—was worshipped through Christendom as God's voice and Christ's Vicar upon earth, just added the final stimulus of irony to the family pursuit of beauty and abomination.

* "The Duke of Gandia." By Algernon Charles Swinburne. Chatto & Windus. 5s.

The final step in that pursuit is the poet's theme, and in these few pages he suggests rather than reveals the beauty, the horror, and the irony of it all. The one touch of common humanity, of our daily affections and shame, to say nothing of decency, is shown in Vannozza, the Pope's concubine, and mother of his monsters. She is not of the breed, but stands entangled among them by habit, motherhood, and continual fears. Of Lucrezia we only see the face that makes pale the sun in heaven, the beautiful face without shame, and the soul shameless as the marble of a wanton image. Francesco is only weakness and sin and folly before we see him die:—

> "And he
> Drifted, and caught the moon across his face
> That shone like life against it: and the chief
> Till then sat silent as the moon at watch,
> And then bade hurl stones on the drifting dead
> And sink him out of sight; and, seeing this done, > Rode thence, and they strode after."

Pope Alexander, Christ's Vicar on earth, is still haunted with shivering ghosts of religion, of natural compunction, or at least of custom. Now and again he falls into the habitual language of the Church, and always with a heightened irony for those who know, whether it be his concubine, his children, or the reader. "Jest not with God" are his words on entering, and his words are the finest jests of all, till at last his son Cæsar shows him to us weeping as a woman, howling as a wolf, above his other murdered son, but hale and whole none the less, and ready to share with Cæsar the place of God to all the world.

The joys of such a brood, littered in the glories of God's throne, are the ironic motive of the play, and, naturally, the motive finds its strongest phrase in Cæsar, now Cardinal and hinge of heaven's gate. In him Rome saw again "the implacable beautiful tyrant, Rose-crowned, having death in his hands." His mouth is full of obscene blasphemy, and his face has never shown shame or pity. Neither regret nor repentance have place after his crimes, and he alone can speak with ease and joy of things unspeakable. But beauty he loves, and strength. He could impose himself upon the world, and if he sang amid a city's shrieking, it would be with no "thin and rusty voice," like Nero's. For in Cæsar Borgia the young nature of the renaissance had given birth for once to Satan in his most faultless incarnation, the superman of sin.

The language of these dramatic scenes is, as a rule, stern and quiet; there is little of the unchecked exuberance and over-emphasis that used to be the poet's danger. One new and peculiar habit of verse every reader must notice: the frequent use of an isolated monosyllable at the beginning of a new line. Take three instances, all within the second page:—

> "With more Italian passion than brought forth > Me."

or,

> "Mother beloved and hallowed. I desire > More."

or,

> "Thou wast ever sleepless as the wind—
> A child unhungered for thy time to be > Man."

There is hardly a page in which this trick is not repeated. But let us not insist on criticising a gift from the one great poet still left to be our honour.

A FRAGRANT PAST.*

Rachel Gurney, of the Grove, Norwich, was born in 1794; and her letters, edited with conscientious care and wholehearted love, bring "a breath from a simple fragrant past—a few bits of withered lavender from a garden where it bloomed." When Rachel was a child "coaches and broad-wheeled waggons rattled over the paved streets" of the famous weaving city. When she was twelve, the Grove family made a three months' tour in the Midlands and North of England. The parents and seven children travelled in chariots and on horses, and the children kept a Journal. It tells of a stay at Buttermere, of drinking tea with Southey, and of climbing Skiddaw. At Hull, they find "the Baltic and Greenland trade are the principal—40 sail of Greenlanders, just arrived, perfumed the streets most unpleasantly."

Half a dozen years later, Rachel is in York Minster, where the anthem "with the beautiful organ, delighted even my unmusical ears." At Norwich she attends the Friends' Meeting, and writes to a sister, "Nothing can, I think, exceed Betsy as a minister." Betsy is known to us as Elizabeth Fry, née Gurney, a cousin of Rachel's.

M. Bardelin was tutor to the Grove girls for nine years; he is delighted to be back in France in 1814: "C'est tout fini, Louis est proclamé par la nation française, Buonaparte se retire,—La France et l'Europe seront heureuses." Next year Rachel writes from Exmouth that she has seen Napoleon on board ship. "He laughed to see the English coming to see him. . . . He sailed yesterday morning very early. The coast looked so beautiful, and the bay lovely."

The child of seven had written to her father that "the pigeons and doves have got each another young one. The Grove looks very pleasant; everything is very green and fresh. Dear little Emma asked for thee to show her a book the evening after thee went." Her letters retain a simple style throughout, in striking contrast to the parental ponderosity. At eighteen she is reading the Book of Job in Hebrew, writing out Alfred the Great's Will in Anglo-Saxon, and translating his version of Orosius. She gets so tired of herself and everybody else whilst attending May Meetings that "I ran off and read a little Homer, which was as beneficial as a sermon to me just then." Rachel hopes to join her sister in Darlington very shortly. One reason is that "all my old gowns are slitting at the elbows, and I must not touch my new ones on any account, as they are all laid up in lavender for the North."

She dated her chest delicacy from exposure to cold as they returned from the North. After being snowed up at Swaffham for three or four days, they left "preceded by a waggon with seven horses, and men in it with shovels to cut away the snow." Then follow three years of heroic struggle. She cannot understand "not being allowed to breathe the fresh air when the weather looks so delightful," but the doctor has ordered her to try the close air of London city; so to Birch Lane, Spitalfields, the invalid goes. "Maria Sewell (authoress of 'Black Beauty') is very kind in coming to see me."

The close air of London city has done her no good. Devonshire is tried: "it appears to me that the chances of my recovering my strength or not are even, I cannot feel them greater. . . . Perhaps thou wilt hardly understand me when I say I do not know what it is to have an uneasy thought about myself; I feel as if I had nothing to do with the business but to bear the present evil, and to leave the future." She smiles to see the profound silence that the family maintains about her health; she hears the father sigh as she leans on a great stick and her brother's arm. The doctors bleed her week after week, and send her to Nice. It was a great undertaking to winter on the Riviera the year after Waterloo, and two months were occupied in the journey. Ill as she is, she clings to life: "how very dear you all are to me."

The Editor tells with restraint that the once sweet full face is now thin and pale; the patience and sweetness are tried by torture and pain. "Her mind remains clear, her eyes bright to the end, but with a pride that makes the heart beat faster, let it be written here that she stood the supreme test." No word of murmuring passes her lips. The first June morning of 1817 breaks over the Maritime Alps, illuminates the blue Mediterranean, and lights up the orange groves. Rachel is asleep: "it is the endless sleep in which she has closed her eyes, and Rachel's rest has come."

* "Rachel Gurney of the Grove." By Sir Alfred E. Pease. Headley Bros. 18s. 6d. net.

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.*

This is the first instalment of what promises to be the most elaborate history of our national literature which has ever been attempted, but we must frankly say that it has greatly disappointed us. Its title, to begin with, is a misnomer. The work should be more properly described as a series of independent essays by various writers, chronologically arranged as chapters in a consecutive narrative. To being history of our literature in the strict and correct sense of the term it has no more pretension than such a collection as "Hellenica" would have to be a history of Greek literature. Unity it has none, proportion it has none; its chapters overlap; interstices are unsupplied; it is full of repetitions—thus we have an account of the Tale of Gamelyn in Chapter XII. and another in Chapter XVII. A series of chapters give an account of the literature of the thirteenth century; of the general characteristics, political, social, intellectual, of that wonderful century not a word is said. Not only are the historical conditions moulding and determining the tendencies and characteristics of literary and artistic activity unindicated, but, incredible to relate, the origins of British literature are traced no further than the Teutonic settlers, the Celts and Celtic Britain being simply ignored. The history of every literature is the expression of racial idiosyncrasies modified in various ways, and how, without defining those idiosyncrasies and accounting for those modifications, is any history of a literature possible? Such an omission as this leaves the whole work without a basis and radically defective. The opening chapter, entitled "The Beginnings," is a mere tag, serving no purpose whatsoever, but merely anticipating what is repeated in the chapter on Anglo-Saxon poetry.

* "The Cambridge History of English Literature." Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., Master of Peterhouse, and A. R. Waller, M.A., Peterhouse. Vol. I. From the Beginning to the Cycles of Romance. Cambridge: At the University Press. 9s. net.

What both the student and the general reader have a right to expect in a new and elaborate work appearing under such auspices as the present work does is, in the first place, some attempt to place an important study on a proper basis. In the preface it is announced that on that historical basis the work will rest; in the work itself no such basis is discernible. Indeed, the preface seems to have no connection with the actual matter. Who wants what is to be found in books which are in every student's hands and what has long been filtered into current manuals? Such chapters as the chapters on Anglo-Saxon literature are simply threshing the straw, merely cooking up a crambe, and nothing but a crambe, from Henry Morley, Ten Brink, Mr. Stopford Brooke, and innumerable others. In the whole of that long chapter we have not noticed a single original or really discriminating remark. Who now wants accounts and an analysis of what has been described and analysed usque ad nauseam? If, for example, in treating of the "Beowulf" some light had been thrown on the probable source of the extraordinary analogies to be found in it to passages from Homer and to the ethics of Attic Tragedy, we should have been grateful, but who wants to be informed that "the tale of Beowulf's adventures embodied the aspirations of all valiant Thegns," and that "it is a tale of brave deeds nobly done," &c.? What is so exasperating in this work is the droning indiscrimination with which poems or prose pieces are treated. It might, for example, have been expected that in the account of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle some reference would have been made to the fine passage describing the interruption of the burial of William the Conqueror and the reflections which follow. The wretched account given of the most remarkable work produced in the thirteenth century, Layamon's "Brut," is marked by the same indifference to what is interesting and striking. In the account given of Geoffrey of Monmouth no attempt is made to trace his extraordinary narratives to their possible originals or to determine the important question as to how far he was probably indebted to his own invention, and how far to tradition, written or oral. Certainly Mr. Fletcher's dissertation, which is referred to, has not exhausted the subject. The chapter on the Middle English secular lyrics and tales is most unsatisfactory, as will easily be understood when we say that "Sir Cleges" and the "Laie le Fresne" are not so much as referred to. Some of the contributors have a remarkable way of entirely missing the true significance of a particular author's work. Thus, for instance, in an account of Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle, the fact that what invests it with peculiar interest and importance is that it is the first remarkable expression of the realisation of English nationality is not noted. On the other hand, and we are glad to see it, full justice is done to Robert Mannyng and his "Handlynge Synne."

There goes a story that when Dean Prideaux placed in a publisher's hands the manuscript of his "Connection Between the Old Testament and the New," that functionary observed that it was no doubt a very instructive work, but that he thought the public would find it a little heavy. "Now could you not," he asked, with a persuasive smile, "put a little humour into it?" "The subject, sir," sternly replied the Dean, "does not admit of humour." If Dr. Ward could manage to secure for the future instalments of this imposing work we do not say humour, but something which would relieve what may be called a certain Academic stodginess at present characteristic of it, many of his readers would probably be grateful. At present the work is too like a farrago of lectures or theses of the average order, which, without much solid learning or any trace of research, have neither distinction nor colour. It is no light thing for a most pretentious book to appear under the sanction and with the authority of a great University. We repeat that with this first instalment we are greatly disappointed. No history of English literature can possibly be satisfactory which simply resolves that history into independent accounts of its mere phenomena—that is, particular works and particular authors. But even from this point of view the work before us is not, as we have shown, at all satisfactory; it is most unequal from the point of view of execution.

THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.*

A STEREOTYPED phrase best describes the impression left on the mind by these portly volumes. They are a storehouse of information, much of it of the kind which we are accustomed to associate less with historical literature than with the Parliamentary committee-room. Such, however, as it is, it is all here—a copious mass of material not entirely raw, to which in a future age other historians of Manchester may be expected to turn as to a convenient quarry. As the author says, in his rather loose phraseology, "the story in many respects contains all the elements of romance." And in truth it is a story which in an earlier age and under other skies might have been written, not in the graceful waters of the Irwell and the Mersey, but in the blood of warring traders; since even in our own day, and with aldermen and learned counsel, and jealous shipowners and rival engineering experts as its leading partisans, the prolonged conflict between the two great Lancashire centres almost invites comparison with the inter-city wars of medieval Europe. Yet, as Sir Bosdin Leech shows, and as Gladstone, among others, foresaw would be the case, the trade of Liverpool has positively benefited by the advantages that have accrued to Manchester from the opening of her great waterway, the reduction in freight charges and in port dues brought about by the exertions of a new and enterprising competitor having had the effect, usual in such circumstances, of producing a marked expansion of business, limited to neither Manchester nor Liverpool. Even the shareholders are encouraged to look some day for a return for their faith and their money. Meanwhile, they have the satisfaction of knowing that they are good citizens. By their canal they have made many blades of grass to grow where only one grew before. Apparently all that remains is for Manchester to form a ship-owning company of its own, headed by its leading shippers, and thus make a start with that determined effort, on the importance of which Sir Bosdin Leech so strenuously insists, to "break down the pernicious rebate system of the shipping rings," and checkmate shipowners in other ports who persist in boycotting the inland waterway. On this point a study of Sir Bosdin Leech's ample pages leaves no room for doubt that whatever Manchester may think to be necessary for the complete success of the Ship Canal will eventually be accomplished.

---

* "History of the Manchester Ship Canal." By Sir Bosdin Leech. Sherratt & Hughes, Manchester and London. Two vols. £2 2s. net.

A. & C. BLACK'S

FIRST SPRING LIST.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.

Translated from the Editor's Greek Text, and Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Indices, By R. H. CHARLES, D. Litt., D.D., Fellow of the British Academy, Author of "The Apocalypse of Baruch," "The Assumption of Moses," &c. Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 15/- net.

Indices to Diatessarica.

With a specimen of Research. By EDWIN A. ABBOTT. Author of "Johannine Grammar," and "Silanus the Christian." Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 2/6 net.

A Popular History of Astronomy. During the Nineteenth Century.

By AGNES M. CLERKE. Author of "The System of the Stars," &c. Fourth edition, revised and corrected, containing six full-page illustrations. Post 8vo., cloth. Price 7/6 net.

Studies in Fossil Botany.

By D. H. SCOTT, M.A., Ph.D., F.R.S. Author of "An Introduction to Structural Botany." Second edition containing 212 illustrations. In two volumes: Vol. I, price 6/- net.

A Plant Book for Schools.

Being an easy Introduction to the Study of Plant Life. By OTTO V. DARBISHIRE, B.A., Ph.D. Containing 115 illustrations from photographs specially taken by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 2/6.

Kafir Socialism, and the Dawn of Individualism.

An Introduction to the Study of the Native Problem. By DUDLEY KIDD, author of "The Essential Kafir" and "Savage Childhood." Large Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 7/6 net.

Letters of Dr. John Brown.

With letters from Ruskin, Thackeray, and others. Edited by his son and D. W. FORREST, M.A., D.D. With biographical Introductions by Elizabeth T. McLaren. Second edition, Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 10/6 net.

Literary and Historical Essays.

By HENRY GREY GRAHAM, author of "Social Life in Scotland in the Eighteenth Century." With a frontispiece portrait and a biographical sketch of the author. Post 8vo., cloth. Price 5/- net.

In Spain.

By JOHN LOMAS, editor of "O'Shea's Guide to Spain." With 50 illustrations from photographs, and a large map in colour. Large Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 6/- net.

Montreux.

Painted by J. HARDWICKE LEWIS and MAY HARDWICKE LEWIS. Described by FRANCIS H. GRIBBLE. Containing twenty full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map. Square Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 7/6 net.

Windsor.

Painted by GEORGE M. HENTON. Described by Sir RICHARD RIVINGTON HOLMES, K.C.V.O. Containing twenty full-page illustrations in colour. Square Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 7/6 net.

Letters from Queer Street.

By J. H. M. ABBOTT, author of "Tommy Cornstalk," "An Outlander in England," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 6/-

A. &. C. BLACK, Soho Sq., LONDON, W.

SEVENTH THOUSAND.

MODERN EGYPT

By the EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait and Map. Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

Saturday Review.—"It would be possible to cull from his pages a whole series of maxims for the guidance of the administrator and the statesman. . . . They are a vade mecum of Imperial statesmanship."

Punch.—"Lord Cromer, writing as well as he works, has contributed to history one of the most important chapters added during the present generation."

Athenæum.—"A book which all students of contemporary statesmanship, and still more all who have followed the marvellous regeneration of Egypt under Lord Cromer's direction, will read with eagerness."

Black and White.—"A work which is destined to be a classic while the English tongue is spoken and Egypt and Britain have places upon the map. . . . It is not too much to say that as a contribution to the literature of the world it is fit to be placed with the greatest works of the great historians."

General History of Western Nations from 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D. By EMIL REICH, Doctor Juris, Author of "New Student's Atlas of English History," etc. Part I. ANTIQUITY, Vols. I. and II. 8vo., 15s. net.

The two volumes treat (1) of the method of history; (2) of the great inland empires of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, the Hittites, &c.; (3) of the border nations called the Hebrews, the Phœnicians, and the Archaic Hellenes; (4) the historic Greeks; (5) the Romans.

Atlas Antiquus. In 48 Original Graphic Maps, with Elaborate Text to each Map, and full Index. By Dr. EMIL REICH. Crown 4to, 10s. net.

The Story of the Guides. By Col. C. J. YOUNGHUSBAND, C.B., Queen's Own Corps of Guides. With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A concise record of the busy career of service—the Mutiny, Kabul, Afghan War, 1878-80, Chitral, the Malakand, and minor wars—seen by the corps since, some sixty years ago, it was originated by Sir Henry Lawrence and raised by Sir Harry Lumsden.

Highways & Byways in Hampshire. By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. CONNOR. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

Diary of John Evelyn. With Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3s. 6d. Or Limp Leather, 5s. net. [Globe Library.

H.M.I. Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, by E. M. SNEYD-KYNNERSLEY, formerly H.M.I. North-west Division. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A highly entertaining book, containing a large number of good stories told by a raconteur of exceptional ability.

SECOND IMPRESSION JUST READY.

The Appearances of our Lord after THE PASSION. A study in the earliest Christian Tradition. By HENRY BARCLAY SWETE, D.D. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Guide-Books.

With numerous Maps and Plans based upon the latest information, and prepared expressly for these Guides. Globe 8vo.

Guide to Greece, the Archipelago, Constantinople, the COASTS of ASIA MINOR, CRETE, and CYPRUS, being a New and Thoroughly Revised Edition of the Guide to the Eastern Mediterranean. With 13 Maps and 25 Plans, and a New Chapter on Greek Art by Prof. ERNEST GARDNER. 9s. net.

The Western Mediterranean. Including Southern Spain, Northern Africa (Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli), Sicily, Malta, Corsica, &c. Second Edition. With 21 Maps and Plans. 9s. net.

Italy and Sicily. Fifth Edition. With 55 Maps and Plans 10s. net.

Ancient Athens. By ERNEST ARTHUR GARDNER. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. 8vo, 21s. net.

Life in Ancient Athens: the Social and Public Life of a Classical Athenian from Day to Day. By Prof. T. G. TUCKER, Litt. D. (Camb.). Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

SPECTATOR.—"A most instructive and illuminating book."

Rambles and Studies in Greece. By the Rev. J. P. MAHAFFY, C.V.O., D.D. Fifth thoroughly Revised and Cheaper Edition. Globe 8vo, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

It is natural to compare Miss Camilla Jebb's "A Star of the Salons: Julie de Lespinasse" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net) with the masterly study published a couple of years ago by the Marquis de Ségur. The latter work (an English translation of which was reviewed in The Nation for March 9th, 1907) must remain the standard biography of Julie de Lespinasse for many years to come, and Miss Jebb's book is neither so full nor so authoritative. The present volume should, however, find many readers, for Miss Jebb succeeds in her endeavour "to give some idea of the background against which Julie de Lespinasse moved, and the strange transitional epoch in which her life was cast." Thus Julie's stay at Champrond as governess to her sister's children suggests an account of the education of the upper classes and a description of French country life during the eighteenth century. On both these subjects, as well as on the social position of actresses before the Revolution, we are given several interesting details presented in a lively manner and without causing undue interruption to the narative. The book would have gained by a fuller discussion of the Encyclopædists who played so large a part in Julie de Lespinasse's life. With the exception of d'Alembert, Turgot, Morellet, and Suard, they receive but scant notice, although both before and after her breach with Madame du Deffand, Julie de Lespinasse lived on terms of the closest intimacy with most of the famous men connected with the Encyclopædia. More use might also have been made of the correspondence with Guibert. Miss Jebb is probably right in describing Guibert as "a pinchbeck hero," but she does nothing to explain either his reputation as an author or the still greater reputation in which he was held by the women of the time. The reader is left to guess what the fascination could have been which induced Julie to be unfaithful to Mora and stirred in her the depth of passion which produced that amazing series of love letters. Otherwise there is little to complain of in the book. It is a lively and entertaining account of a woman of gifted and striking personality who influenced some of the greatest minds of the eighteenth century in France.

* * *

A very pretty indictment against those who would have us regard Canada as a suitable dumping-ground for our surplus population is revealed in "The Land of the Maple Leaf" (Routledge, 6s. net). According to the author, Mr. B. Stewart, the emigration and steamship agents who proclaim that English labour is wanted in the Dominion, and induce countless "failures" in this country to try and better their lot by going there, are little less than unscrupulous liars; the truth being that while Canada requires more labour, she prefers—whatever her Immigration Department may say—that labour to be anything rather than English. The Englishman is unpopular because he is unadaptable. Moreover, the long, rigorous winter, during which work is at a standstill, complicates the employment question to an extent undreamt of by the would-be emigrat from these shores. Then, if wages are higher, living is disproportionately more expensive, and the Protection policy of the Manufacturers' Association tends to increase the expense. We have heard a good deal of this before, but the case has never been stated more relentlessly than in Mr. Stewart's book. The American "sharpness" of the modern Canadian, the stream of aliens willing to work for next to nothing that pours into the country, the climatic disadvantages, the open dislike of English intruders, make up a lugubrious picture of discouragement. Mr. Stewart is a civil engineer, not a writer, and his paragraph style reminds one of the report of a sensational railway accident. But the information is instructive enough to enable one to overlook this and other drawbacks to his volume. We confess to some doubt as to the composition of Mr. Stewart's political views. He is a staunch Chamberlainite, and despises "cringing, weak-kneed Little Englanders." At the same time he demonstrates, with apparent satisfaction to himself, that from the home country's point of view a preferential tariff would be a very bad bargain. It is interesting to note his statement that the agriculturists, who form the majority of Canada's population, are consistently in favour of Free Trade.

The greater part of Mr. Hector Macpherson's "A Century of Political Development" (Blackwood, 3s. 6d. net) has appeared in the "Edinburgh Evening News," but the book is far from being a series of disconnected articles. Starting with "Rousseau and the French Revolution," Mr. Macpherson carries the reader through the chief political developments of the nineteenth century, ending with a couple of chapters on the Socialist Movement and a discussion of Imperial Federation. The book forms a valuable addition to political history. Perhaps the best chapter is that on "The Rise of Imperialism," in which Mr. Macpherson points out that all genuine progress made during the past has been made on lines not of domination but of co-operation. Succeeding to the struggle for religious domination came the struggle for dynastic domination, and this in turn gave place to the struggle for national domination. "The Imperial delusion," says Mr. Macpherson, "took its rise in the notion that trade was impossible apart from possession of territory." Such a theory is contrary to the fact, and tends by obliterating the ideas of right and wrong, to end in sheer barbarism. For a bird's-eye view of the political history of the past century there could be nothing better than this book. It comes from a man who knows his subject, and who has a real gift of style. It was difficult to treat a subject of so great complexity in the short space Mr. Macpherson has allowed himself, but one of the features of the book is the extreme clearness in which each phase of political development is presented. He takes the individualist point of view: but states the Socialist case very fairly, and, as all readers of this brilliant controversialist may imagine, writes with an illuminating pen.

* * *

Owing to the changed situation in Macedonia, we draw attention to an excellent little book on the "Military Georgraphy of the Balkan Peninsula," by Professor Lionel Lyde and Colonel Mockler-Ferryman (Black, 5s.). Its purpose is to describe all the Balkan States, including Turkey and Greece, as a strategic field for the movement of great armies. With this view the mountains, rivers, and marshes that have military importance, all the main roads and railways, and the value of the towns for defence or supply, are carefully examined. There is also a brief account of the political situation, of the strength of the various armies that might be engaged, and of the chief Balkan campaigns of modern history. Maps are added, sufficient to follow the course of possible strategy, though not nearly detailed enough for the tactics of the field. If the extreme difficulties of the present situation, owing to the jealousies of the Powers, can in the end only be solved by the long-expected war, this little book will prove of equal service to military students and ordinary readers.

* * *

In "Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope" (Nash, 7s. 6d. net) Mr. Horace Annesley Vachell says some very hard things about the women of California. In his view the Western woman is "unconsciously the most selfish creature of her sex." She spends her time squandering her husband's money in vulgar display. Even her affection for her children rapidly diminishes as the child grows older—Mr. Vachell calls it "an animal love of the very young, a wish to cuddle and kiss, and flatter, and dress," the veneer of an essential hardness. The children show an amazing precocity and sense of their own importance. Mr. Vachell tells some amusing stories in illustration of this latter trait. The following may not support his theory, but is amusing enough for quotation. "A small boy was listening attentively to the story of the Golden Calf and the Fiery Serpents. 'Well,' he remarked, as the Bible was closed, 'they were wicked, those Israelites. No wonder God was mad with them. I don't blame Him.'" The descriptions of ranch life, if not so rose-coloured as those we sometimes read, are inviting enough, and many of the failures of Englishmen to secure a footing on the land are due either to ignorance of farming or a determination to carry English ideas and methods into a country to which they are not adapted. The sport includes big game shooting—bear, wapiti, caribou, sheep, and goats—a great variety of small game and birds, and fishing for tuna—which measure from five to seven feet in length and weigh from one to three hundred pounds—salmon, albicore, halibut, and black-bass. The book is

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN THADEUS DELANE,

Editor of "The Times," 1841-1877. Containing hitherto unpublished Letters of Palmerston, Disraeli, and other Statesmen, and numerous Anecdotes of the Court and London Society in the Reign of Queen Victoria. By his Nephew, ARTHUR IRWIN DASENT. With Illustrations. 2 Vols. Demy 8vo, 32s. net.

FROM PEKIN TO SIKKIM.

By COUNT DE LESDAIN. With Maps and Illustrations based on the Author's Surveys and Photographs. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

Count and Countess de Lesdain, immediately after their marriage travelled from Pekin through the little-known district of the Ordos Desert, thence, by the province of Kansu, across the high mountainous district into the valley of the Yangtse and so to Tibet.

THE TRUTH ABOUT PORT ARTHUR.

By Monsieur E. K. NOJINE, accredited Russian War Correspondent during the Siege. Translated and Abridged by Captain A. B. LINDSAY, Translator of "The Battle of Tsushima," &c. Edited by Major E. D. SWINTON, D.S.O. With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

INDIAN PROBLEMS.

By S. M. MITRA. With an Introduction by Sir GEORGE BIRDWOOD, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., LL.D. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Mitra is distinguished amongst our Hindu fellow-subjects for his knowledge of India and as a loyalist. He disapproves of Congress methods, appreciates the benefits derived from the British Raj, but at the same time is able to point out some of the reasons for the unpopularity of the English, and to suggest means for their removal.

THE PLEASANT LAND OF FRANCE.

By ROWLAND E. PROTHERO, M.V.O., Author of "The Psalms in Human Life," &c. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

These Essays deal with life in a provincial town in France; of French farming, with special reference to the condition of peasant landowners in the various districts, of French folk-lore gathered in Touraine, Berri, Poitou, and Périgord; an interpretation of the life, times, and work of François, Rabelais: a study of the Palace and Forest of Fontainebleau; and a chapter on modern French poets.

READY ON TUESDAY NEXT.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 415. APRIL, 1908. 6s.

1. CARDUCCI. By J. Slingsby Roberts.
2. LOCAL GOVERNMENT.
3. GREEK PAPYRI AND RECENT DISCOVERIES. By F. G. Kenyon.
4. COVENTRY PATMORE. By Percy Lubbock.
5. MOHAMMED AND ISLAM.
6. A FAMOUS ETON HOUSE.
7. RECENT NAPOLEONIC LITERATURE.
8. THE ELIZABETHAN STAGE. By William Archer.
9. THE IDEAS OF MR. H. G. WELLS.
10. A Genre PAINTER AND HIS CRITICS. By Roger Fry.
11. BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS OF THE CIVIL WAR.
12. GOLD RESERVES. By Edgar Crammond.
13. THE HEROIC IDEAL OF THE FRENCH EPIC. By William Wistar Comfort.
14. TEMPERANCE, JUSTICE, AND THE LICENSING BILL.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

The Edinburgh Review.

No. 424. APRIL, 1908. 8vo, price 6s.

I. FENELON'S FLOCK.
II. THE PASTORAL INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.
III. WILLIAM PITT, EARL OF CHATHAM.
IV. A DUTCH BLUE-STOCKING AND QUAKER OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.
V. THE MODERN ANGLER.
VI. DANTE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE, FROM CHAUCER TO CARY.
VII. MR. HARDY'S "DYNASTS."
VIII. ON UGLINESS IN FICTION.
IX. THE POLITICS OF RADIO-TELEGRAPHY.
X. MODERN EGYPT.
XI. THE TRAVELS AND POEMS OF CHARLES MONTAGU DOUGHTY.
XII. PARTIES AND POLITICS.

LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE

DR. HARNACK'S NEW TESTAMENT STUDIES.
Vol. II. Ready April 8th. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D.

APRIL NUMBER READY. 2s. 6d. net.
2s. 9d. post free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

PRINCIPAL ARTICLES:

THE DISTINCTIVE THING IN CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE. By the Rev. P. T. FORSYTH, D.D.
RELIGIOUS TRANSITION AND ETHICAL AWAKENING IN AMERICA. By Professor A. O. LOVEJOY.
KNOWLEDGE AND FAITH. By G. LOWES DICKINSON.
THE WORLD VIEW OF A POET: GOETHE'S PHILOSOPHY. By Professor FRANK THILLY.
THE CATHOLIC CHURCH: WHAT IS IT? By the Right Rev. MONSIGNOR CANON VAUGHAN.
THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL. Part II. By Sir OLIVER LODGE.
AN AGNOSTIC'S CONSOLATION. By Mrs. H. F. PETERSEN.
THE DUALISM OF SAINT AUGUSTINE. By PAUL E. MORE.
WAS JESUS A "DIVINE MAN" AND NOTHING MORE? By the Rev. R. MORRIS, M.A., B.D.
BRITISH EXPONENTS OF PRAGMATISM. By Professor E. B. M'GILVARY.
"LAW." By Professor F. J. C. HEARNSHAW. Discussions. Reviews. Bibliography of Recent Literature.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,
30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.
Specimens free on application.
PERCY L. PARKER.

written in an easy, vivacious style, and should be read by those who contemplate visiting California either with the intention of settling in the country, or to enjoy the splendid sport to be found there. An appendix gives useful hints on the necessary equipment.

* * *

Miss Olga Racster deals with a fascinating subject in her "Chats on Violoncellos" (Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net). We are not sure that her treatment of it would not have been more fascinating to the musically inclined, to whom the book is presumably addressed, if it had been less "chatty"; but the fashion of to-day is to serve up this type of book with a kind of piquant sauce, and we are not disposed to dispute with a fashion. The authoress has garnered many interesting facts about violoncellos. She traces their origin, with those of other stringed instruments, to the Ravanastron, the mythical invention of a mythical Indian king in the very dark ages; dwells upon the bass viol (viol da gamba) of the sixteenth century, as it was made and improved to something like the modern violoncello by Duiffoproucatt, by Andrea Amati, the master of Cremona, and a century later by Stradivarius; and shows how fond we were of big double basses in the eighteenth century. There is much miscellaneous information about famous viols, violins, feminine players, and youthful prodigies, the wood used for stringed instruments, &c.—she touches, in fact, upon most of the lore of the subject in a scrappy, though not uninteresting, manner. One's time passes pleasantly enough on the whole in the varied company of anecdote and instruction, and the book is adequately illustrated. She should not, however, have put modern "Cockney" into the mouth of an eighteenth century bird salesman (on p. 12), neither should she have shown her knowledge of the history of wood-carving by a reference to "Grinley" Gibbons.

* * *

It is not easy to see why M. Roger Boutet de Monvel's "Beau Brummell and His Times" (Eveleigh Nash, 10s. net) has been translated into English. It gives a pleasant though slight account of the famous dandy, but there is little in the book which the English reader may not find set out to better advantage in Captain Jesse's "Life," Gronow's delightful "Reminiscences," and other memoirs of the Regency. M. de Monvel explains Brummell's vogue by certain qualities which he regards as inherent in the English character. "As everybody knows," he says, "the English will never entertain a deep aversion for anything that betrays pride or obstinacy; indeed, they keep a reserve of indulgence for these faults, and are always ready to regard them as virtues when they see them justified by success." But besides the effrontery which amused his contemporaries, Brummell was a man of engaging qualities. Many of his repartees now seem poor enough, but by the general consent of his contemporaries, he could "score" off wits, or would-be wits, who ventured to cross swords with him. The best part of M. de Monvel's book is the end, when Brummell, "defying Fortune and laughing at her blows," preserved, as well as his straitened circumstances would permit, the affectations of the time of his youth. The picture of him in the hotel at Caen, broken in mind and fortune, but recalling the visions of his triumphs at Carlton House and Brighton, is not without pathos. One of his delusions was to announce the Prince Regent's famous guests, and to wind up by calling out his own name. The story of Beau Brummell's life recalls the wit and brilliancy, as well as the wild extravagance, of the Regency, and if M. de Monvel has little that is new to tell us, he carries us along familiar ground in entertaining style.

* * *

The blend of biography and fiction presented in "Richard Kennoway and his Friends," by Katherine Steuart (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net), is far from unpleasant to the taste. The book can best be described as a picture of middle-class society as it existed in the Scottish lowlands at the end of the eighteenth century, and the authoress shows considerable skill in reconstructing the atmosphere of the age, and the many personalities whose career she traces through her pages. As a narrative, it may not perhaps be considered very exciting, since, with the exception of Thomas Muir, the Scottish reformer and advocate, who was unjustly condemned for seditious utterances and transported to Botany Bay, the characters mentioned mostly led quiet and comparatively uneventful lives. But one or two—such as Gilmour the privateersman—are picturesque enough, and the contemporary manners and customs in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and the Kingdom of Fife, are portrayed in scrupulous detail. We are shown what political feeling meant in those days, when the horror of the French Revolution and the fear of French invasion was upon men's hearts; how the Scottish Church was even then threatened with schism; how men and women practised deportment in life and letter-writing, made their journeys and marriages, and obeyed their religious, or irreligious, inclinations. Of Richard Kennoway himself, the Fifeshire divine and preacher, whose eloquence became his only monument, we have the career, but it is neither more nor less adventurous than the rest, and from a psychological standpoint he is less interesting than his unsuccessful and pathetic elder brother, James. When he disappears from the narrative for many pages together, we hardly miss him; he is merely one of the characters in a Hogarthian picture of the society in which he moved. The authoress has composed this picture very carefully and sympathetically out of old records and age-stained letters to which she has had access, and the note of intimacy in the tale rings true. She is obviously ironical on the High Toryism of the day, but the irony is such as might have been indulged in by a contemporary Whig. It is not that of the superior modern person. The story of Richard Kennoway's courtship, invented out of threadbare matters of fact, is a good example of the gentle and kindly humour that illumines what has obviously been a labour of love.

* * *

A collection of short, reflective essays, such as Canon Sheehan's "Parerga" (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net), is not likely to appeal to the mass of readers unless it contains something strikingly out of the common either in thought or style. In neither respect does this book reach distinction, though there is something in the author's personality which gives to the expression of his views on men and literature an undoubted charm. The form in which Canon Sheehan has cast his book—a series of paragraphs usually not more than half a page in length—presents peculiar difficulties. The reader expects to find something striking or epigrammatic in each paragraph, and is disappointed when, as is bound to be the case in a volume of this size, he is often put off with a mere platitude. However, Canon Sheehan has evidently read widely in philosophy and literature; his judgments are, for the most part, fresh and suggestive; and his style, if presenting few examples of the curiosa felicitas, has an air of amenity and a pleasant discursiveness which is the more taking from the fact that it is so seldom met with to-day. For these reasons his book will be welcomed by an inner circle of readers, though we should be surprised if it appeals to the general public.

* * *

Several reprints of special interest have recently made their appearance. Mr. John Morley's "Life of Cobden" (2 vols., 8s. net) has been added to Messrs. Macmillan's comely "Eversley Series." There have been several cheap re-issues of this famous account of the great Free Trade leader, which has never perhaps quite attained the place its admirable qualities deserve, but many readers will be pleased to have it in an edition uniform with Mr. Morley's other works.—The same publishers have issued "The Diary of John Evelyn," with notes and an introduction by Mr. Austin Dobson, in their "Globe Library" (3s. 6d. net). It gives in more compact and less expensive form the helps towards understanding Evelyn's allusions, which Mr. Dobson—who touches no eighteenth century subject without illuminating it by his accurate scholarship and graceful style—first published in his three-volume edition in 1906.—From Messrs. Smith, Elder comes an edition of Mrs. Sutherland Orr's "Life and Letters of Robert Browning" (7s. 6d. net), revised and in part re-written by Mr. Frederic G. Kenyon. Since Mrs. Orr's book first appeared much fresh information about Browning has come to light. The chapter relating to Browning's courtship and marriage has been wholly re-written, and those relating to his married life have been re-arranged and amplified. Also, an account of the poet's last illness and death, written by Mr. R. Barrett

THE TOWNSMAN'S FARM

By "HOME COUNTIES"

With Portrait of the Author 6s. net.

The DAILY CHRONICLE says: "'Home Counties' knows what he writes about."

The SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT says: "We can commend both those who understand farming and those who do not to read this sensible book, for it will give the former many valuable hints and the latter many valuable warnings."

CASSELL and CO., Limited, London.

NEW EDITIONS OF "EREWHON" BUTLER

"Samuel Butler was, in his own department, the greatest English writer of the latter half of the 19th century."— Bernard Shaw.

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. A Novel. Entirely re-set. 6s. 424 pp.

EREWHON A Satire. 11th issue. 2s. 6d. net. ... ... 324 pp.

EREWHON RE-VISITED. 3rd issue. 2s. 6d. net. ... ... 340 pp.

ESSAYS ON LIFE, ART, AND SCIENCE. 2s. 6d. net. ... 340 pp

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, Fleet Street, E.C.

NOW READY.

The April "BOOK MONTHLY"

6d. net.

It contains a new feature, which should be useful to many people—namely, a list of the Contents of the April Reviews and Magazines.

It also contains an article in which Mrs. Clayton Glyn, the author of "The Visits of Elizabeth," gives her impressions of America.

Finally, the April BOOK MONTHLY has all the book news and many beautiful illustrations.

Publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO.,

Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will be glad to send a specimen copy of the magazine free of cost.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

SOME BOOKS OF INTEREST

A CHRISTIAN LIBRARY. A Popular Series of Religious Literature, from which all Latin, Greek, and learned Notes are omitted.

Edited by PROFESSOR EDWARD ARBER, F.S.A.

Vol. I. A Brief Discourse of the Troubles at Frankfort, 1553-1558 A.D. By WILLIAM WHITTINGHAM. Large post 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net (post free 5s. 4d.).

"A valuable contribution to a little-known period of Church history."—Daily News.

Vol. II. The Torments of Protestant Slaves in the French King's Galleys, and in the Dungeons of Marseilles, 1686-1707 A.D.

Large post 8vo, 6s. net (post free 6s. 4d.).

"To those in search of the truth that is stranger than fiction, nothing surpasses these narratives in absorbing interest."—Oxford Chronicle.

VOL. III. The Sayings of the Wise, or Food for Thought. A Book of Moral Wisdom, gathered from the Ancient Philosophers, 1555 A.D. [Ready Shortly.

SHAKESPEARIAN REPRESENTATION. Its Principles and Limits. By PERCY FITZGERALD, F.S.A. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net, (post free 6s. 4d.)

The work deals with the modern performance of plays scientifically and critically.

"A sharp, lively and stimulating book, full of thought and study."—The Era.

SEAS BETWEEN; Or, Called to the East and Claimed by the West. By ANNIE M. WOOD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net (post free 5s. 4d.)

"Combines hearty humour with true pathos."—Dundee Advertiser.

AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR. By ADA T. BROWNING. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A strong and fascinating story in verse."—Baptist Times.

WRITE FOR LIST OF NEW BOOKS FREE ON APPLICATION.

London: ELLIOT STOCK,
62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

OUR LAND

The APRIL NUMBER is now ready at all Bookstalls and Newsagents, price 3d. net.

CONTENTS.

Municipalities.
Agricultural Co-operation: The Depot.—I.
The Management of Farms. By W. M. Tod, M.A.
Rural Housing and Sanitation.—III. By a Civil Engineer.
The Farmer and the School.
Cow Clubs and Pig Clubs. By W. L. Charleton.
The Poultry Industry.
Wheat.
The New Domesday Book.

NOTES:
County Councils and Housing.
The Lighting of Villages.
Milk Records.
The Arrangement of Buildings.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

Browning, who was present at the time, has been substituted for some of Mrs. Orr's original paragraphs. In its present form the book is indispensable to all who require an accurate narrative of the events of Browning's life.

* * *

Nothing save the most intense enthusiasm for his subject could have enabled Mr. T. Francis Bumpus to carry out a work as comprehensive and painstaking as is his history, in two volumes, of "London Churches: Ancient and Modern" (Werner Laurie, 12s. net). In this the author is at his best, and the best is far better than a recent work of his on North Italian cathedrals would lead one to suppose. The work is not merely a history of London churches from the architectural standpoint, but a record of everything connected with them, of their architects, their incumbents, their organists, the famous people immortalised on their monuments; and the research and first-hand observation that have gone to its making astonish by their completeness. There are two principal landmarks to be observed in the development of Metropolitan church building. The first is the Great Fire, which robbed what had hitherto been almost a city of churches of the greater part of its possessions. So great was the destruction that Parliament authorised the building of fifty new churches, and, these proving insufficient, a further Act in the tenth year of Queen Anne provided for the erection of fifty more. To the first Act we owe Wren's noblest creations, and, indeed, the hundred or more churches built between the Fire and the middle of the next century may be said to have been the work of Wren and of the school that developed his Italian-Roman ideas. The second landmark is the Gothic Revival of 1820-59. It followed a period of great slackness, not only in building, which languished after 1750, but in the general administration of ecclesiastical affairs. It gave scope for the genius of Sir Charles Barry, of Pugin, of Sir Gilbert Scott, and of later men such as Butterfield, Burgess, Street, and Bodley. Gothic, as a matter of fact, never really died in this country, not even in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when Renaissance styles were paramount. The movement of 1820 was therefore a genuine revival, not a resurrection. What is known as the "Million" Act of 1818 helped to pave the way for it. Under this Act, which owes its title to the fact that the Parliament responsible for its passing voted a million of money for the purpose, forty or fifty new churches were raised in London and the suburbs. They were in harmony with the feeble ecclesiasticism of the day, and mainly helped to emphasise the necessity for developments more vigorous and vitalising. The Metropolis Churches Fund of 1836, with the institution of local funds initiated by Bishop Blomfield, had results of great importance. Mr. Bumpus is an Anglican Churchman with High Church views, and he does not let the reader forget this, especially when he is describing the anti-Puseyism riots that took place at sundry well-known churches in the mid-century. These views also colour his criticism of various architects. Yet, if partisan, he is not unfair, and the fund of anecdote which leavens the heavier knowledge of these volumes should endear them to many besides the serious ecclesiologists in whose ranks Mr. Bumpus has already found an honoured place.

* * *

To a great number of readers Mary Wollstonecraft is known only as the author of "A Vindication of the Rights of Women." A reprint of "The Love Letters of Mary Wollstonecraft to Gilbert Imlay" (Hutchinson, 3s. 6d. net), together with an admirable biographical introduction by Mr. Roger Ingpen, should serve to remind the present generation that she was also a woman of great force of emotion whose unhappy fate has given us some of the most exquisite love letters in the language. No one can read these letters, at once so proud and so pathetic, without recognising in her a noble spirit whose unhappiness was the result of believing that other human beings were moved with the enthusiasms and high ideals in which she herself lived. She was, as Mr. Ingpen puts it, "an idealist in a very matter-of-fact age, and her outlook on life, like that of most idealists, was strongly affected by her imagination." Mr. Ingpen is to be heartily commended for having given us this pretty edition of the famous "Letters."

The Week in the City.

The talk of the week has been the new German loan. On the Stock Exchange it is called the "Dreadnought" loan, and the patriotic members declare that they will have nothing to do with it. I suspect, however, that if the terms were a little more favourable a good deal would be taken up in this country. But many shrewd people think that German securities will be cheaper later in the year. The financial situation in Germany is very bad. There have been many commercial failures, and more are expected. Several banks have suffered, and one or two of the big ones are notoriously weak. The fact that the Government has to borrow largely at 4 per cent.—by far the worst terms since the war with France—is a very depressing factor; and the position is made worse by the market's anticipation that the Imperial loan will not last for the year. There will have to be another in the autumn. What one may fairly expect is that the German Government will be driven by its own embarrassments, and by popular discontent, before long to economise and abandon its ambitious naval programme, which is at the root of the mischief.

The Depression in the United States.

The full after effects of the American panic are seen in the reviews of the first quarter of the year, which are just to hand by the American mail. "Bradstreet" estimates that trade generally is from 25 to 50 per cent. lower than in the first quarter of 1907. These figures are indeed stupendous, but there seems to be no doubt about their correctness. "Bank clearings, for instance, will run 30 per cent. below the first quarter of 1907; cotton-goods production has been easily 25 per cent. below last year; and the output of the leading interest in iron and steel tonnage is estimated to have been at least 50 per cent. below 1907." Lumber production is from 25 to 50 per cent. lower, and the railway traffic figures are in harmony. Speculation in Wall Street has revived during the last month; but there is practically no sign of any general improvement in trade. The high cost of living combined with want of work is still driving emigrants in thousands back to the Old World. Moreover, the Treasury deficits are steadily mounting up. In March the deficit was eight million dollars. The experts in Washington calculate that the total for the financial year will work out at about twelve millions sterling. This is the amount by which the revenue will fall short of the Estimates. The shortage will be largely caused by a falling off in Customs.

The Erie Mystery.

The Erie directorate includes four of the most important financial groups in the United States, "and if no doubt has ever existed that maturing obligations would be met, there has been wanton squandering of the road's credit by these repeated delays in making a definite announcement." These are the words of a New York contemporary which goes on to say: "Surely the handling of the Erie's finances on this occasion has not been transcendently skilful—unless (and the thought is not pleasant) there may have been speculative motives underlying the mystery that has been encouraged." For over a fortnight the ups and downs of the American railway market have been ascribed to alternate rumours as to the probability or improbability of the Erie railroad going into a receiver's hands. The whole incident is a disgrace to American finance, and shows how little effect President Roosevelt's sermons, or even the disasters of the panic, have had upon the financial morals of the American magnates.

Turkish Finance.

The embarrassments of the Sultan are not much talked about, but they are very pressing, and the curious thing is that he is constantly borrowing small sums from the Deutsche Bank of Berlin, which is becoming more and more interested in Turkish concessions. The question is how much longer the game can be kept up, seeing that the Macedonian deficit is so tremendous. Sir Edward Grey is very wisely laying stress upon these difficulties in his correspondence, and is pointing out that the only way to straighten out the situation is to reduce the Turkish army in Macedonia, which now numbers about 70,000 men, and is worse than useless.

Lucellum.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's
Navy Cut Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute 0487.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.
NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING.
TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE
RED WHITE & BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

MAPLE & CO
ARE SPECIALISTS FOR COMFORTABLE
CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES
Inspection invited, or Illustrated Catalogue of Chairs sent free
LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD
LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Liver troubles
are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.
MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE
Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Price 1/1½ and 2/9 of all Chemists and Stores, or, if unable to obtain, send direct to MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.
CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Beware of spurious imitations.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.
THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.
MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD

(Via NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the { PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,

London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.; City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.; And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, last edition 10 vols., 25/-, cost £2 16s. net. Who's Who, 1907, 4/6, cost 11/- net. Burton's Arabian Nights, full edition, illustrated, 17 vols., £13 13s. Lear's Book of Nonsense, 2/6, pub. 6/. Balzac's Famous Novels in English, 40 vols., £3 3s. Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray, 10/6. Pepys' Diary, 4 vols., 15/-, pub. £1 10s. G. P. R. James's Historical Novels, 25 vols., £2 2s. Encyclopædia Britannica, last edition, 35 vols., £12 12s. Business Cyclopædia and Legal Adviser, 6 vols., £1 4s., cost £2 8s. Catalogues free. Books bought. Special list of 3,000 books wanted post free. Libraries purchased for cash.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.

[Books out of print supplied. Please state wants.]

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

EDUCATIONAL.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Car Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW LIST.

MR. SWINBURNE'S

NEW DRAMA NOW READY.

THE DUKE OF GANDIA.

Crown 8vo, buckram, 5s.

Large Paper Edition (limited to 100 Copies) demy 8vo, buckram, uniform with the Large Paper "Collected Edition," 10s. net.

MR. SWINBURNE'S COLLECTED POETICAL WORKS.

In 6 Volumes. Crown 8vo, buckram, 36s. net the Set. (Sold only in Sets.)

MR. SWINBURNE'S COLLECTED TRAGEDIES.

In 5 Volumes. Crown 8vo, buckram, 30s. net the Set. (Sold only in Sets.)

THE WORKS OF JANE AUSTEN.

In 10 vols., each Illustrated with 10 Reproductions after Water-Colours by A. WALLIS MILLS. The Text revised, with Bibliographical and Biographical Notes, by R BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

HANDY VOLUME EDITION. LARGE TYPE.

Small crown 8vo, coloured tops, cloth, with special binding design and Coloured End-Papers, 3s. 6. net. per vol.

Vols. I. and II. PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. [May 1st

Vols. III. and IV. SENSE AND SENSIBILITY. [May 15th

Remaining Volumes ready in the Autumn.

THE NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY.

Each volume contains Photogravure or Woodcut Reproductions of the Illustrations contained in the Works translated. Each volume further contains a Title-page engraved upon Wood, after a notable contemporary example.

NEW VOLUMES. Ready shortly.

THE BABEE'S BOOK: Mediæval Manners for the Young.

THE LEGEND OF THE HOLY FINA, Virgin of Santo Geminiano.

(Other volumes in preparation.)

Size 6½ by 4¾ in., boards, cloth, 5s net; whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

Detailed Prospectus of the Series post-free on application.

NOW READY.

MARIE DE MEDICIS

And the Court of France during the XVIIth Century.

AUTHORISED ENGLISH VERSION.

Translated from the French of M. Louis Batiffol by MARY KING, under the superintendence of H. W. C. DAVIS, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. With Collotype Frontispiece after a rare engraving of the Queen dated 1601. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

BALLADS AND LYRICS OF LOVE. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by F. SIDGWICK. Chiefly selected from "Percy's Reliques." Illustrated with 10 Full-page Reproductions after the Water-Colours by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Large fcap. 4to large type, gilt tops, cloth, 6s. net. Also 250 numbered copies on Linen Paper, the Plates mounted, bound whole parchment, 12s. 6d. net. [May 1.

Illustrated Prospectus post-free.

THE GREATER ABBEYS OF ENGLAND.

By the Right Rev. ABBOT GASQUET. Being some account—Historical and, in reference to their remains, Topographical—of the Greater Monastic Houses of England. With 60 Illustrations after Water-Colours by WARWICK GOBLE. Large fcap. 4to cloth, gilt top, 20s. net. Also a Large Paper Edition (limited to 50 numbered copies), 42s. net. [May 1.

Illustrated Prospectus post-free on application.

FROM THE FORELAND TO PENZANCE.

The Ports and Harbours of the South Coast. By CLIVE HOLLAND. Fully Illustrated after Water-Colours by MAURICE RANDALL. Large fcap 4to cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. Also a limited number of Large-Paper Copies, 21s. net. [Ready shortly.

Long before "Drake sailed the Main" the Harbours and Ports of the South Coast were old with history. Rye and Winchelsea are now far from reach of high water, but their name remains, although Ports unknown to the world in their day are now undisputed controllers of the Channel and its ships.

Illustrated Prospectus post-free on application.

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS

AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

Subscription = = = £3 per annum, post free.

The Medici Series offers to Subscribers a series of reproductions in pure Collotype, printed in permanent colours upon hand-made linen paper, of the finest examples after the Great Italian Masters. Of the quality of these reproductions THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE says: "Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."

The next three plates to be issued will be :—

VII. FILIPPINO LIPPI. (?) The Virgin in Adoration (TEMPERA). Colour surface 19½ by 15 in. [On or about 16th inst. 15s. net.

VIII. BOTTICELLI. The Birth of Venus (TEMPERA.) Colour surface, 36 by 21½ in. [Shortly. 25s. net.

X. TITIAN. The Madonna of the Cherries (TEMPERA). Colour surface, half-original. [July. 17s. 6d. net.

By the same Process.

PORTRAIT OF A LADY. Never before reproduced. By an unknown Flemish Master. Now in the Academy, Vienna.

Size of Plate, 26 by 19 in, Colour surface, 16 by 12 in. (about half the original).

Price for prepaid orders before publication, 15s net. Published price, 17s. 6d. net; postage 6d. [Ready on about June 1.

Full particulars of plates and Frames, with method of Publication and terms of Subscription, will be found in an illustrated Prospectus which may be had post free on application.

PHOTO RELIEFS.

A remarkable advance in Photographic knowledge has recently made possible the reproduction, in the colours of the original Della Robbias, &c., photographic facsimilies of such verisimilitude that, although flat prints from negatives taken direct from the original objects, these flat surfaces offer to the eye the complete illusion of a modelling in relief. Eighteen subjects are now ready, viz., Seventeen after the Della Robbias and one after Donatello. The average surface is 18 by 18 inches, and the price is, per subject, 25s. net.

Detailed Illustrated Prospectus, post free.

Prospectuses of any or all of the following Series will be sent post free on application:—

Books for Children.
The Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters.
The New Mediæval Library.
Bibliotheca Romanica.
The St. Martin's Library.
Authors for the Pocket.
The Shakespeare Library (including The Shakespeare Classics).
The King's Classics.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, Dept. P., 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 3.] SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
The Diary of the Week	69
Politics and Affairs:—
The New Government	71
The Position of the Monarch	72
The Next Phase in South Africa	73
The Party of Protection	75
Life and Letters:—
Fear. By John Galsworthy	76
The Pleasant Land	77
The Onlooker's Risk	78
The Wild Bee	80
Letters from Abroad:—
Parties in the Prussian Elections. By Ed. Bernstein	81
Contemporaries:—
Osman Digna. By H. N. Brailsford	82
Poetry:—
The Gypsies' Road. By Dora Sigerson Shorter	83
The World of Books	84
Books to be Read	84
Letters to the Editor:—
The Practical Reconstruction of Country Life. By Montague Fordham, M.A.	85
"Fiscal Fallacies." By R. C. Phillimore	85
Kangaroo Island. By A Man of the Woods	85
The Justice of the Licensing Bill. By J. W. F. Gillies, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.	86
The Problem of Medical Relief. By G. C. C.	86
Hamburg. By G. E. Harrison	87
Women Suffragists and the Government. By J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Yet Another Woman Liberal, and Jane Atkinson	87
The Use of the Lash. By A Liberal Member and Carl Heath	88
Reviews:—
The Pro-Consul as Historian, II.	89
The Nemesis of Pride	90
The Master Mariner	91
Critics for Socialism. II.—Mr. Brougham Villiers	91
Florence and Some Buildings	92
Two Historical Novels	94
Books in Brief:—
Catherine of Bragança	96
Types of Tragic Drama	96
An Apostle of the North	96
My School and My Gospel	98
Literary and Historical Essays	98
Records of Stirring Times	98
Garcia the Centenarian and His Times	93
The Admiralty of the Atlantic	100
Richard Wilson	100
The Week in the City	100

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The new Government is now complete. The Cabinet is practically that which The Nation suggested last week, with the single exception that Lord Elgin retires altogether from the Ministry, and that Lord Ripon retains, for the present, the post of Lord Privy Seal, though neither he nor Sir Henry Fowler are likely long to associate their names with the new Administration. The delays resulting from the King's absence at Biarritz make it impossible for Mr. Lloyd George to introduce the Budget, but there has been no hitch and, we gather, little real difficulty about the considerable, but not revolutionary, changes that have been effected. The Presidents of the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board are, as we suggested last week, to receive the status of Secretaries of State. The changes in the conduct of the Board of Admiralty and the Colonial Office are generally approved, even by the Conservative press, which, through the "Times" and the "Morning Post," has acknowledged the suitability and adequacy of the new appointments. Lord Elgin conducted the Colonial Conference with tact, but he has shown a certain want of sympathy with the spirit of Ministerial policy, and Lord Tweedmouth bears the penalty of a singularly thoughtless act of journalism.

* * *

The outer ranks of the Government have been filled with discretion, though we should have liked to see places found for popular and able Parliamentarians of the type of Mr. Lehmann, and it is surprising to see that so good and thoroughly competent a worker as Mr. Whitley, who has given his days and nights to the Parliamentary party, and sought no fee or reward, has been passed by. No new prominence has been given to the small knot of Liberal Leaguers, and on the other hand Mr. Masterman is the only fresh recruit who definitely represents the new Radicalism. The Whips' office needed strengthening in a direction more in consonance with the opinion of the majority of the party. Many of the special appointments are good. Mr. Acland, who has gone to the War Office in place of Mr. Buchanan, was a very capable secretary to Mr. Haldane, and he inherits his father's ability for affairs. It is, however, a pity to lose so good a financier as Mr. Buchanan from the chief centre of useless expenditure. Mr. Buchanan will henceforth represent the India Office in the House of Commons, and, like Mr. Lough, who retires, becomes a Privy Councillor. The same honor is rightly conferred on Lord Fitzmaurice.

* * *

Mr. Lough's successor at the Education Office in the place subordinate to Mr. Runciman, the new head, is Mr. McKinnon Wood, an able municipal statesman, trained in the thorough Progressive school, and long the leader of the party in the London County Council. The new Secretary to the Treasury is Mr. Hobhouse, one of the less adequate of Mr. Asquith's nominations. Dr. Macnamara replaces Mr. Edmund Robertson at the Admiralty, and will bring freshness of mind and statement to an always attractive position. In personal interest, and in suggestion of a fresh outlook on politics, the most notable appointment is that of Mr. Masterman as Under-Secretary of the Local Government Board. Mr. Masterman has feeling and the literary touch, which is more and more missing from modern politics, and if Mr. Burns gives him his head the two men should co-operate in working out the new Poor Law. Colonel Seely takes Mr. Churchill's place at the Colonial Office, and will be its spokesman in the Commons. He knows South Africa, is popular there, in spite of his strong view of Chinese labour, and has both dexterity and charm. But Natal is an ugly problem, and will need strength as well as suavity on the part of the Home Government. Lord Lucas, son of Auberon Herbert, once an outstanding figure in Radicalism, replaces Lord Portsmouth at the War Office, and has youth and talent. Finally, we are glad to see that Mr. Asquith retains the services of Mr. Vaughan Nash, his predecessor's able secretary.

* * *

Meanwhile, the political interest of the hour centres in Mr. Churchill's struggle to retain North-West Manchester. The constituency includes a great body of merchants, a large proportion of Jews, a considerable Irish element, and a mass of workmen, so that it is typical of nearly every phase of our politics. It also represents a Free Trade citadel, with a specially engaging and brilliant champion to hold it. Mr. Joynson-Hicks, his opponent, places a pledge to Balfourism in a corner of his address, and is reported to have said that he would not consider his victory a success for Tariff Reform.

Mr. Churchill's address, written with singular verve and freshness, insists that the Tory aim is to establish "a preferential, retaliatory, or protective tariff." He claims for the Government the creation of a great Afrikander Federation in South Africa under the Union Jack, pledges himself to support the Licensing Bill "in its integrity," pleads for an "amicable" settlement of education, claims a Liberal reduction of forty-three millions in debt, taxation, and expenditure, but does not mention Ireland. He is fighting his campaign with brilliant generalship and incessant soldiering, and has had a warm response from the constituency.

* * *

Mr. Roosevelt is pressing his big navy policy with all his might. His message to Congress calling for the construction of the four new "Dreadnoughts" suggested by the Navy Department, is one of the most reactionary State documents which any modern Government has set forth, not excluding Germany. He minimises the uses of arbitration, pretends that great naval armaments are necessary to prevent the oppression of weak nations by strong, though America has used her new navy only for the dragooning of the weak, and suggests that if the United States desires to avoid "insult," it must "be able to repel it." Mr. Roosevelt does not specify what country proposes to insult the most touchy and not the least aggressive of the Great Powers, whose need for a huge navy proceeds entirely from her breach with her own Constitution, and which is more responsible than Germany for the new start in naval armaments.

* * *

The Prussian Landtag was dissolved on April 9th, and the new elections will take place in June. The elections are to be used by the Socialists as a demonstration in favour of a reformed franchise. The Prussian franchise, with its triple plutocratic division and its system of indirect and public voting, has hitherto kept the Socialists entirely out of the Landtag. They may possibly carry a candidate or two on this occasion, but their chief aim is to poll an imposing voting strength. The "Vorwärts" plainly puts its hope of ultimate success on extra-Parliamentary agitation, and it makes the remark—so significant of the change which is coming over the temper of the German social democracy—that "the three-class franchise is incompatible with the peaceful development of Germany, and the incompatibility must be demonstrated." The Radicals, who theoretically support universal, secret, and direct suffrage, are making a sorry show. They are excluding democratic candidates and making pacts with the National Liberals and other reactionaries. It is inevitable that the working alliance in the Reichstag should have a parallel in Prussia, and Prince Bülow's insistence on the profit the Socialists would get from a democratic franchise is having a persuasive effect on a Radical Party already corrupted by compromise.

* * *

In dissolving the Finnish Diet because of its vote of censure on the Senate, the Czar probably desired to postpone the necessity of coming to a decision on the real Finnish problem. That problem is illuminated by three interpellations which are about to be discussed in the Duma. Two, presented by the Right, charge Finland with organising an armed revolt against the Russian connection, and with being the seat of all the Russian conspiracies against the present régime; the third, presented by the Octobrists, demands to know why Finnish affairs, unlike the affairs of other provinces, go straight to the Czar from the Finnish Secretary instead of through the Premier. What is sought is a declaration from the Government that Finland is not an autonomous State linked with Russia only through a common sovereign, but merely a province of Russia on the same constitutional footing as the other provinces. In other words, the majority of the Duma is working for a restoration of the Bobrikoff system. So far, the Government has resisted the pressure put upon it, but if, as is probable, the Socialists are returned in nearly their old strength on July 1st, we may see a change.

* * *

The murder of Count Potocki, the Polish Governor of Galicia, by a Ruthenian student, brings before the general public the bitter struggle in that province between the Poles and the Ruthenians. The Austrian Government has won the good-will of the Poles by handing over Galicia to them. Now that the Galician Jews have formed a national party, the Ruthenians, who are a little Russian people of the same blood and tongue as the people of the Ukraine, probably outnumber the Poles in Galicia. Nevertheless, the whole provincial administration is in Polish hands, the Universities are Polish, and the machinery of government is employed to crush out Ruthenian national consciousness and preserve Polish dominion. Under the Universal Franchise Act for the Reichsrath the Poles secured a quite disproportionate number of seats, and they conducted the elections against the Jewish National Party and the Ruthenians with lawlessness and not a little violence. Count Potocki, as Governor, concentrated upon himself the hatred of the suppressed race, and the Ruthenian students held him particularly responsible for the imprisonment of the Lemberg students, which led to a "hunger strike" last year. This is the explanation of the crime.

* * *

An almost comic sidelight was thrown on Protection by a short debate on the hop industry which took place in the House of Commons on its re-assembling on Tuesday. Sir Gilbert Parker, as member for Gravesend, desired the Government to stop the "dumping" of Californian hops, declaring inaccurately that 8,000 tons of foreign hops had been landed here within the last three weeks, and that 15,000 more tons were coming. The Protectionists want a duty of 40s. a hundredweight, which, as Mr. Harold Cox pointed out, was putting a tax on raw material in order to raise the price to the consumer. Sir Gilbert suggested that the evil lay in the Americans who "dumped," but it clearly resides, as the new Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out, in the brewers who buy. "Here," says Mr. George, addressing this industry, "are you, a great patriotic trade, using all this foreign stuff." Mr. Gretton, of Messrs. Bass, made it quite clear that foreign hops came in when the British hop harvest failed. As a matter of fact, the import of foreign hops depends largely on the English season, and the shrinkage of the hop area in Kent and elsewhere is due partly to intensive culture, partly to the brewers' use of substitutes.

* * *

It is now fairly certain that Mr. Taft will get the Republican nomination, but Republicans are not sanguine as to his chance of election. Apart from having to fight in a year of depression as the nominee of a party which has always claimed to be the masters of prosperity, he is faced by the opposition of the Trade Unions. Mr. Taft as a judge ran foul of Labour men by the lavish issue of injunctions, and even conservative labour has been stirred by the decision of the Supreme Court, which brings Trade Unions under the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. Labour is pressing for a law nullifying that decision; it is not likely to get it, nor will it be consoled by the new Employers' Liability Bill which Congress has just passed, and which it is generally expected the Supreme Court will declare as unconstitutional as the one which preceded it. The really interesting thing in American politics is the future of Labour. The Conservative section has hitherto prevented Labour organising as a party independent of Republicans and Democrats, but events are fighting against Mr. Gomperz and his friends. The American Constitution can hardly remain as it is, if a powerful American Labour Party should be formed.

* * *

The "Daily News" announces the approaching retirement of Sir Antony MacDonnell, the permanent Under-Secretary for Ireland. Sir Antony's greatest service was his brilliant organisation of the scheme of land purchase, and his success in turning the flank of Unionism with the meliorist Wyndham policy, of which he was the real author and executant. His Catholicism, and his honesty, strength of character, and love of his country, were also singularly useful assets in the composing of disputes arising out of the declining land-war. His weakness lay in his long detachment from Parliamentary Government, which a prolonged Indian service implied. This explained some defects both in the Council Bill and Mr. Bryce's Universities Bill, and underlay his general attitude to the Irish Parliamentary Party. But he is very nearly a great man, and he is a very good one.

* * *

Matthew Arnold died twenty years ago last Wednesday, and we are glad to see a disposition to give full weight and emphasis to his authority and message. He is now fixed in his true position as the most searching critic, perhaps the only great critic, of modern English life. His contribution to religious thought has been stamped with the approval of the most eminent of living writers; and the cause of politics has turned at last to the amelioration of precisely those phases of our society which he exposed to all who had eyes to see and which most deeply discredit it in the eyes of good and serious men. Much of what he has written, little considered in his day, might now be taken as a manual of modern thought and social and moral endeavour; and though in his poetry we recognise chiefly the retreat to a rather sad view of the world as he saw it, it more than retains its old power of appeal to the contemplative mind.

* * *

Of only moderate interest is the summer exhibition of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours, which opened on Monday. There are, however, a few drawings that claim attention. The six ample women in Mr. R. Anning Bell's "Cupid Disarmed" are admirably grouped against their background of heroic landscape, and the childish naughtiness in Cupid's face is a piquant note that relieves the rather massive dignity of his attendants. The colouring is deep and luscious. Mr. R. Thome-Waite's large landscape, "The Setting Sun," is a conscientious and accomplished study of warm atmospheric effect, the peace-inducing contemplation of which is only marred by the unfortunate violence of the sunset picture that hangs just below it. The two contributions of Mr. F. Cadogan Cowper, technically proficient as they are, do not indicate any development in his art, neither does Miss E. Fortescue-Brickdale, another talented artist of the same school, break any fresh ground in her conventional decorative panel, "The Ten Virgins."

Politics and Affairs.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

The Prime Minister may fairly accept the general conclusion about the new Government that in point of personnel it is a good one. He has made skilful and courageous use of the material at his disposal; and the general body of the Ministry has been brightened and strengthened. He has taken for his Chancellor the most vivid and original political talent in the party; and he has added to his inner counsels the most striking orator and the best fighting man that Liberalism has gained since Mr. Chamberlain changed the face of politics. He has been wise to repair visible weaknesses in the structure, and to provide the Colonies and the Admiralty with abler heads and more discreet or more exactly trained personalities than they have hitherto obtained. Equal wisdom has been shown in adapting the status of Ministers to modern needs and universal practice, and turning the heads of the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board into Secretaries of State. No country whose life-blood is commerce and labour should treat the heads of the departments that chiefly control these tremendous interests as if they were mere satellites to the shining luminaries that direct our foreign, our Indian, and our colonial policies. We may expect to see well-ordered Ministries of the Interior and of Commerce emerge from Mr. Asquith's further labors in co-ordinating the duties of the Home Office, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade. And, on the whole, he has distributed the minor appointments that have fallen vacant with regard to such talent, and such promise of power and usefulness, as reside in the younger members of the party. During the last ten years a school of young thinkers and workers has arisen to carry on the Liberal tradition, and to infuse it with fresh ideas, and anyone who glances down the list of under-secretaries in the Asquith administration will see that it is very fairly represented there. Mr. Samuel, Mr. Masterman, Mr. Acland, are all men who have spent thought and labour on the problems with which the modern statesman has to deal. We do not desire to make invidious comparisons, but it is clear that in serviceable talent for public work, the new Government, both in its higher and in its lower branches, compares favourably with Mr. Balfour's administration at any period of its existence, and completely outshines its later years.

Thus far, both the friends and the critics of the Government appear to stand on common ground. The new Ministry is admitted to be efficient, and we may add that while it is composed of men able to govern the Empire with vigor and discretion, it contains no extreme representative of the doctrine of Imperialism, whose logical end is Protection. In this matter, Mr. Asquith has acted fairly and honourably, and with some thought for the balance of forces in the party. But events have decided the part which Imperialism has had to play in the fortunes of the Liberal Party. It was never more than a passing phase, which derived its seeming importance from the South African War, and declined when the normal tendencies of our policy regained their accustomed strength. The Government therefore, in its general composition and tendencies, was bound to stand to the normal tradition of Liberal Ministries. But it is also necessary to note what is its relation to the politics of the hour. Since the purely Gladstonian conception of politics began to yield, Socialism has arisen, the women's movement has arisen, the Independent Labour Party has been formed, and, as a natural result of these new factors in the national life, men's eyes are no longer fixed almost exclusively on the strife between the old Constitutional parties. The Government, like its predecessor, has to make the best of this situation. The old conditions cannot recur, and Liberalism must console itself with the reflection that if it has to fight for its life with idealistic Socialists, Protectionists, indifferents, monopolist interests and their slaves or supporters, here lies the battleground of modern politics, and here, in choosing to stand for the general welfare of the people, it has a great and, indeed, a decisive, part to play. The Tories have chosen, in the name of Protection and the extended tariff, to embark on the meanest and most hypocritical kind of oppression of poverty by wealth known to the modern State; and sooner or later, in spite of its plausibilities, the worthlessness of that device will find them out. And the same kind of popular disillusion must follow the preaching of revolutionary Socialism. Every intelligent, conscientious Socialist knows this, and realises that he could not stay the ruin of a community which was too heedlessly pushed into the repudiation of private property, and that neither the workmen nor the middle-class Socialists of experience and capacity would know what to do with such a situation if it were brought about. Liberalism is, after all, the guardian of the tradition of liberty, and in that capacity it is always called upon to keep men, including Socialists, alive to the dangers of mere bureaucracy. And, furthermore, when it comes to practical remedies for social evils on co-operative or collectivist lines, Socialists, for all their repudiation of Liberalism, know that within its bosom reside, in the main, those forces of intelligence and of social compunction on which, served as they are by a great organisation, reformers must rely.

Here, then, is a guide to the policy of Liberal Governments, which, unless bad and short-sighted counsels prevail, ensures their usefulness and provides them with definite functions in the interpretation of popular needs. The danger is that this middle position will not prove interesting enough. To the enthusiast, and also to the average Liberal, much was lost when "C.B." went: chiefly a feeling that under him the Government had its "heart in the right place." And the democracy is all for attractiveness in its leaders and their ideas. Socialism is attractive; Protection is attractive. Can Liberalism be made attractive? Is it fresh and sincere enough, has it the gift of disinterestedness which makes the early life of the Labour Party, for all its crudeness, so engaging? Is it not in danger of losing the mass of the workmen, for lack of ideas, for want of feeling and depth in its exponents, and because of its separation, in the persons of its leaders and in its local organisations, from the daily life of the people? With all its merits it ought to be more successful than it is; it ought to be better able to impress the man in the street with the idea that it is going to win. We doubt whether it can thoroughly catch the popular imagination so long as its policy seems to be dominated by Mr. Balfour's will, and unless it emerges from its struggle with the Lords with some substantial trophies of victory, some proof that, by choosing its ground where the Commons are supreme, it can shake that old citadel of privilege to its fall. Here Mr. George's selection for the Chancellorship is hopeful. Finance is not only the key to the fight with the Lords, but it opens up the centre of the warfare with Protection and the struggle to provide a fund for social reform. If, therefore, Mr. Asquith is bold and resourceful, if he does not recoil after a check by the Lords, or recoils only to make a surer lead the next time, if he can show the end of Liberal policy to be the gradual raising of the standard of life for the mass of our population, until they pass far beyond the present low level of comfort and refinement, if he and his more powerful lieutenants can persuade the Nonconformists and the middle-classes to further so truly moral and intelligent an aim, and the workmen not to leave reform for a will-o'-the-wisp, and, above all, if he will not forget Ireland, he will have kept the heart of Liberalism alive. That, and not the exhibition of a mechanical efficiency, is the really important task of the new Government. Politics in the last two decades have become more and more real; and the palm will go to the party which is most in touch with reality.

THE POSITION OF THE MONARCH.

The return of King Edward to London suggests some observations, as true as they are trite, upon the rôle of the modern Sovereign in the modern State.

We have heard a good deal of late, perhaps a little too much, about the revival of Monarchy. The one good thing about the absence of the King from his Capital during the recent Ministerial crisis is the evidence which it affords that the popular notion of the supreme importance of the Sovereign in a Constitutional State does not impose upon the reigning Monarch. He did not deem it necessary to leave Biarritz when a new Administration had to be brought into being. There was a suspicion in some minds that the example of his nephew and the prestige of Queen Victoria in her later years had convinced King Edward that in this democratic age the Monarch had regained in personal influence what he had lost in constitutional authority. Biarritz in April has dispelled that alarm. The King knows that kingship in the Prussian sense is an historic survival, a ghost permitted to haunt the places where Monarchs ruled. Therein he shows his good sense, his ability to distinguish the real from the sham. But this month he has shown that he knows it, and therein he has committed the first error of his reign. We maintain the Monarchy for many reasons, historic, traditional, and political. It has its uses, not merely ceremonial, but solid uses, as more than one episode in the late Queen's reign conclusively showed. But one of the conditions of its usefulness is that the less real insignia of the institution must be kept polished, and in full view of the public. Therefore, when the King remains at Biarritz while the Empire is in the throes of a Ministerial crisis, he commits an error of Statecraft. With his own Royal hand, he writes up before the eyes of all his subjects, "The Monarch is a negligible quantity." And with all due respect to his Majesty, it is necessary to say that this was a mistake.

At the same time, it may turn out that this, the first, and indeed the only blunder of his reign, may, with his Majesty's characteristic good fortune, be a blessing both to the Monarchy and to the Empire. No one can travel on the Continent or in the United States without being reminded at every turn of the prodigious reputation which King Edward has achieved. Mr. Carnegie outdoes any Monarchist in his eulogy of the Royal ambassador of peace. In France the peasants gather in crowds at railway stations merely to see the express whizz by in which "Le Roi" travels. In Germany the few but noisy Chauvinists are obsessed by the conception of his omnipresent influence. He it is who is supposed to direct all the threads of British diplomacy. He is the author of the entente cordiale. He is the subtle and weariless statesman who has spun round Germany a network of alliances through which she in vain attempts to break. When he goes to Paris or to Rome, ambassadors have to give solemn explanations—usually disbelieved—as to the innocent object of his Majesty's journeys. It is not too much to say that, in the eyes of many very clever people on the Continent, all the recent diplomacy of Europe centres in the great game of chess between King and Kaiser. Just as in England we credit the direction of German foreign policy not to Prince von Bülow, but to the Kaiser.

Everyone in England knows that this is nonsense. We know our Monarchy and Constitution too well to be under any delusion as to the part which his Majesty plays in international politics. But others do not, and it is a serious and an all-round danger that the King should be supposed to be more important and influential than he really is. And the fact that he did not consider that there was any pressing need for him to be in his Capital when a new Ministry was being formed will, it may be hoped, do something to remind the European and the American public that in his own estimation King Edward is not the real captain of the ship of State, whose rudder is in other hands.

It is always a somewhat thankless task to write of kings. If we praise them when they deserve our eulogy, we are distrusted as flatterers. If we censure them when they go wrong, it is regarded as a species of lèse majesté. It is, however, sometimes a duty to tell the truth to kings, and the present occasion offers an opportunity which ought not to be allowed to slip. The popularity of King Edward renders it difficult to suggest that he has made a mistake. But the suggestion may be forgiven when the mistake is pointed out in his own interest. Kings, like meaner mortals, fancy themselves, and, in their case, the prayer that we may not think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think is rarely answered, even if it is offered. But King Edward has, by the exercise of the gifts which he possesses, succeeded in gaining a great reputation for talents which he would be the last to claim. Good nature, good feeling, and instinctive tact are valuable qualities. But they do not turn a popular king into a great statesman. The conception of the Seventh Edward as an English Richelieu which prevails in some quarters in Germany is baseless. The King has neither the powers nor the ambition nor the temperament of Richelieu. He is no student; neither is he an idealist. He is essentially a good-natured, prudent man, with much shrewd sense, much experience of the world, and a habit of dealing with men which has been, at times, of great service to his country. He is sympathetic, quick to see what is the right thing to do in any situation if only he can be got to see it whole. No statesman, Whig or Tory, has ever been influenced, so far as can be known, by any counsels of the King. On the other hand, no one has ever found him obstinate or reactionary. He is, as kings go, one of the best of the bunch. But, perhaps, the best of his qualities is shown in his superiority to the megalomania which unwise or ill-informed people insist on attributing to him.

THE NEXT PHASE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

With what a biting humour has history rounded off the tragic-comic episode of the last decade in South Africa! It is just ten years since that able architect of ruin, then Sir Alfred Milner, discovered in the Bond and in Krugerism that determination of the settled population of the country to rule which he called Africanderdom, and sought to crush. Africanderdom is now triumphant, and by Lord Milner's act. For the war which he engineered brought him a victory far worse than hollow. It brought the permanent and necessary frustration in South Africa of that distinctively British dominion which he half-wrecked the country to establish. The Transvaal is to-day in the hands of a Government whose Prime Minister was Commander-in-Chief of the Boer forces in the war, while its ablest member, Mr. Smuts, was Mr. Chamberlain's diplomatic antagonist in 1899, and two years later raided the Colony at the head of his horse. The Orange River Colony is under the sway of the strongest member of the late Republican régime, Mr. Fischer, who has with him an overwhelming majority of Dutch colleagues.

The recent turn of events in Cape Colony has now deposed Dr. Jameson, the leader of the Raid, and has placed in the seat of authority Mr. Merriman, the stoutest opponent of the war policy, with a large majority in both Houses of Assembly whose return is described, not, perhaps, unfairly, as largely attributable to the votes of "ex-rebels," recently restored to the rights of citizenship. Three of the four Colonies are thus solidly Africander under abiding and compact majorities of Dutch-British: the fourth, Natal, remains sunk in the degradation of martial law and in desperate financial straits, the only corner of the country where men of British race rule and hold undivided sway. To Lord Milner this doubtless appears a shocking state of things, for which he would wish to hold our Liberal Government responsible; it is a new and a political Majuba. But the least reflection will dispel the folly of this view. Had a Conservative Government been continuously in power, the war would have yielded precisely the same fruits, a little tardier, that is all. To have withheld complete self-government for more than a few years would have been so manifest a violation of the spirit and the letter of Vereeniging that shame, to say nothing of the pressure of the other white Colonies, would have forced them to hand over the country to the rule of a Dutch majority somewhat larger and more solid than the present and very much more intransigeant. All this might have been foreseen, and is one more testimony to the blindness of Jingoism. It is quite true that in the outcome there is nothing to fear, but this is because there was no cause for fear before. If it had really been the settled policy and purpose of the Dutch to drive the British into the sea, in order to set up a Federal Republic of their own, they would be in a very much better position to compass this end now than ten years ago. For there is hardly one of the acts of oppression we talked about then which they cannot now, as self-governing British Colonies, commit with impunity. Could we prevent them from spending any money they liked in setting up militia and in importing guns? Can we claim to interfere in any way with their police administration, the decisions of their judges, their system of taxation, the teaching in their schools, their right to expel undesirables, their treatment of the natives, or even of British Indians? Almost every action which formed the substance of Sir Alfred Milner's indictment of the Kruger Government in 1899 is now clearly within the competency of Mr. Botha. Nay, should it be thought that the Constitutions set some limitations on the new Colonial Governments, we have only to cite the current course of events in Natal to dispel any such delusion. If there is anything constitutional, as to restrictions on their native rule or otherwise, which hampers Mr. Botha or Mr. Fischer, he has only to copy Mr. Moor, suspend his Constitution, declare martial law, and the Imperial Government, accepting his own assurances that his illegal conduct was justifiable, will grant him immunity. Such, it appears, is now the status of a self-governing Colony, with which no British Government, Liberal or Conservative, can attempt to interfere unless it is prepared to defy the stout, unanimous resentment of the whole "family."

This process of events, moving so fast, now calls a halt as the several Colonies confront the important issue of their future relations to one another. At the forthcoming inter-Colonial Conference the question of Union or of Federation must force its way to the front as the dominant issue of practical politics in South Africa during the next few years. To the political observer from outside it seems the simplest thing in the world to achieve such Union or Federation among States severed by no strong natural barriers and by no wide divergency of climatic and other physical conditions, and peopled by the same white and coloured races, occupied for the most part in similar industries, and holding the same general level of civilisation. That this community of natural and human conditions does make for unity of government is undeniable. Even before the war the centralising tendency found expression in tentative experiments towards a common policy in customs and railroads which must ultimately have ripened into definite political agreements. But in South Africa itself it is natural that the impending prospect of closer political union should tend for the time to emphasise the difficulties and divergencies of interest between the States. Natal, in virtue of her distinctively British white population, fears to be swamped either in a Union or a Federation where Dutch votes will be dominant; the inland States are suspicious of the manipulation of customs and railroads in the interests of the seaport States; the bitter antagonism displayed in the past between Cape Town and Durban, and the strong interest which the Transvaal has manifested in the development of the shorter route through Lorenzo Marques, are grave obstacles in the way of a Federation which shall be real in its establishment of central government. Besides these specific divergencies, the practical dominance which the mining industry must secure to the Transvaal by virtue of its wealth, its growing population, and the superior capacity and energy of its leaders, remains a source of half-conscious dread to the more backward States. Finally, the unsettled and anomalous condition of that huge speculative estate, Rhodesia, which could not be wholly left out of consideration in a federal scheme, introduces a whole sheaf of difficulties.

That the principle of South African solidarity will finally triumph over these numerous obstacles cannot, however, be seriously questioned. Whether the unifying process will stop with a moderate measure of federal control, or will move further towards unity, will probably depend on that great perpetually disturbing factor, the native question, more than on any other matter. For to any stable genuine Federation some common native policy is admittedly essential; and yet the history and the present local conditions of the several States impose peculiar difficulties upon the attainment of such policy. Cape Colony cannot, and does not, desire to abandon her comparatively enlightened policy as regards the native franchise, education, and land settlement. But none of the other States are prepared to give any real and direct political representation to the natives. Natal, and even possibly the Transvaal, might with reluctance be induced to make some slight experiment in the direction of the New Zealand Maori policy, barring the election of coloured representatives. But the Orange River Colony would entertain no such proposition, nor would Rhodesia, were this State brought into a Federation. It is, indeed, the reluctance to raise this huge underlying issue that holds back Federation as a pressing policy. For it is felt that in the settling of a federal constitution the Imperial Government would claim to have some say upon arrangements which involved the vital interests of the natives who constitute the vast majority of British subjects in South Africa. And, indeed, it is eminently desirable that we should turn our minds more definitely upon the obligations of the Imperial Government in the large re-settlement that is contemplated. That the small groups of white business-politicians who may occupy the seat of government in one of these States cannot be implicitly trusted to show justice or mercy to the subject-race is a lesson bitterly impressed not by one but by a score of episodes in South African history. If, as is not unnatural, Federation should be accompanied by a demand that the new South African Dominion should be entrusted with the same full measure of government over her subject-races as is possessed by Canada or Australia, the only practical safeguard of the interests of natives might consist in an arrangement for the transfer of such native territories as Zululand, Swaziland, Basutoland, and the Bechuanaland Protectorate to the province of the Federal Government. Though such an arrangement would still leave the large mass of the natives, who, as individuals or in clans, are scattered over the several States, to the separate administration of the State Governments, it would at least substitute a wider and, perhaps, a wiser and humaner judgment for the perilous mis-handling by which from time to time a single State has placed in jeopardy the entire fabric of white civilisation in South Africa.

THE PARTY OF PROTECTION.

Having at length caged their shy bird, our Protectionists apparently decided to let him loose again for a decoy to catch other birds. So he has gone about with free talk about "broadening the basis of taxation," "Imperial unity," and other amiable phrases. With them he seems to have caught Lord Curzon. To some fiscal "innocents" it appears as if Lord Curzon, a Free Trader "at heart," may have saved Mr. Balfour from fiscal damnation by the simple device of furnishing a new formula. The "Westminster Gazette," for instance, ever anxious over fiscal and other wandering souls, finds curious comfort in a cryptic phrase of Lord Curzon's: "It might be that this change, when it did come, would not take precisely the shape that was anticipated by the authors of the movement," followed by a more definite suggestion that what England needed was a tariff like that of India. This Indian tariff, introduced "for revenue purposes in England," might also be utilised for Colonial preference as well as "to improve the position of our trade, or to secure better employment for our working-classes." But does Lord Curzon really imagine that he has persuaded, or can persuade, Mr. Balfour that an Indian tariff will satisfy the demands of the British Protectionists, or even the conditions of his own commitments? Here are some of the points of his Indian tariff. It taxes large numbers of raw materials, it lets manufacturing machinery in free, though taxing the tools of the ordinary workmen; its purely "revenue" purpose is marked by the fact that the import duties upon cotton goods are balanced by excise duties upon domestic manufactures. But Mr. Balfour has declared against all taxation of raw materials, his general tax upon foreign manufactured goods must be taken to include machinery, and in all his fiscal writings he has never suggested that he proposes to rob import duties of their incidental protective value by imposing excise duties. The only resemblance between the Indian tariff and that foreshadowed by Mr. Balfour is the multiplicity of low duties. The notion that Mr. Balfour has drawn or can draw the fiscal reform movement in this country away from Protection towards tariff for revenue only, on the basis of a number of small taxes upon foreign manufactured goods is a delusion, kept alive merely to lure stray Free-fooders into the fold. It has no plausible support, even from the speeches of Mr. Balfour.

For Free Traders and their cause a plain recognition of the fact that Mr. Balfour is committed to Protection in four separate ways is quite essential. In his famous Valentine letter he declared for "a moderate general tariff on manufactured goods," together with "a small duty on foreign wheat" unaccompanied by excise; he has repeatedly advocated the use of a tariff for negotiation and for retaliation, for imperial preference, and for meeting an "unfair competition." Every one of these acts entails Protection. It is quite true that for each case he supplies a "motive" which is not protective in the simpler sense. Indeed, it may be admitted that a new large source of revenue which shall meet the needs of Conservative finance, without recourse to direct taxation, is to him the first consideration, and that, for the rest, his tariff is a blend of imperial cement, anti-dumping, and diplomatic bargaining. But our Protectionist Party know better than to trouble about the "intentions" of their casuistical leader. They are concerned not with what he intends or means, but with what he does. And they are satisfied that, if in two or three years' time the Conservative Party is placed in office, Mr. Balfour will produce a tariff on the lines which they require. This tariff is to produce a revenue large enough to enable them to reduce existing taxes upon income and property, and to furnish the necessary fund for old age pensions and other social progress by shifting the existing taxes from sugar and tea on to agricultural produce without raising the total taxation for the working classes, and by imposing low general duties on imported manufactured goods. This tariff has been proposed by the avowed Protectionists, and formally accepted by Mr. Balfour. When, therefore, any suspected free-fooder or other hesitant Unionist accepts, as Lord Curzon did, "Mr. Balfour's platform," he commits himself to protective duties upon foods and manufactures, and, though he may shy from the admission, upon raw materials.

For neither Mr. Balfour nor any one else has dared to meet the Free Trade challenge upon raw materials. No single one of the tariff objects can be secured without taxing them. Effective negotiation, or retaliation, requires the liberty to tax materials, for in no other way could we bring pressure upon such countries as the United States and Russia; Colonial Preference is impossible without it, for investigation of Colonial imports into this country attests the accuracy of Mr. Asquith's declaration at the Colonial Conference, "that you cannot possibly give a preference which shall be anything like an even-handed preference between the different Colonies of the Empire unless you include in it raw materials as well as food." Most of the flagrant cases of dumping have reference to metal bars, rails, and other materials of manufacture. The outcry about foreign hops in Tuesday's debate in the Commons brings the Protectionists full on to the taxation of raw materials, and gives a ludicrous turn to the brewers' catchword, "Your beer will cost you more." Finally, if all manufactures which are raw materials for other manufactures are to be exempt, the bearing of the tariff on manufactures will be whittled down to small proportions. Take the single instance of the building trade, upon which Mr. F. J. Voicey has recently furnished some interesting information: "Nearly the whole of the timber used in house construction comes from the Baltic. There is nothing here in Britain to substitute for it. At present it is imported in log or bunch (a small quantity)—deals, battens, boards, laths, mouldings, and joinery. We get steel joists, nails, and glass from Belgium, and slates from France. We get marble goods from Italy, and ready-made doors from Sweden. Canada sends us doors while Belgium provides us with ornamental slates and cement. Spain produces the lead and Belgium the zinc for our roofs." Nearly all these raw materials of the building trade are also manufactured goods and compete with British produce. Are they to be taxed or to enter free? In scores of diverse trades this very practical problem must arise. Finally, the crowning absurdity of the proposal consists in the pretence that a number of low duties, five per cent., upon manufactured imports, without an increase of aggregate food-taxes, can yield the income required by our Protectionists to bribe the working-classes of this country by pensions and other social reforms. Five per cent. on fully manufactured imports would not, upon an outside computation, yield seven millions of money in any ordinary year, and from this must be deducted the enormous expense of collecting a mass of trifling duties from innumerable sources.

But these absurdities and palpable dishonesties must not lead us to suppose that Protectionism must break down in this country by dint of its intrinsic rottenness. Nothing of the sort. If the British manufacturing interests, who are the backbone of the movement, can once get their general tariff, however moderate, the needs of public revenue will be subordinated to their pockets. A British revival of agriculture, imperial unity, and all the other pretty phrases will go by the board, and a naked domination of greed and plunder, Protection in its proper, historic meaning, will be fastened on the necks of our people. This is what we have to fight. All this side play of politicians hankering for return to power, and practising the cajolery of their order, must not concern us over much. These gentlemen, however eminent, will all dance to the tune of the Protectionist paymaster of their party. "The world," said the late Sir James Stephen, "belongs to hard practical men, who know what they want, and mean to get it." This, at any rate, is nominally true of the world of politics. Our fight is essentially for the purity of public life, and in order to realise the task before us we must brush aside all the false distinctions with which the issue has been blurred. Not only is the Conservative Party and its organisation solidly committed to Protection, but Mr. Balfour, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Milner, and now Lord Curzon, stand for Protection as "the first constructive work of the Unionist Party."

Life and Letters.

FEAR.

I saw him first on a spring day—one of those days when the limbs are lazy with delicious tiredness, the air soft and warm against the face, the heart full of a queer longing to know the hearts of others.

He was quite a little man, with broad, high shoulders and hardly any neck; and what was noticeable in his square, wooden-looking figure, dressed in light grey, shabby tweed, and patched, yellow boots, was that he seemed to have no chest. He was flat—from his white face, with its sandy hair, moustache, and eyebrows, under an old, narrow-brimmed straw hat, right down to his feet. It was as though Life had planed him. His face, too, seemed to have lost all but its bones and skin of yellow white; there were no eyelashes to his reddish-brown, round eyes; there was no colour in his thin lips, compressed as though to keep the secret of a mortal fear. But for the wheeze and rustle of his breathing, he stood very still, nervously rubbing his claw-like hands up and down his trouser legs.

He spoke in a hoarse, faint voice.

"I was a baker. They tell me as how that's where I've done meself the harm. But I never learnt another trade; I was afraid that if I give it up I wouldn't get no other work. Bakin's not good for——"

He laid his thin, yellow fingers where there was so little left to lay them on.

"See, there's my wife and child," he went on in his matter-of-fact voice: "I tell you what it is, sir; I'm fair frightened. If I could give up thinking of what's coming to them, I believe that I'd feel better. But what am I to do? All my savin's have gone now; I'm selling off my things, an' when I'm through with that—there we shall be."

His unlovely little face, with its hard-bitten lips and lashless eyes, quivered all over suddenly, as though within him all his fear had risen up, seized on his features, and set them to a dance of agony; but they were soon still again. Stillness was the only possible condition for a face covering such thoughts as he had had.

"I don't sleep for thinkin' of it—that's against me!"

Yes—that was against him, considering the nature of his health. Any doctor would have told him to sleep well; that sleep, in fact, was quite essential. And I seemed to see him lying on his back, staring at the darkness, with those lashless, red-rimmed eyes, trying to find in its black depths something that was not there—the wan glow of a livelihood of some kind for his wife and child.

"I gets in such a muck o' sweat, worrying about what's going to come to them with me like this; it quite exhausts me, it does really. You wouldn't believe how weak I was!"

And one could not help reminding him that he ought not to worry—it was very bad for him.

"Yes, I know that; I don't think I can last long at this rate."

"If you could give up worrying you would get well much quicker!"

He answered by a look of such humble and unconscious irony, as one may see on the faces of the dead before their last wonder at the end has faded from them.

"They tells me up at the 'ospital to eat well."

And, looking at this meagre little man, it seemed that the advice was good. Good food, and plenty of it!

"I've been doing the best I can, of course." He made this statement without sarcasm, in a voice that seemed to say: This world, I live in, is, of course, a funny world; the sort of fun it likes may be first-rate, but if I were once to begin to laugh at it, where could I stop—I ask you—where?

"Plenty of milk they tell me's the best thing I can take, but the child she's bound to have as much as we can manage to buy. At her age, you see, she needs it. Of course, if I could get a job!—I'd take anything—I'd drive a baker's cart!"

He lifted his little pipes of arms, and let them fall again, and God knows what he meant by such a motion, unless it were to show his strength.

"Of course, some days," he said, "I can hardly get my breath at all, and that's against me."

It would be, as he said, against him; and, encouraged by a look, he added:

"I know I kep' on too long with my profession; but you know what it is, when you've been brought up to a job you get to depend on it—to give it up it's like chuckin' of yerself away. And that's what I've found it—people don't want such as I am now."

And for a full half-minute we stood looking at each other; his bitten, discoloured lips twitched twice, and a faint pink warmed the paper whiteness of his cheeks.

"Up at the 'ospital they don't seem to take no interest in my case any more; seems as if they thought it 'opeless."

Unconscious that he had gone beneath the depths of human nature, shown up the human passion for definite success, illustrated human worship of the idol, strength, human scorn for what is weak—he said these simple words in an almost injured tone. Recovery might be impossible, people did not want such as he was now; but he was still interesting to himself, still loth to find himself a useless bee ejected from the hive. His lashless eyes seemed saying: "I believe I could get well—I do believe I could!"

Yet he was not unreasonable, for he went on:

"When I first went there, they took a lot of interest in me—but that's a year ago. Perhaps I've disappointed them."

Perhaps he had!

"They keep on tellin' me to take plenty of fresh air. Where I live, of course, there's not so very much about, but I take all I can. Not bein' able to get a job, I've been sitting in the Park. I take the child—they tell me not to have her too near me in the house."

And I had a vision of this man of leisure sitting in the Park, rubbing his hands stealthily to keep them dry, and watching with red eyes the other men of leisure; too preoccupied to wonder, even, why his leisure was not like theirs.

"Days like this," he said, "it's warm enough; but I can't enjoy them for thinking of what's coming."

His glance wandered to the pear trees in the garden —they were all in blossom, and lighted by the sun; he looked down again a little hastily. A blackbird sang beyond the further wall. The little baker passed his tongue over his lips.

"I'm a country-man by birth," he said; "it's like the country here. If I could get a job down in the country I should pick up, perhaps. Last time I was in the country I put on 'alf a stone. But who'd take me?"

Again he raised his little pipes of arms; this time it was clearly not to show his strength. No—he seemed to say: No one would take me! I have found that out—I have found out all there is to know. I am done for!

"That's about where it is," he said; "and I wouldn't care so much, but for the baby and my wife. I don't see what I could ha' done, other than what I have done. God knows I kep' on at it till I couldn't keep on no longer."

And as though he knew that he was again near that point when a hundred times he had broken into private agony seen by no creature but himself, he stared hard at me, and his red moustache bristled over his sunken, indrawn lips.

A pigeon flew across; settling on a tree in the next garden, it began to call its mate; and suddenly there came into my mind the memory of a thrush that, some months before, had come to the garden bed where we were standing, and all day long would hide and hop there, avoiding other birds, with its feathers all staring and puffed out; and how it would let us take it up; I remembered, too, the film that kept falling on its eyes, and its sick heart beating so faintly beneath our hands; no bird of all the other birds came near it—knowing that it could no longer peck its living, and was going to die. One day we could not find it; the next day we found it under a bush, dead.

"I suppose it's human nature not to take me on, seein' the state I'm in," the little baker said. "I don't want to be a trouble to no one, I'm sure; I've always kept myself ever since I was that high," he put his land out level with his waist; "and now I can't keep myself, let alone the wife and child. It's the coming to the end of everything—it's the seeing of it coming. Fear—that's what it is. But I suppose I'm not the only one."

And for the moment he seemed comforted by this thought that there were thousands of other working creatures, on whose shoulders sat the grinning cat of mortal illness, all staring with him at utter emptiness—thousands of other working creatures who were dying because fear had made them work too long. His face brightened ever so little, as though the sun had found a way to him. But suddenly that wooden look, the only safe and perfect look, came back to his features. One could have sworn that fear had never touched him, so expressionless, so still was he!

But, hearing that a way would be found, that something would be done, his whole face worked; over his eyes—as over the young thrush's eyes—there seemed to come a film.

"I'm sure," he said, "I'm sure, I——" That which had been his chest heaved violently; he turned away; and his little, flat, thin figure passed down the path, out at the gate, with shoulders twitching as though his heart were choking him.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

THE PLEASANT LAND.

WONDERFULLY easy social intercourse Mr. March Phillipps found to be characteristic of the French in Algeria. He discovered on the borders of the desert, encompassed by hostile peoples the same ideal of daily life which occupies the permanent place in the home land in "the green nooks and pleasant valleys, the cottages, smothered in vines, the pastoral farms that nestle on the slopes." It is an ideal of a daily life which has repeatedly essayed the achievement of the impossible, and found that achievement hedged in, on the one side or the other, by the limitations of human existence. Recognising these boundaries, although with occasional frettings against their sharp prohibitions, it has determined to make the best of it, to get the best out of it. Candide had laid down the secret, after his effort to overturn the world, and his more heroic effort to explain it, it is necessary to cultivate the garden; in such cultivation bringing forth not only the stout roots and vegetables necessary for the sustenance of the body, but also fruit that is pleasant to the taste, and all manner of sweet smelling herbs, and gaily coloured flowers. And France, under the third Republic, seems settling down in tranquillity to this ideal of human well-being, with a dominant ideal of social equality, and strong human instinct for all which makes for the ideal of social life; the café as much as the school and the church as an engine of civilisation, family affection, good talk, industry and thrift, a society family based upon a prosperous peasant race which have converted the "pleasant land of France" into one great garden.

It is as a people of the soil, drawing from ownership of its variegated surface forces of determination, tenacity, and affection for their native land, that the French people appear in the summary of the time. After the overwhelming calamity of 1870, "Nature and the wonderful soil of France" began and successfully carried through the work of reparation. M. Hanotaux, in his brilliant history of "Contemporary France," shows the striking contrast: on the one side, the intellectuals overwhelmed, finding their fine theories collapsing before the iron logic of merciless war, declaring that all is lost, the twilight of the gods has come; on the other, the millions of peasants turning with undismayed devotion to gather in the abundant harvest and effect the work of restoration. Renan and Taine were overwhelmed by the pressure of the times. "Henceforth," says his biographer, "the consciousness of his impotence in the sphere of action oppressed Renan, and even threatened the fundamental serenity of his nature." "My heart is dead within my breast," was the cry of Taine. "I feel as if I were living in a madhouse. I have even lost the feeling of indignation." "I am in a continuous state of dumb anger and dry despair." Meantime, out in the cornfields and vineyards and orchards the common people were turning to man's common labour, the life and work of the day. The two astonishing harvests, the two summers after the war, sufficed to cover the amount of the war indemnity; everywhere intensive cultivation gathered in "wealth born of sunshine." The nation, in its hour of anguish, fell back upon the strength of the working people, and was saved. "This obscure mass, unknown to itself," says M. Hanotaux, "hardly known to those who direct its movements, is the producer of those riches drawn from the soil which brought about national deliverance. This mass alone lives in familiar intercourse with Nature, the supreme resource in disaster; through its constant labour and continued thrift, by its anonymous and sustained work, it is conscious of being the very essence of France."

The "very essence of France" Mr. Prothero presents in his essays which bear so attractive a title. "The Pleasant Land of France" (John Murray) covers a wide field of interest: from examination of the condition of the French peasant and the various styles of farming and land tenure to analysis of the spirit of Rabelais, and some charming translations of modern French poetry. But it is all sustained by a setting of high praise welcome to all the lovers of the most loveable of all the nations of the world. "In France," says the author in his preface, "I have spent many of the happiest days of my life. To her pleasant land I owe a lasting debt of gratitude. If anything contained in these pages helps to disperse a single national prejudice, or to place any features in the genius and character of our neighbours in a fairer light, their object will have been gained." He forsakes Paris for the little provincial city, dependent for its prosperity on the patronage of the rural cultivators around it, with its air of gaiety, comfort, and acquiescence, sharply challenged by the old ruined castle above the hillsides, or the great Church whose strong and defiant roof and arches and tower proclaim another kingdom—perhaps dead, perhaps only sleeping in the sunlight, while the sunlight endures. Here, especially in the little place which is the centre of the social life, is a scene busy and active, yet "steeped in that indefinable atmosphere of gay leisure which is the heritage of a people who, in spite of their indefatigable industry, have yet succeeded in keeping on good terms with idleness." Mr. Prothero, like Mr. March Phillipps, finds the inevitable café the centre and symbol of the organised social life. "A history of cafés," he declares, "would be the most important chapter in the history of modern French society: clean, bright, and gay, they are the salons of the democracy. We have, to our historical loss, nothing like them." "There is a babel of voices; but the chief stimulants are coffee or sorbets, and drunkenness is practically unknown within their doors." There is fierce gambling in cards or dominoes, with two lumps of sugar for stakes, perpetual talk, perpetual laughter, that easy friendliness and familiarity which Matthew Arnold laboured to exalt to his fellow countrymen as the excellent side of the "café-haunting, dominoes-playing Frenchman," and laboured in vain. Out and beyond the little lights of these little centres, where men huddle together for companionship and the arrest of fear, stretch the realities of difficult, elemental things. It is a land studded with the ruins of all the past, with every rock and stone testifying to the once puissant emotion of extravagant human endeavour. Here is a manor house dismantled, as it has stood for a hundred years, or a round tower testifying to the fury of the Huguenot wars, or the cloister of a deserted monastery, with the ivy and nettle flung over its crumbling arches, and "Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité" defiantly daubed on its walls, or a wayside shrine, before which the flowers are withered, to whom none is so poor as to do reverence. And behind (again) this human background to the present is the record of man's achievement in a magnificent past, is that Nature which judges, with compassion, if with a kind of abiding irony, alike the present's tranquillity and comfort and the past's hungry ardours; in the afternoon sunshine with its clear white radiance illuminating the long white streets of the little white villages deserted by all but the very young and the very old; in the tall poplars and quick clear rivers, and opulent earth, which responds to the efforts of man to compel it fruitful increase; in those diverse seas and oceans which beat around its long, wave-beaten shores; in the silence and vast spaces of its starlit night. Out of such a play of forces, to-day still challenged by the hope and fire of yesterday; existence occupied with labour, sorrow, and joy, a determination to "make the best of it" between dawn and sunset, and the dignity that comes from possession, and a readiness to defend that possession to the death, has the France of to-day been born.

"The Frenchman of to-day," declares Mr. Prothero, "has overleaped the stage of imaginative romance which separates the child from the man." He finds illustration in one of the quieter streams which water that delightful country of Touraine, wandering so peacefully between tall trees through the rich, warm soil, beneath the shadow of low, vine-covered hills. "It flows through centres of human life, caring for no other world than that of man. Easy of access, keenly alive to external impression, suffering no passing object to escape the alertness of its notice, quick to reflect on its surface the most passing lights and ephemeral shadows, it will never achieve a romantic end by precipitating itself from a precipice." Just as the average Englishman remains, "if not a schoolboy, an undergraduate," so the "average Frenchman remains, in many respects, a child." He never feels the personal sense of the ludicrous. He has no perception of incongruities. "He cannot understand the meaning of the word 'prig,' because at no time, though often self-important, does he take the serious view of life, or of his part in it, the precocious conception of which distinguishes that variety of the human race." "It is as a child that he can take delight in simple, almost infant-like, pleasures, that he enjoys himself freely, and often selfishly, expresses his emotions openly, whether of joy, pleasure, affection, or rage, and walks in processions as if he were part of a pageant, not as if he were a shame-faced criminal." This frankness and indifference go far to explain a divergent point of view, which will probably never be reconciled or even, by the general on both sides, understood. "If he is immoral," says Mr. Prothero, "he is so frankly, and without disguise; he bangs the front door noisily as he goes or returns, while the Englishman, shoes in hand, lets himself out and in with a latch key, and, probably, officiates next morning at family prayers." And this child element, Mr. Prothero might have added, is responsible for that ultimate survival of something incalculable, manifesting itself in astonishing heroisms, energies, and brutalities which exist beneath a life apparently fashioned for an unending succession of comfort, security, and repose. In the midst of these tiny, pleasant cities, with their green-shuttered white houses, or set in large villages where the weeds and wild grasses encamp in the untrodden street, the traveller will come upon sudden visions of strong compelling things, the twin towers of the Cathedral of Séez rising from the apple orchards of Normandy, the flying buttresses and brown cascade of chapels in the central square at Le Mans, the huge height and splendour of the great church at Bourges, dominating the level, peaceful plain below. Seeing these, and the descendants of those who once fashioned them, the traveller will recognise also a force dormant, but still unsubdued, in a people who to-day seem content with quietness, but to-morrow may once again find the necessity laid upon them to voyage forth into uncharted seas, once more to assail the boundaries of man's effort, once more, in the collapse of such high enterprise, to stamp with an epic the pages of human history.

THE ONLOOKER'S RISK.

Literature demands an audience, and art a spectator, for, enviable as his subject would be, the last man left on earth will neither compose the epic of humanity nor adorn the vacant palace he has chosen with frescoes of our crumbling wrecks. No artist or poet could work without hope of rousing emotion like his own in some kindred soul, and the kindred soul of an ideal listener or spectator must have a peculiar quality of its own. Some have thought that if only all the world painted or wrote poetry, then art or letters would triumph in accomplishment. But, indeed, it is very doubtful. Artists are too much engrossed in their own work to judge of art, writers never read, and as for learning, it would be a precarious enlightenment for professors to take in each other's lectures. No one went to Thackeray for an appreciation of Dickens, Tolstoy and Tourgénieff could hardly sit in the same room without biting, and Carlyle compared a great poet's splendour to the sewage of Sodom.

For the complete reader and the ideal contemplator of the arts a certain negligence and detachment appear needful, an unprofessional freshness, something that perhaps Kant meant when he said that art must be "ohne Interesse"—without personal interest or desire. Quick to sympathise, ready for anything, clever, and untrammeled by "parti pris"—such is the man best fitted to enjoy the artist in form or word. To take an instance; we all know Mr. Lewis Hind's books, their happy appreciation, their open-hearted ease, their equal freedom from pedantry and from spite. Whether he is adventuring among pictures, or statues, or books, there we have the spirit of the real spectator, the genuine listener to words. Quite serious in the pursuit of beauty, but mercifully preserved from boredom, and never doctrinaire in consistency, he comes fresh and radiant to any style, provided it is good. A gallery full of him, a theatre full of him, a future abounding in his like—what a pleasing reward for any artist or other master of imaginative things!

It is a delightful gift, this appreciative power, and almost as necessary for art as the artist himself, being, as it were, the air he breathes. In his new book, "The Diary of a Looker-On" (Eveleigh Nash), Mr. Lewis Hind is as lavish of its charm as ever, and dispenses his Treasure of the Humble with fine generosity. He is full of understanding and of sympathy, he expands to any ray of power, and for the great masters—why, he takes them all to his heart. In catholicity and personal delight in genius, he reminds one of Cleon's lines:

> "I have not chanted verse like Homer, no—
> Nor swept string like Terpander, no—nor carved
> And painted men like Pheidias and his friend:
> I am not great as they are, point by point,
> But I have entered into sympathy
> With these four, running these into one soul,
> Who, separate, ignored each other's arts.
> Say, is it nothing that I know them all?"

There is the charm of the ideal spectator again, and we feel the pleasure of the open mind, just guided by a trained instinct for the best. The ideal spectator, as we have seen, is essential for art. Why is it, then, that the mention of Cleon, that faultless looker-on, suggests a danger as well as a charm?

Let us take another side of Mr. Lewis Hind's work, of which there are many excellent specimens in the present book. As he has often shown before, it pleases him to appear as a looker-on in life as well as in art. He likes to take some common scene, some incident that crosses his leisurely path—one of "life's little things," as he called it in the title of an earlier book—and to indicate its strangeness, to point out its queer contrasts, or to reveal the secret emotion hidden there. At a Maeterlinck play he shows us the average man pleased to win half-a-crown off his mate by a bet whether the dramatist is alive or dead. In a scene called "Faith" he shows us the overwhelming belief of a poor Cornish preacher contrasted with the eternity of the stars. In an admirable sketch called "Tramps," he shows us the simplicity of simple people contrasted with himself. In a motor rushing to London, he is haunted persistently by Bishop Creighton's words, "To me the one supreme object of life is, and always has been, to draw near to God."

It is all excellently done. The writer is the psychologist of the commonplace, seeking to reveal the soul that lies so close below the surface of every day, and his revelation nearly always "comes off." We are grateful to him, all the more when we remember Maeterlinck's saying about the many people whose one aim is to discourage the divine element in their soul. Our only protest is that life is not a picture-gallery, nor a book of verses under a hedge. It would be very comforting if it were. But as things stand, we cannot do with very many lookers-on in the battle. That the looker-on sees most of the game is a familiar fallacy, but the Irish add the needed sting when they say, "The best hurler is always in the ditch," or the English, when they say, "Old maids' children are the best"; and the Greek had a line, "Preachers go light whose foot is free from care." This charming air of detachment, this luxury of sympathetic emotion that stands aloof and looks at a thing, and feels how interesting it is, and says so, is very enviable, and we enjoy it now and then from the hand of a master of the passing mood. But it is insufficient when we are "dry with rage and extreme toil." It might become too much like that neat and trimly dressed lord who came, fresh as a bridegroom, upon Hotspur in the field and counselled parmaceti as the sovereignest thing in life for an inward bruise.

Take two passages that reveal the risk run by amateurs in life. After going down the Thames in a County Council steamer, the author writes:—

> "Yes; the voyage was worth twopence. I had been in touch with those who go down to the sea in ships. I had caught at the emotion that the poet felt," and the quotation follows.

Or again, having heard a girl sing something of Christina Rossetti's, and in the same room conversed with a sportsman and golfer, Mr. Hind concludes:—

> "To whom am I most in debt? She aroused my emotions, he my interest. She took her heart in her hand, he his gun. I, who do neither, encounter them, look on, and enjoy both."

That is the natural attitude of the looker-on, and we cannot complain when he assumes it. We admit its charm and its temptation. It is the attitude of thousands who lose themselves in aesthetic delight over religions they do not believe in. We can only say again that these second-hand and reflected emotions appear insufficient compared to the possessing passion of those whose heart and soul and bodily senses are involved upon some great issue in the conflict of existence. It was a harsh law in Athens that fined the man who belonged to neither party in the State, but one can discern its meaning. When the battle is joined, the dilettante should run away, and among the thunder of the captains and the shouting the best place for the "mugwump" is underground. We know the fate of those who had no hope of death—whom neither hell nor heaven would receive, because they stood neither for God nor for his enemies. And we suppose the fate of those who wish to stand about equally for both would be much the same.

When a thing has been well said, it is not done, and all is never over with the shouting. In the thick of battle we want soldiers so engrossed in victory that they feel no wounds, and lose the outworks of their being without a pang. A similar absorption, an asceticism that sheds many possibilities, seems essential for all greatness. We turn to the deaf musician, to the men who, like linnets, sang the better for their blindness, to the prophet whose book kept him thin for many years, to the impassioned jester who made his bed a sentry-post of freedom, or to the exiles and excommunicated of Russia. Such are the men whose words are half battles, because, if doomed to go, like the Happy Warrior, in company with pain, and fear, and bloodshed, they turn their necessity to glorious gain—like the Happy Warrior

> "Who, if he be called upon to face,
> Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined > Great issues, good or bad, for human kind,
> Is happy as a Lover; and attired
> With sudden brightness, like a Man inspired."

But we seem to have come a long way from the looker-on, and we do not wish to part distantly from a writer so perceptive, so urbane, and capable of giving and receiving so much pleasure. Let us conclude with a characteristic scene and saying from his own book. He describes how, riding in Wales, he came upon a preacher's cottage, lonely among hills and rain and miry roads.

"How does he stand the monotony?" he asked his companion. "The Bible is to him the Word of God," was the answer. "He lives to preach it. There is no monotony when all life is one great desire." There it is. Most onlookers in life are possessed by no one great desire to save them from monotony—a monotony of borrowed and detached sensations.

THE WILD BEE.

A LARGE share of the damage done by such an uncertain Spring as this falls on and through the wild bee. Our big banded humble bee came from her hibernaculum soon after the middle of March. On fine days we saw members of her species fanning the dead leaves in the wood as they searched likely crannies for nesting sites. The sallows were putting out silver "palm," and here and there an early tree was soon decked with the fully opened golden tassels. But from that day to this, hours propitious for humble bee and sallow at the same time have been extraordinarily few. Cold winds have forbidden flight to the bees, and milder winds have been so boisterous as to make settlement on the blooms a matter of difficulty and annoyance. A portion of Nature's machinery has been out of gear. The insect cog has failed to catch at the right place, and though the blossom wheel cannot be said to have whirred on, it has, nevertheless, moved ahead of the opportunities of the humble bee.

A cold snap in the midst of bright hours is a matter of comparative indifference to the hive bee who knows precisely where to go for a sure shelter. The humble bee in all probability burns her boats when she comes forth from her winter retreat. She will only regain that retreat by chance when searching for an extempore shelter. When the shower or the cold chill comes, she must find quickly what bivouac she can. The under side of a bough will do for a short shower, but if it turns to drizzle and is followed by a night of frost, the vigil may prove fatal. In her winter sleep she can withstand a wonderful amount of cold, but she cannot re-enter such a sleep on an empty stomach without making it the sleep of death. Yet somehow she manages. When the sun comes out again and the sallows are odorous in still air, there is the humble bee large and fit, loudly droning as she goes about her work. And on sunny banks, there she is looking for the hole already selected for a nest, but not yet so well known that she can go to it "in a bee line."

The bees probably come forth in successive squads as the early flowers do. The pioneer of mid-March is as likely to have been slain by the cold winds as the pioneer wallflower blossom to be cut off by an extra sharp frost. England is perhaps a few million humble bees worse off than might have been the case if they had been called when the first honey-harvest was ready, and had found the Spring faithful to her promise. A few million now mean a few score millions to the worse when the more important blossoms of early summer are to be fertilised, and autumn may lack an incalculable tonnage of seed and fruit because those two wheels of Nature missed a tooth or two in the latter half of March.

How many people have told us that the humble bee does not sting? Perhaps ten for every sting we received from them when in boyhood we used to harry their nests for the mere fun of it. Undoubtedly the worker humble bee of summer stings, the yellow-headed carder, the big ground bumble and the red-tailed one worst of all. But what of the queen bee of spring? There is a priori argument to show why she may be unarmed. The drone bee of the hive does not sting, and the bee books allow us to suppose that the queen is of the same disposition if not the same incapacity. We are told by some bee authorities, though not by all, that when two queens are fighting, and come to a pass when to sting would be doubly fatal, they lose hold and take a fresh grip. Another writer will cheerfully speak of the battle ending with a sting, and Maeterlinck makes her stab again and again at her rival, through the wax of the queen cell; but somehow there is a suspicion that imagination has helped out observation. On the other hand, we have seen it stated in cold and responsible print that the sting of the worker bee is a transformer ovipositor, a claim that amounts to saying that the bee that lays eggs cannot sting.

There is only one way of making certain, or, at any rate, of proving, the affirmative, namely, by getting stung. So we pluck up courage each year and catch these early queens in the hand, as they sip the sallow blooms or the flowering currant. But we have not the full hardiness of the investigator. We can catch them but we cannot hold them. A second or two seem like eternity, and there is scarcely time for the most active of queens to see for herself whether she can sting or not before the hand opens itself and allows her to fly out. It seems to us that it would be far easier to stare at the sun till we became blind, as Newton is said to have done, than to hold a bee in the hand till we got stung. Only one out of dozens of these tentative experiments has resulted in a sting. But that was not certainly a queen bee. On the one hand, the month was June and the bee was caught from an acre of rhododendron blossom; on the other hand, it was two thousand feet above sea level in North Derbyshire. On the whole, we believe that even up there the queens were beginning to stay at home, and that their half-daughters were working the rhododendrons.

The bees on the sallow are all of the banded or the red-tailed kind. Not far away is a patch of red dead-nettle on a piece of land that was used as a garden last year. Always the red dead-nettle seems to find out these spots of dug land. If we turned up a piece miles from a human habitation we should expect to find an abundant crop of dead-nettle following ours of peas or potatoes. And on the pink blossoms we should expect to find the same bees that are so busy on our patch by the sallow bush. At first sight they are the yellow-headed social bees. But their yellow is greyer and more silky, though rather more sparse, and these bees are not working. They are darting about from one blossom to another in an evident spirit of hedonism. They seem to be filling in the time while they are waiting for something to turn up. They are not honest bees at all, but cuckoos. They are waiting for honest black Anthophora with the yellow legs, whom they intend to make responsible for the upbringing of their offspring.

Black Anthophora is unlucky enough to have a yellow husband, and it seems to be a matter of difficulty for her to know when she is wooed by him and when pursued by one of these wretched cuckoos. We see her sometimes pursued in the neighbourhood of the dead-nettles by five or six yellowish insects, one of which may be a legitimate wooer, but the bulk of which are certainly adventurers, or worse. Again, we see her coming to the hole she has prepared as a nest in a brick wall, and close behind her comes a grey attendant. The first time you see this happen in bright sunshine, you think that there is a grey bee flying near the wall and its black shadow cast before it. We do not believe that Anthophora's husband would follow her to a place where he would be so keenly reminded of that hated subject—work. That grey shadow is no doubt the cuckoo, intent on getting her egg within the nest of the black host. Probably the cuckoo does not enter the hole in the other's absence as most other cuckoos do. She piles indignity on injury by dashing in and laying an instantaneous egg on the other's back, so that she herself carries that to the nest that shall make all her labour vain. For though sometimes there is food enough for both cuckoo and lawful grub, we suspect that more usually the latter is starved for the interloper's benefit. Certainly the cuckoos are this year as ten to one of the Anthophora.

These are but one or two of the bees of Spring. Several species of Andrena are beginning to come forth from their eleven months' rest under the lawn, and are digging galleries in it as their mothers did before them. Their cuckoos will be there also by the time they are carrying in the pollen on which Andrena grubs or cuckoo Nomada, as the fates determine, will feed. We are looking, too, for the re-appearance of the more notable Osmia, whose mud nest, plastered on the house-wall last summer, has defied all the weather of winter as well as the best cement mortar might do. Within, sleep the nymphs that are to form this year's generation of Osmia, or (if the cuckoo we saw hovering there last summer has been successful) this summer's generation of wasplike Epeolus. For the hive bee, industrious and clever as she is, has sprung from queer stock. Some cannot carry their industry beyond the point of providing for a grub or two that will not be born till the mother is dead; others can just carry on through the summer and leave scattered daughters somehow to survive the winter and the more terrible untimely spring; while, in a third set, industry has disappeared and cleverness has run to parasitism. "Go to the bee, thou sluggard" is no more sound advice than "Go to the ant," unless the species to be imitated is very particularly named.

Letters from Abroad.

PARTIES IN THE PRUSSIAN ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

THE successful enforcement of the two Bills that put the vitality of Prince Bülow's bloc policy on trial, viz., the law on associations and public assemblies, and the Stock Exchange law, suggests to a certain extent the result of the elections to the Prussian Diet now fixed for the month of June. It looks as if in the composition of this influential body no change of any importance was to be expected.

As a rule there is not much of a fight at the Prussian elections. The three-class system, combined with the public voting, takes the spirit of straightforward fighting away from the whole thing. It is a battle of intrigues, rather than of discussion. Even at the time of the greatest excitement, and when no Reichstag existed to divert the interest of the people, i.e., in the years of the struggle about the constitutional rights of the Diet, much less than half of the electorate went to the poll at all. The highest percentage of voting was recorded in 1862, when 34·3 per cent. of the voters took part in the election. From then the percentage fell to less than 20 during several decades, until in 1903, in a considerable number of divisions, the Socialists entered the field. But even their intervention could not raise the average of the country above a poll of 23·62 per cent. of those entitled to vote.

This low average, which makes the Prussian Diet the mere travesty of a House representing the nation, is in the first instance due to the abstention of those belonging to the third class of the electorate. It is they who in their great majority don't care to vote. And their disinclination is easily understood. They form five-sixths of the electorate, and their total voting power is only a third, against the two privileged classes. These two can, at the election of the members, always annihilate their vote. Why then risk prosecution or vexation by voting in public before a registrar who enters the vote in a list open to those in power? The whole system is calculated to disgust people with their vote.

There were at the last election (1903) in Prussia:—

Electors of the First Class	...	238,845, or	3·36 per cent. of the whole.
,, ,, Second Class	...	856,914, or	12·07 ,, ,,
,, ,, Third Class	...	6,006,204, or	84·57 ,, ,,
Total of the Electorate	...	7,101,963	100 per cent.

Even of the first-class voters not quite one half—viz., 49·24 per cent.—went to the poll. Of the second class the actual voters were 34·27 per cent., little more than a third, and of the third class only 21·18 per cent., little more than a fifth, cared to take part in the election. Much more could be said to prove the vileness of the system, but these facts alone will, I suppose, suffice.

The first-class electors and the second class electors are in most divisions in their great majority either Liberals or Conservatives. As long as these two political groups fight each other, the vote of the third class elector is of some importance, since it may change the balance in favour of the one of the two that otherwise would be beaten. But if they agree to share up the seats between them beforehand, the vote of the third class electors would, as far as the composition of the Diet is concerned, be practically worthless. They might as well have no votes at all.

Now this is precisely what is very likely to happen in a good many of the divisions this time. In some of them matters will be arranged from the outset between Liberals and Conservatives, in others there will be some competition, but no fighting worth the name. All of which is greatly facilitated by the fact that, with the exception of the provinces annexed in 1866, and a few newly-created divisions, the divisions elect either two or three members. Parties are almost compelled to compromise. In former years the Freisinnige at least entered the fight with a free hand, and took their choice between the other parties after the election of the Wahlmänner—or members of the electoral college. Thus a compromise between the Freisinnige and the Socialists was still theoretically possible. But this time the Freisinnige are almost in the same way allied to the Conservatives or the national Liberals. Here and there they will fight them in a very tame fashion, but they will always be ready to support them against the Socialists wherever a ballot between the two may become necessary.

This is the situation as already visibly outlined. The democratic stalwarts of the Freisinnige, courageous Dr. Barth and his friends, have done their very best to stir up a movement inside the party against the bloc policy, and at one moment it looked as if they would succeed. The way the Conservatives obstructed the Stock Exchange Bill made the blood of the tamest of the Stock Exchange gentry boil, and the latter are of great influence in the councils of the Freisinnige. But then a compromise was brought about by the aid of some National Liberals who had conferred with Bülow. The Conservatives agreed to give the Stock Exchange freedom if the Freisinnige would sacrifice the Corn Exchange, and this settled the fate of Herr Barth's agitation. He still holds large meetings, but with this electoral system meetings don't settle things. It is the party machinery that decides, and this latter is in the hands of his strongest opponents.

Nor can it be denied that the passing of the two above-named Bills has justified their policy in the eyes of many people formerly in doubt about it. Both Bills contain very objectionable things. The language prescriptions in the Association Bill are as infamous as they are stupid, and the sacrifice of the Corn Exchange in order to save the Stock Exchange can—if we accept the view of the Bible—almost be compared to the sacrifice of Jesus in order to set Barabbas free. A free Corn Exchange is under present circumstances surely of much greater interest for the people at large than a free Stock Exchange. But the restrictions under which the Stock Exchange smarted were in their way also harmful to the nation, for they contributed much to keep the rate of interest high, and if the Reichstag had rejected the Association Law because of the languages clause, Prussia—the Freisinnige say in defence of their conduct—would have been free to enact much more severe restrictions in that respect, and would have done it, as everybody must know who knows the mind of the Prussian Government in regard to the Poles. As it is, the Association Law has at least the advantage of taking the decisions about associations and public meetings away from the States, the greatest of which are tied with a restricted suffrage, and of putting them under the control of the Empire, whose Parliament—the Reichstag—is elected on a democratic franchise.

To give the devil his due, and to paint things not blacker than they are, I have to admit that there is something to be said for these excuses. Re-action in our days likes to proceed on the sly, adorned with some nice-looking patches of progressive reform which make people afraid of assaulting it lest the attack might damage the seductive attire. There are, indeed, a few good points in the new association law. It gives women full freedom in regard to political movements, it facilitates meetings in the open air, which is of importance for the workers in the smaller places where they very rarely can find decent halls for their demonstrating assemblies, and it does away with several tiresome and sometimes hampering prescriptions of the old Prussian law. On the other hand, the Poles retain their full rights in regard to political associations and to public meetings at election times. Even in ordinary times overflow meetings in fenced yards or gardens will, according to the new law, be freed from the general restrictions concerning meetings in the open air. To be short, progressive and reactionary provisions are so interwoven in the measure that the average non-political man finds himself nonplussed as to its real character. Apart from the Poles, very few people feel strongly about it.

This is the great difficulty of our democratic Radicals who try to educate the broader-minded middle-classes to resolute resistance against the combined rule of bureaucrats, agrarians, and protectionist manufacturers. There is no deep and passionate feeling amongst these classes. Even if a speaker with such gifts of eloquence as Herr Barth succeeds in making them understand the dangers of the present policy of small alms and no thorough reform, the political small traders come afterwards and tell them so much of profits and losses that they lose heart again and prefer the safe policy of compromise before the battle.

This is the moral of the opening of the election movement. The democratic Radicals have adherents all over the country, but they are mostly but small groups of idealogues who are shunted aside by those who hold the strings of the Freisinnige, and who have succeeded in winning over some otherwise gifted and honest men for their policy of barter. In fact, the Freisinnige are to-day only a section of the National Liberals, and some papers already talk jubilantly about a revival of the fruitful days when National Liberalism as a big party carried the most important legislative measures in Parliament. They forget that at the time in question —the 'seventies of the nineteenth century—the National Liberals and the Progressists together had a clear majority in both Parliaments, whilst now they number in the Reichstag less, and in the Prussian Diet very little more, than a fourth of the members. In the Prussian Diet the two sections of the Conservative Party hold almost half the seats, and with their present policy the Liberals will at best wrest a dozen or two from them, who are their good neighbours in the Bülow bloc. To destroy the power of the Conservatives would, as shown above, require an alliance of the Liberals and Socialists, and of such an abomination both sections of official Liberalism will not hear. Nor is the idea popular with the Socialistic masses.

The Socialists have, however, entered the field and mean to fight with more vigour than ever. Except a few divisions, where in consequence of the social structure of the population, wage-earners and their adherents belong in large numbers to the second-class electorate, the three-class system precludes them from winning seats. But this will in no way diminish their fighting spirit. They conceive the battle, in the first instance, as a fight for the removal of the three-class system and the other iniquities of the present franchise law. They will make the electoral fight an impressive demonstration for universal suffrage, and it looks as if in this they will have a good many of those workers at their side who, until now, have been the patient armour-bearers of the different middle-class parties.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Berlin, April 13th.

Contemporaries.

OSMAN DIGNA.

TEN years have passed since Mahdism came to its end. Its death was greater than its life. Who has forgotten even now the story of its euthanasia? Defeated, abandoned, and pursued, the Khalifa, with his Emirs round him, turned to confront their hunters, knelt on their praying-mats in the desert, and waited, praising the greatness of God, their faces to Mecca and the enemy, while the bullets mowed them down.

I saw the scene rehearsed the other day by one who had survived the act of faith. An old man now, with white beard sharply outlined against an almost ebony skin, his fine features and lithe, tall form told of his Arab descent. The fragment of an arm hung at his side, to remind him of that tremendous moment. He told his tale with the smile of a child, and the brevity of a soldier. "There were the English, and here were we, with the Khalifa in our midst. We got down from our camels. He gave the word and led our prayers"—and here the old man fell on his knees and prostrated himself before Allah, and the shower of lead which his old ears still heard around him. "They were all killed, and I was wounded."

"And why," I asked, "did you do it?"

"It was the hour of prayer."

The answer, I think, was finer than the deed. It robbed it of the colour of the theatre in which history has painted it. Those Arab chieftains were not posing before heaven and the enemy. They had no thought of making a superb end. The hour of prayer had come, and they knelt as habit and ritual prescribed. They had knelt before in rain-storms and dust-storms. They knelt as simply amid the infidel bullets.

It was in a prison that I heard the tale. A sentry stood at the door with fixed bayonet, and the gaoler listened at my side with a tolerant smile. The British public consigned the Khalifa and his Emirs to the temple of fame. The Egyptian War Office buried the survivors in the prison of Damietta. Gaunt and forbidding, it stands beside a hospital and a court-house in a bleak enclosure beside the Nile. There is in all Egypt no damper or colder place than this decaying sea-port among the swamps. One prisoner had died—"of the damp," his brother said. Another, who used to sit all day beside a brazier, has been transferred to a prison in the South. Seven remain, counting the years of their exile, and hoping faintly for release.

One by one I visited their rooms. Each room housed a family which boasts its princely rank. The stone floor was neatly sanded, the bare walls irreproachably whitewashed. Each room had its little truckle beds, and its platform on which the prisoner's wife sat cross-legged with her babies round her. Every morning the children of captivity sally out to the freedom of school, and their parents watch behind the bayonet of the sentinel for their return. A paternal Government is teaching scientific agriculture to the boys, and some have already received posts in the Soudan. The parents count the uneventful years. The routine of the prison is rarely broken. Sometimes, they told me, they are allowed to sun themselves in the doorway. From three in the afternoon till sundown they may walk in the courtyard. Occasionally, at Bairam, a relative is allowed by special permission of the War Office to visit their prison. They do not smoke; they play no games, rigid Puritans that they are. Reading is not for them in the category of pleasures. I asked if they had any pastimes. They answered gravely and without affectation, "We say our prayers."

Who are they, these untried prisoners, who are expiating an indefinite sentence, soldiers to whom no parole has been offered? Six belong to the Baggara tribe; two are cousins of the Khalifa; one is the son of his designated successor. Two are now old men, beyond the age when men dream of raids and revolts. Four were mere lads when the prison doors closed upon them. They have ripened and married and bred children in captivity. One of the four was a boy of twelve when first he was captured; the other three ranged from fifteen to twenty. They are prisoners, not for any part which they can have played in the bloody past, but simply because they reckon their descent from the Mahdi's Emirs. The memory of the angry past is already faint in their minds, and no spiritual exaltation sustains them. They stood together in the corridor as I took leave of them, a file of broken and submissive men. In a sort of chorus they solemnly renounced all faith in the Mahdi. Latterly, indeed, they told me, even in the days of the Khalifa, they had ceased to believe that he was a Prophet. They had followed the Khalifa simply as kinsmen and loyal clansmen. For the rest, as they put it, "Has not the Soudan become even as Egypt, and is not the English Government our father?" Recollecting a certain answer to a question in the House of Commons, I inquired if they did not dread the vengeance of their private enemies, for that,

I believe, is now the pretext for their imprisonment. No, they answered; their relatives in the Soudan are safe; why should they fear?

There was yet a seventh prisoner, the most famous of them all—Osman Digna. We paused at his door, and the gaoler, peering cautiously through the peep-hole, bade us wait, for the old man was at prayer. He rose at length—a tall, gaunt figure, stately in his white robe and simple turban. Courteous, yet taciturn, he answered my questions curtly and with indifferent negatives. He was well and vigorous. He complained of nothing. He asked for nothing, not even liberty. I began to despair of gaining his confidence. Neither wife nor child shared his captivity. A single book, carefully folded in a threadbare linen cover, gave the only clue to his occupations. "He eats," whispered the gaoler, "only once a day, and does not mix with the other prisoners." He was talking now more rapidly to my interpreter, and his hoarse, guttural voice betrayed a note of excitement. A series of unintelligible questions reached me, one after the other. "What Government was it which held him prisoner?" "What is the place you call a prison?" "He has something to say," whispered the interpreter; "let him talk."

"In the years before the Mahdi arose," the hoarse, eager voice was saying, "the world walked in ignorance and darkness. It had forgotten God, and nowhere was the Law obeyed. The Book was forgotten, and even the Sultan ruled by man-made laws. Are not the Laws by which men should walk set forth in the Koran? Yet the Sultan had made laws of his own invention for the government of the earth. Then God spoke to the Mahdi, and he arose, the Prophet whose coming is foretold in the Book. The Mahdi summoned the Sultan to obedience, saying, 'Arise, and repent, and rule by the Law of the Book.' If the Sultan had obeyed, the Mahdi would have retired, and spent the rest of his life in prayer. But the Sultan would not hear, neither would the Egyptians transmit the message.

"Now, when God saw the disobedience of the Sultan, and that he ruled by man-made laws, and would not hearken to the voice of the Mahdi, His Prophet, he sent a scourge to punish the Turks and the Egyptians. That scourge was the English. They have taken Egypt. It is the Lord's judgment on Sultan Abdul Hamid."

Here the old man paused. Rising to his full height, he spoke again, his voice clear and authoritative at last. "Know, too," he went on, "that I also am a Prophet, the interpreter of God, even as you are the interpreter of this Englishman." He clutched his throat. "The voice is mine, but the words I speak are the words which God has given me. To me, Osman Digna, is given a message. I am a Prophet, even as Mohamet was a Prophet. My commission from God came to me from the hands of the Mahdi. I went to him at Kordofan, where he was with the Khalifa, when I heard that the English were coming from India, and the Mahdi made me his equal. He gave me a letter, and sealed it with his seal, and in the letter was written, 'Let him who obeys us, obey you, and let him who honours us, honour you also.' Thus he did that the prophecy might be fulfilled, and the Book obeyed. For it is written, 'We sent unto them two apostles, but they charged them with imposture. Wherefore we strengthened them with a third.' (Koran, Sura 36.) I am that third.

"Then it was that the Mahdi gave me this Book" (he snatched the old linen-covered Koran from his bed), "and bade me keep it, and rule by it, and restore its Law to the earth.

"I am a prisoner. But I hold the Book. To whom shall I transmit the Book which is the very Law of God?" (He held it in his sinuous brown fingers, as Moses might have held the tablets when he came down from Sinai—a man of the same race, living in the same communion with God, untroubled by the march of the centuries and the decay of faith.) "To whom shall I transmit it? To the Sultan? To the Khedive? To the King of the English? Nay, but God has taken care of His Book. Am I not the prisoner of the English? Is not the Book in their care and charge?

"Hear, then, my message. God has chosen out the English, for he saw that they are the strongest. He has ordered the world to walk after the ordinances of His Book. He has placed His Book and His Prophet in the keeping of the English. The Lord has ordered the English to spread Islam, and to destroy its foes. The English are now the prophets of Islam. Hear the voice of God. It is written in the Book, 'The Lord chose out Adam and Abraham.' I say unto you, 'The Lord has chosen the English.' Are they not the first in war? Have they not captured the Book and imprisoned its Prophet? Let the Egyptians be humble before them"—he glowered at his gaoler—"they are Moslems only by the permission of the English. So is my mission ended. I have waited for this day. I have transmitted my message by your hand to the English people. I am happy, for my message is spoken."

The old man was silent at last. The centuries had rolled backwards in his white-washed cell. I had seen Sinai and Mecca, and talked with a patriarch who was young with Moses, and contemporary with Mahomet. He had wrestled with facts and destiny, and woven from it a philosophy of history, as naïve and as cogent as Daniel's. "In the beginning was the word." "In the beginning was the fact." Osman Digna is of Faust's opinion. The English are his fact. He has found a place for us in his scheme of things.

We came rapidly down from Sinai. The gaoler was looking impatiently at his watch. The six dervishes were waiting anxiously at the door. They assured me that they regarded the pretensions of the Prophet with abhorrence. They believed, indeed, that he was mad. For two years he had been imprisoned in solitude. Then they were allowed to see him; but for twenty months he lay on his bed and spoke to no one. Then he began to talk of his message; the Government must not blame them.

Nine years of prison have done their work. The little men have grown servile. The great man is mad.

"I fought against him in the Soudan," said the gaoler, as we left the prison. "He was a wonderful soldier—just like De Wet. Is De Wet also in prison?"

"No, Captain, De Wet is not in prison. De Wet is a Minister of the Crown."

H. N. Brailsford.

Poetry.

THE GYPSIES' ROAD.

I shall go on the gypsies' road,
The road that has no ending;
For the sedge is brown on the lone lake side,
The wild geese eastward tending.

I shall go as the unfettered wave,
From shore to shore, forgetting
The grief that lies 'neath a roof-tree's shade,
The years that bring regretting.

No law shall dare my wandering stay,
No man my acres measure;
The world was made for the gypsies' feet,
The winding road for pleasure.

And I shall drift as the pale leaf strayed,
Whither the wild wind listed.
I shall sleep in the dark of the hedge,
'Neath rose and thorn entwisted.

This was a call in the heart of the night,
A whispering dream's dear treasure.
"The world was made for the Nomads' feet,
The winding road for pleasure."

I stole at dawn from my roof-tree's shade,
And the cares that it did cover;
I flew to the heart of the fierce north wind,
As a maid will greet her lover.

But a thousand hands did draw me back
And bid me to their tending;
I may not go on the gypsies' road—
The road that has no ending.

Dora Sigerson Shorter.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

READERS of THE NATION will be pleased to hear that a collection of the prose sketches contributed by Mr. John Galsworthy to our columns, together with some additional pieces, is to be published next month by Mr. Grant Richards. The title will be "A Commentary." Mr. Galsworthy describes his book as an effort to point out social evils, and the forces that make against their betterment.

* * *

MR. JOHN MURRAY'S new list is particularly strong in biography. Besides the memoirs of Colonel Saunderson and of the fifth Duke of Newcastle, already announced in these columns, we are to have "The Life of Sir William Russell," by Mr. J. B. Atkins, "The Military Memoirs of Lieutenant-General Sir Joseph Thackwell," by Colonel H. C. Wylly, and a life of Baldassare Castiglione, by Mrs. Ady (Julia Cartwright). Sir William Russell was, of course, the pioneer and most distinguished of war correspondents. He followed every campaign of importance from the Danish War in 1850 to the Egyptian campaign of 1882. His diaries and private correspondence, which have been placed at Mr. Atkins' disposal, should be full of interest, for Russell was a writer of great power of description and lively humour. His services to truth and humanity in the Crimean War need no panegyric; they represent one of the great feats of independent journalism.

* * *

SIR JOSEPH THACKWELL was a cavalry officer, who saw a great deal of active service both on the Continent and in India, and as he kept a diary from the time when he entered the service until his death, the account of his life by Colonel Wylly should be of considerable historical value. Thackwell was in the 15th Hussars during the Corunna campaign, at Vittoria, and at Waterloo. He was selected for the command of the cavalry division during the Afghan War, the Gwalior campaign, and both the wars against the Sikhs, and was also second in command to Lord Gough in the army of the Punjab.

* * *

IN Count Baldassare Castiglione, Mrs. Ady has an excellent subject. Apart from his famous work, "The Courtier," which is an Italian classic, and one of the most characteristic prose works of the Italian Renaissance, Castiglione's career was one of peculiar interest. Attaching himself early in life to the brilliant Court of Urbino, he was sent by the Duke as ambassador to Henry VIII., who made him a Knight of the Garter. He was afterwards ambassador at the Vatican in the days of Leo X., and was sent as nuncio to Charles V., showing great talent and dexterity. After the sack of Rome by the Constable Bourbon in 1527, he took refuge in Spain, where he lived until his death. His letters—many of which in the Vatican library are to be published for the first time in the coming biography—throw a flood of light on the tangled diplomatic relations of the age. It is, however, to "The Courtier" that he owes his fame. An English version, by Sir Thomas Hoby, appeared in 1561. It was received with universal applause, and exercised a marked influence on the English writers of the later sixteenth century, including Sir Philip Sidney.

* * *

IT would be hard to say whether more books upon Napoleon or upon the Stuarts have made their appearance during the last few seasons. Both subjects are engaging enough, and as fresh material upon both is continually coming to light, it is not surprising that they have been so much written about. The latest announcement of interest connected with the Stuarts is that Miss Alice Shield is engaged upon a book dealing with the life and times of Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York, the Jacobite Henry IX., and one of the best representatives of his unlucky house. It will be remembered that Miss Shield is joint author with Mr. Andrew Lang of "The King Over the Water," a fresh and scholarly contribution to Jacobite history. The volume will be issued by Messrs. Longmans.

* * *

A MORE than ordinarily interesting colour-book, "The Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew," is promised by Messrs. Cassell for the early autumn. Mr. W. J. Bean, the assistant curator of the Gardens, who is responsible for the letterpress, has divided his work into five parts, dealing respectively with the historical, the landscape, and the scientific aspects of the subject, and with the indoor and outdoor collections of plants. He has had the assistance of several well-known contributors, including Sir William Thiselton-Dyer, who has written an introduction. Forty of the illustrations are half-tone plates from photographs by Mr. J. E. Wallis, and the remaining twenty are reproductions in colour from paintings by Mr. H. A. Olivier. The originals by Mr. Olivier are now on view at the Grafton Galleries, where they form part of the artist's large exhibition of Portraits of Indian Princes, and other subjects; and the proof plates which we have seen reproduce with wonderful fidelity these vivacious and sympathetic renderings of Kew's floral landscape.

* * *

A BOOK of travel which promises to be of great freshness and interest, which Messrs. Kegan Paul have in preparation, is "The People of the Polar North," by Knud Rasmussen. The book is practically the only contribution which European literature has so far received on the character, customs, legends, and religious beliefs of the Polar Eskimos. The author, Knud Rasmussen, had an Eskimo mother, and grew up in Greenland, so that when he went to Cape York, the most northerly inhabited point in the world, to study the mode of life and beliefs of the people, he had the great advantage of a thorough knowledge of the language. For folk-lorists and students of comparative religion the book should prove of immense value, as it contains a store of tales and legends related to him by the East Greenlanders, a race now almost extinct, as well as the jealously guarded formulae of their magic.

* * *

MR. LAURENCE BINYON'S lectures on the art of China and Japan are to be published by Mr. Edward Arnold, under the title "Pictorial Art in the Far East." Much fresh knowledge of Far Eastern art has been made accessible of late years, and Mr. Binyon claims that Chinese painting—hitherto practically unknown in Europe—is a subject worthy of close study. He also treats of the older schools of Japan, and of the interesting though subsidiary schools of art in India, Persia, and Tibet. His aim has been to treat Eastern art not merely from the technical historical side, but as a theme of living interest with its background of Oriental thought and civilisation.

* * *

MR. CHARLES RICKETTS, whose work both as painter and sculptor is a feature of the International Exhibition now being held, is writing a book in which he will express his views upon the principles of contemporary art. Many readers will remember that the beautiful stage scenery used in the recent productions of Mr. Laurence Binyon's "Attila" and Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Don Juan in Hell" was due to Mr. Ricketts.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"John Thadeus Delane: His Life and Correspondence." By Arthur Irwin Dasent. (Murray. 2 vols. 32s. net.)

"The New Order." Edited by Lord Malmesbury. (Griffiths. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Pleasant Land of France." By Rowland E. Prothero. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Marie de Médicis and the Court of France in the Seventeenth Century." By Louis Batiffol. Translated by M. King and H. W. C. Davis. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

"From Pekin to Sikkim, through the Ordos, the Gobi Desert, and Tibet." By Count De Lesdain. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"H. M. I.: Some Passages in the Life of an Inspector of Schools." By E. M. Sneyd-Kynnersley. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

"Indian Problems." By S. M. Mitra. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

"French Novelists of To-Day." By Winifred Stephens. (Lane. 5s. net.)

"The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp." By W. H. Davies. With a Preface by Bernard Shaw. (Fifield. 6s.)

"Crossriggs." By Mary and Jane Findlater. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

"Jean Racine." Par Jules Lemaître. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3fr. 50.)

"Voyage en Portugal." Par G. de Beauregard et L. de Fouchier. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

"Les Deux Aspects de l'Immanence et le Problème religieux." Par l'Abbé Thamiry. (Paris: Blond. 4fr.)

"Les Scruples de Sganarelle." Roman. Par Henri de Régnier. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.)

Letters to the Editor.

THE PRACTICAL RECONSTRUCTON OF COUNTRY LIFE.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—I venture to ask permission to call attention to the importance of making an immediate stand in reinstating the people on the land through the operation of the Small Holdings Act, and thus giving our country people clearer hope for the future, and preventing a relapse to Protection, with its concurrent strengthening of the rule of the landlords.

In this connection it is important to realise that the difficulties of administration and the other defects in the Act have given rise to a strong undercurrent of disappointment. I do not criticise these defects, they may be unavoidable; but in practice they are irritating. A workingman who wants a small plot close to his cottage, where there may be land suitable and easily obtainable, is not favourably impressed when it is explained to him that the Act does not operate directly. He must, he is told, wait until the County Council or Commissioners have prepared a draft scheme for submission to the Board of Agriculture, under which at some later date he may obtain a distant plot without a cottage, in conjunction with others. And a young villager who wants a cottage and acre of land to settle down in married life is dissatisfied when he is told that the Parish or County Council have the power to build him a cottage if he can persuade them to do it. He, probably, decides to accept the alternative solution of emigration. Both men believe in their hearts that they have a clear right to the land, and feel that something is wrong. Such cases must be numerous. Nevertheless, a number of villagers (small in proportion to our population and the greatness of the issue) will persist, and in time obtain the land. But long before this time comes the feeling of dissatisfaction with the Government and the authorities will have obtained a permanent hold on the minds of the people.

Now if we are to combat this wave of thought, we must take much more active steps in some direction that will strike the popular imagination and fill it with new thoughts.

I offer two suggestions. Our progressive leaders might do far more to encourage village associations on a democratic basis. Such organisations are needed not only to bring our present laws into action, but to act as a driving force to bring about the general revival of country life. They would help to deal with the land question in all its aspects, the cottage difficulty, the organisafion of co-operation and credit banking, to advance popular representation on the Parish and other Councils, to promote more social life, and even to bring back some workers from the towns, and to aid the re-introduction of workshops into the villages. The people must find their own solutions, and some such organisations are needed everywhere. In this district a start has been made by the formation of about a dozen "Land Clubs," working on these lines. They have between three and four hundred members, and are federated into a union engaged in promoting the acquisition of land, and the general revival of country life in its various aspects. The organisation is democratic, seems suited to its requirements, and has every appearance of permanency. Doubtless similar associations are growing up elsewhere.

We had hoped that this movement might have received immediate direct support from the Board of Agriculture, exercising its powers under sec. 39, s.s. 4, of the Act. Such recognition would have done something to create the confidence between the people and the power of the State—so urgently needed if there is to be effective joint action. But this support is not, as yet, forthcoming.

Meanwhile, I suggest that this organisation might serve as a model for a larger movement, spreading through the country. The amalgamated land clubs would act as a voice for our country people, and bring their difficulties clearly before the nation and Parliament.

The second suggestion I submit is this: The Board of Agriculture should take immediate advantage of sec. 16 of the Act to establish at once, in conjunction with the Land Clubs, small holdings with houses attached. They should be organised, as far as possible, on a co-operative basis and supported by credit banks; their working should be aided by experiment plots, and practical advice given by agricultural specialists. Experimental work on this line is, I feel sure, an absolute necessity. Could it not be started forthwith? It would strike the popular imagination, and convince our country people that a new era is really beginning. These people would see that the Government recognises their right to the land, and was prepared to give an immediate definite start to the new reconstruction that we all know to be needed. This policy should have been started on fifty years ago; let there be no further delay.—Yours, &c.,

MONTAGUE FORDHAM, M.A. (Cantab).

Limpsfield, Surrey,
April 13th, 1908.

"FISCAL FALLACIES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—By the "old level" I meant the general level of prices in the trade before foreign cars are taxed. "J. A. H." asks "Why are we entitled to expect that fresh capital will enable British cars to reach this level?"

If motor-cars can be better and more cheaply made in France than in England, we should have few, if any, English cars. But, as a matter of fact, the home market is fairly evenly shared between the British and foreign makers. It is difficult to suppose that there are now and always must be, say, fifty good French and fifty good English cars, and that the rest of the English cars are and always must be inferior. But it is very likely that, as the French maker originally got a start in the English market and produced a good article, the English investor was shy of risking capital in competition with established foreign firms. I believe that in the main English capital has hitherto been devoted to supplying a demand for low-priced touring cars, which the French makers did not cater for. I do not take it that French cars are necessarily "better or cheaper than the English cars which failed to get made and sold," because I see no matured monopoly which would cause "this advantage of the French over the English economy of production," and because the reasons given above seem to me a sufficient explanation of the French cars being sold in England.

If this is so, one would expect that the withdrawal of the French cars from the English market would create a demand, which would continue to bring fresh capital into the motor trade until the remuneration of that capital fell to the average rate of remuneration in similar industries. That there was a time when there was "no lack of capital . . . but unemployed plant was standing in the English motor trade," does not seem to me to invalidate this, because that plant may have been, and probably was, unsuitable for turning out such cars as the French were supplying, and because it is not necessary to my argument to assume that the total of French and English capital is insufficient.—Yours, &c.,

R. C. PHILLIMORE.

Battler's Green, Watford, Herts,
April 13th, 1908.

KANGAROO ISLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As you interest your readers in nature subjects, you may care to hear of the measures taken in South Australia to stay the rapid extinction of wild creatures by what is called "the march of civilisation." All the intelligent inhabitants of this huge but sparsely populated State (not the ornithologists and botanists only) are demanding the formation of a national reserve, under the control of trustees, for the fauna and flora peculiar to the Australian continent; and the general verdict seems to favour Kangaroo Island, for reasons which appear in the scheme that has already been put forward in the Adelaide Press. A writer in the "Adelaide Observer" describes the flora of the island as unusually interesting, many species of plants being quite distinct from those on the mainland. "The vast geological interval that must have elapsed since separation from the continent makes it probable that Kangaroo Island may still prove the habitat of many primitive types of vegetation which should be carefully safeguarded." In illustration of this the writer ventures to predict that the narrow-leafed gum, which is indigenous to Kangaroo Island, "may prove to be a primitive form from which other species of eucalyptus have been gradually evolved."

It is proposed that the reserve should occupy an area comprising about 313 square miles situated at the western end of Kangaroo Island. This island, at its eastern extremity, is only a few miles from the mainland, but in spite of a beautiful climate, the aridity of the soil makes it unsuitable for profitable husbandry.

Kangaroo Island is, of course, as its name implies, the home of the marsupial, and possesses indeed a species of kangaroo whose skin is very valuable; a rare specimen of the wallaby is also found there. Australasia is curiously free from the larger carnivorous animals which prey upon man, his flocks and his herds. The dingo, or wild dog, is almost the only destructive animal indigenous to the Australian continent, but luckily he never seems to have been deposited in Kangaroo Island, and we may be sure that he and his kind will be rigorously excluded from the reserve. But Kangaroo Island deserves even more celebrity as the home of birds than of marsupials. It will be an ideal centre of bird life; nothing is wanting. It is not only covered with bushes and trees, but contains fresh-water lagoons, admirably adapted for the breeding and preservation of all the varieties of Australian waterfowl. Gullies thickly planted with tall sugar gum trees run northward to the coast, and in their moist and shady depths a congenial home is to be found for the gorgeous lyre-bird and his dowdy wife, to whom, however, her gallant mate habitually pays assiduous attention, furling and unfurling his beautifully marked tail (which is above three feet long) for her amusement and gratification, with a musical accompaniment. As a mocker and an imitator the lyre-birds are ahead of all competitors. They can imitate every sound they chance to hear, and amusing stories are told of the perplexity of "new chums," who perhaps hear (as they work in the forest) an invisible companion chopping wood and whistling, until at length the mystery is solved by a glimpse of the mischievous lyre-bird in a neighbouring thicket. These curious fowls build their nest upon the ground, and the female only lays one egg in the year.

The island is lucky, too, in still possessing some birds that are now extinct upon the mainland—such as "Leach's cockatoo," a black beauty with scarlet tail feathers. This bird feeds upon the cones of the shea oak, a tree that is plentiful in the island. Unfortunately, the casoar, or Kangaroo Island emu, has total disappeared. It was discovered by François Peron, naturalist to Commander Baudin's expedition, in 1800; but other ornithological rarities exist in the proposed reserve, which are not found in the Adelaide hills or on Yorke's Peninsula. To those who urge that an area of over 300 square miles is too large, it must be pointed out that a scheme of this kind, with all its future potentialities, can only be carried out on an extensive scale. Moreover, it is only a quarter of the whole island, which has at present very few inhabitants. The Government of Australia will, it is thought, have little difficulty in coming to a satisfactory arrangement with the three or four leaseholders, whose tenure will be disturbed if the reserve is formed. America has half a dozen or more of these wildernesses for her bird and plant life, and even New Zealand, as we have seen, has set apart various islands and a few large parks for the same purpose. Fiord Park in New Zealand has now become a favourite resort for tourists and travellers from all over the world—a fact that may reassure any commercially-minded Colonial who regards the idea of the suggested reserve with feelings of misgiving, if not of hostility.

Kangaroo Island has had an uneventful, not to say inglorious, existence, since it was explored in 1800 by Baudin, commander of a small French expedition, which went on a journey of geographical discovery in the Southern Seas more than a century ago. If the island should be the fortunate area chosen for the ornithology, zoology, and botany of Australia, it will at length emerge from obscurity, and may even attract the attention of Thomas Cook & Son.—Yours, &c.,

A Man of the Woods.

April 11th, 1908.

THE JUSTICE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A note in a recent issue has attracted my attention.

It refers to what you call the "neat exposure" of the brewers' arguments against the Licensing Bill by Mr. J. K. Jerome, which is to the effect that if this Bill will, as stated by the brewers, not diminish drinking, why should they object to it? The explanation is so obvious that I can only conclude that neither Mr. Jerome nor you can have read a word upon the other side. The Bill will certainly not diminish drinking, but it will change the channels of distribution. The brewer would probably brew the same quantity as before, but he would have to pay heavily towards the compensation fund, and eventually for the licenses which he is permitted to continue. The effect of the Bill would be that he would lose the profit on his retail trade, and the enormous capital which has been sunk in licensed houses would be, to all intents and purposes, confiscated.

Let the State be honest, and pay value for what it seizes.

I trust that in justice to the facts you will publish this letter.—Yours, &c.,

J. W. F. Gillies, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.

25, Vineyard Hill Road, Wimbledon Park, S.W.,
March 30th, 1908.

THE PROBLEM OF MEDICAL RELIEF.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A very important proposal has been considered and approved of by the London County Council. There can be no doubt as to the advisability of making the poor-law part of the borough administration, just as education is, in subordination to the Council as the central and co-ordinating authority. In matters concerning the public health there is at present divided management. The medical officer of health and his department see to many matters, including infectious diseases, although vaccination is attended to by the Guardians. The school children are medically inspected by the Council, and the sick poor are taken care of by the Guardians—in the infirmary, at the dispensary, or at their homes, by the parish doctor. I should have said, some of the sick poor. Note that, as to all these, payment is made for services rendered.

When this unification of authorities is completed, place must be found for the large numbers of hospital out-patients. Of these about half may be regarded as properly subjects for the parish doctor. One-tenth probably can pay an ordinary fee to their doctor. What shall be done with the other two-fifths, numbering in the Metropolis many thousands?

Now at present there is no discrimination as to means, save in a few of the best-managed hospitals, such as Great Ormond Street. Inasmuch as the working man or woman is used to small systematic payments (such as weekly rent, &c.), a scheme of small weekly or monthly payments will probably have to be enforced, i.e., the system of provident dispensaries. One most essential point should not be omitted, namely, the payment for professional services. While the pauper pays, through the rates, for the medical or surgical skill by which he benefits, the comparatively well-to-do artisan pays nothing whatever, nor do the charitable subscribers to hospitals. It is surely evident that this is a great abuse of charity.

At the present time there are hospitals being built or enlarged in the metropolitan area. In every one of these, King's College, Hampstead, London, Bartholomew's, with the possible exception of the proposed general hospital at Putney, if I mistake not, the hospital management continue and insist upon re-establishing the same old bad method of indiscriminate medical relief—a degrading almsgiving. Why not give each man a glass of beer in the out-patients' waiting-room, and so encourage a distressful industry?

It may be asked, if the poor-law and the provident dispensary deal with all those suitable cases, what will be done with the hospital out-patients? My answer is: obviously there will be none, excepting a possible or probable 5 to 8 per cent., sent up by the local practitioner for further advice or for special operation.

The ultimate solution will rest with the charitable contributor, who cannot pay at the same time for the parish doctor and for the hospital's out-patients. In view of the approaching Conference on hospitals, I trust this subject may find a place in your columns.—Yours, &c.,

G. C. C.

March 28th, 1908.

HAMBURG.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The free port of Hamburg must not be confounded with the town of Hamburg. The town of Hamburg is within the Zollverein, the free port is not. The free port has an area of 2,537 acres, and, although it is a portion of a larger port area, with very few exceptions, all vessels arriving at Hamburg from sea are unloaded within it. D. M. Stevenson and yourself seem to agree in thinking that the free port of Hamburg is merely a free bonding area. It is much more than that: it is a real free trade port. Not only may goods be landed in it under bond and re-exported without paying duty, but industries are carried on in it, and goods may there "be completely altered by any process, or may be produced." (See White Paper 344 of 1904, entitled "Continental Free Ports.")—Yours, &c.,

G. E. HARRISON.

Darlington Villa, Stroud.

WOMEN SUFFRAGISTS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The action of the Suffragettes at Peckham is a signal example of essential tragedy as a war of good against good.

The indignant correspondents in your issue of the 4th inst. doubtless represent the resentment of many sincere minds against the Women's Social and Political Union, which fights a Government committed to the passing of the Licensing Bill and other important measures of social reform. The situation is, to say the least, unfortunate for the militant Suffragettes, if only for the reason that it provides their critics with a capital weapon of attack, and offers a unique opportunity for misrepresenting these women, and arraying them, in the eyes of shallow observers, on the side of the brewers and an unscrupulous campaign of reaction.

I am a minister of religion, a total abstainer, a radical temperance reformer eager to see the passing of the Bill, and ready to welcome even complete prohibition at the earliest possible moment. I cannot think lightly of opposition to the present Government. But, even so, I would invite your correspondents to reflect a little more deeply on the action of these women before condemning them, and to look at their attitude, as we must look at all great issues, from a non-party point of view.

The women's movement is in its essential spirit a revolutionary movement, and it must be judged as such. Until we can imaginatively visualise this revolt of a sex in the perspective and proportions in which it appears to the women themselves, all our arguments, however straight and direct, are not on the same plane, and being produced ever so far (and ever so often) will not meet.

Let us assume that even their overt tactics are as lawless and revolutionary as their opponents represent them to be. What then? Are lawless and revolutionary tactics never justifiable? It would be interesting to have the answer of those of your readers who, even while possessing the vote, were, or are, Passive Resisters. The most conservatively disposed students of such treatises as Sidgwick's "Elements of Politics," T. H. Green's "Lectures on Political Obligation," Dr. Bernard Bosanquet's "Philosophical Theory of the State," must feel the enormous difficulty of deciding when it is the duty of a good citizen to rebel, and this difficulty is here increased when we bear in mind that women are not yet citizens in the full sense. As a rule we are wise in such matters after the event. For the philosopher (however little of a pragmatist), as for the plain blunt man, this political problem often resolves itself into a case where nothing succeeds like success. We still honour the breakers of the Fugitive Slave Laws, and in our hearts, if not with our lips, condone the action of the male rioters in our country on behalf of the franchise we now enjoy. On the whole, most of us probably endorse T. H. Green's guarded and qualified conclusion that "there may be cases in which public interest—not merely according to some remote philosopher's view of it, but according to conceptions which the people are able to assimilate—is best served by a violation of some actual law."

An argument, not altogether specious, might surely be made out that a State that exacts taxes and rates from women, and subjects them to the obligations of citizens, and yet condemns them, on the mere ground of their sex, to political outlawry, cannot have the same claim upon their obedience that it has upon its represented male subjects. With perfect sobriety it might be urged that the women's position is closely akin to that of slaves demanding human and civic rights. The analogy, so far as it obtains, tells politically even more forcibly in favour of the women; for the slaves were exempt from taxation and the common obligations of citizenship.

The point, then, that must be insisted upon is that these women are in the thick of a momentous national, if not revolutionary, movement on behalf of a completer democracy. To fail to seize this fact firmly is to fail altogether to understand the political consciousness of the militant woman. For her the claim to a vote is paramount, and dominates the whole field of political activity. Earl Russell, in his powerful letter in the "Daily News" of the 3rd inst., put this aspect of the case quite conclusively when he wrote: "The policy of the Suffragettes is a perfectly clear and an easily intelligible policy. They are women who say that to them the grant of the franchise is a matter of more immediate importance than any other political issue. Personally, of course, I do not think so, but then, I am not a woman. But in what way does their position differ . . . from that of an Independent Labour man, who thinks that the various Labour questions are of more importance than any party issue?"

I will add one further remark. Russia is at the present moment engaged in an extraordinarily drastic piece of licensing legislation. Will it be seriously argued that the whole democratic movement of the Russian reformers should now be suspended sine die in order that the Government may, without embarrassment, concentrate on this measure of social reform? What the Russian reformers demand is not any particular detail of good government on the part of an unrepresentative power, but their just share in self-government as the necessary pre-requisite of good government. Similarly, what the women demand in England is not primarily a Licensing Bill brought in by a male section of the community, but their political enfranchisement as a means of securing free speech through the ballot on all matters affecting their own and the nation's well-being.

If the Government refuses a reasonable pledge to redress the women's wrongs, if no facilities are immediately granted to pass Mr. Stanger's Bill into law, the responsibility for the Suffragettes' bye-election policy must be laid upon the Government, and the women must be held absolved of blame. As a supporter of the Government and as a temperance worker, I venture to appeal for such facilities not only to effect a grant of political justice, but in order that the moral energy of these women may be diverted, ere it is too late, from a determined opposition into an ardent and enthusiastic support.—Yours, &c.,

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, April 7th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I agree not only with every argument, but with every word of your correspondent, "Another Woman Liberal," in a recent number, and I venture to add a further argument, which requires, I think, to be clearly stated by those who dissent from the Suffragettes' general view of the Woman Suffrage question, as well as from their methods.

It is this: Liberalism means to us now something more developed, something more democratic, than it did twenty-two years ago, when a Woman Suffrage Bill passed its second reading. If it is true, as we are so often told, that the extension of the suffrage to women is a recognised Liberal principle, so also is it quite as true that the time for widening the franchise on a property qualification is past, so far as a Liberal Government is concerned. Twenty-two years ago the principle was possible, but it is so no longer. The Liberal movement has passed beyond it, and its effects are now more clearly seen. These effects would probably be not merely injurious in the ways your correspondent suggests, but it is evident from arguments used at elections that a large number of propertied women, when enfranchised themselves, would use every means in their power to prevent the suffrage being further democratised. The "small end of the wedge" can be used as a means to keep the door closed, instead of open.

Women are necessarily affected by a property qualification Bill in a different way from men, owing to their legal status by marriage. It means that married women must be debarred from the franchise. But rich husbands and fathers could easily obtain votes for their wives and daughters by purchase of land or houses. And the only way in which the family vote could be fairly balanced is by the enfranchisement of married women and their daughters. And the only practical methods for their enfranchisement is through Adult Suffrage—universal, men and women. It is impartial; it gives votes to poverty in its numbers as well as to riches, which is able to double and treble its votes. It is the only system which can create righteous equality. Women members of the Labour Party and of the Co-operative Guild have seen this.

All countries and colonies that have extended the suffrage to women have adopted, I believe, the system of Adult Suffrage. It has its dangers no doubt, and it means an enormous change in our constitution. It demands a mandate from the country, for such a change cannot be forced. It must be accepted as a special question at a general election.

That this would defer the giving the suffrage to women is of minor importance compared to the far greater importance of getting real political equality for all. We do not want to see a principle established but the right one—the only one that a democratic government can propose and that Liberal men and women can accept.

The cry for any form of Woman Suffrage, without discrimination, is not a Liberal cry; it may be anti-Liberal in principle and injurious in its effect.

This argument, naturally, does not appeal to Suffragettes, who are doing their utmost at elections to oppose all Liberal reforms; it is addressed to those who believe in political morality and in a consistent loyalty to Liberal principles; to those, in short, with whom Liberalism is, as your correspondent nobly says: "A cause, a flag, a faith."—Yours, &c.,

YET ANOTHER WOMAN LIBERAL.

April 13th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed to point out that your correspondent, "A Woman Conservative," is in error in stating that the leaders of the great "Suffragette" movement are not unanimous in their demands? There are at present three bodies of women working for this reform, viz., the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, which comprises over a hundred societies and local committees in England and Scotland, the Women's Social and Political Union, and the Women's Freedom League. These organisations of women all ask for precisely the same thing—the removal of sex disability by the extension of the franchise to women on the same terms as it now is, or may be, granted to men. It is estimated that by this extension of the franchise between one and two million more voters would be added to those now in existence, and this, in the opinion of "A Woman Conservative," would be a mere drop in the ocean. Does she argue that, because women ask for little, therefore they should have nothing? By the vote being given even to this limited number some members of a class now totally unrepresented will have the right to express their opinions at the polling booth, and candidates for election must take into account the wants of women, who will then be recognised as citizens. The status of women as a whole will thus be raised, since it will be possible for any woman to become an elector; and the degrading doctrine of sex disability will be for ever swept away.

"A Woman Conservative" thinks that the "Suffragettes" should give up their undignified demonstrations, and join the leaders of the anti-sweating movement, to encourage women to join trades unions and so combine to stand out for a minimum wage. But men do not find trades unions sufficient without their votes to back them up. The women's trades unions realise that to make their resolutions effective they, too, must have Parliamentary representation, and it is precisely the women who are most active in organising trades unions amongst women who are most urgent in demanding the franchise. Can "A Woman Conservative" be ignorant that many of the Suffragist leaders are in that prominent position mainly because they have been forced to realise the hopelessness of attempting to ameliorate the condition of poor working women until they have Parliamentary representation? If "A Woman Conservative" sincerely desires to mitigate "the terrible evil of woman's sweated labour," let her go and work amongst the poor victims, and she, too, will soon be amongst those who, disregarding sneers and censure on their conduct, urge by every means in their power the right of women to a share in the franchise.

"E. P." is troubled by the bye-election policy pursued by some of the Suffragists, and states that they "are using all their influence against their principles to spite their oppressors," these oppressors being broadly described as "men." The bye-election policy of the Women's Social and Political Union is directed against the Liberal candidate at every bye-election because he is the nominee of the party now in power which refuses to give women votes. They used their influence at Peckham, not in "a wild passion," but as a well-considered mode of action—the mostly likely, in their opinion, to achieve their end. When British women have votes they will use them, as it is acknowledged the women in our colonies do, in furthering what they regard, without any affectation, as "most sacred and lofty in politics."—Yours, &c.,

(MRS.) JANE ATKINSON.

April 13th, 1908.

"THE USE OF THE LASH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Every humane man will be grateful to you for your timely and courageous words on this subject. It may be hoped that Mr. Gladstone will have read them. It made one indeed ashamed to hear a Liberal Home Secretary attempting to justify, as he did last week, this barbarous and degrading punishment. The practice of flogging adult offenders has been abolished in the Army and Navy, and in most civilised countries. Even in England it is only possible under an old statute of forty years ago, passed in a panic, against the advice of the best judgment of that day. Very few judges now resort to it, so that the penalty, as you point out, is irregular and spasmodic. It is high time it was abolished altogether. In the meanwhile it is surely not too much to ask that the Home Secretary, in all such cases, should exercise the prerogative of mercy which belongs to him.—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL MEMBER.

April 14th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on the use of the lash deserves the thanks of all penological reformers. That "it can never be just to sentence any man to flog another" sums up the whole question. But what applies to flogging applies to all violent physical punishment. The evil contagion of violence spread by "humane" judges is great. And the Press, unfortunately, helps. Witness the Cardiff newspaper placard: "More bare backs to be flogged!" Lord John Russell pointed out some seventy years ago in regard to hanging that the greatest evil of all was the barbarous reaction on the public mind. One may hope, at any rate, that the Criminal Appeal Act will in the future make it unnecessary for the Home Secretary to provide certificates in "humanity" for flogging and hanging judges.—Yours, &c.,

CARL HEATH, Hon. Sec.,
Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment,
145, New Kent Road, S.E.,
April 12th, 1908.

Reviews.

THE PRO-CONSUL AS HISTORIAN.*
II.

Mr. Sidney Low tells a story of Lord Cromer which admirably illustrates those parts of his book that strike one as the least convincing, if they are not the least characteristic. A friend, seeking to relax the rather strained relationships between him and Nubar Pasha, interviewed each statesman in turn. "What a pity that two such excellent men do not get on!" was the burden of his song. "You are greatly mistaken," was Nubar's reply. "I have the greatest respect for Lord Cromer. He has only one fault: he never knows his own mind." Lord Cromer was not less illuminating. "Nubar is an excellent fellow," he said. "What makes him so difficult is that he has no tact." It is impossible to resist the conclusion that Lord Cromer's belief in his own tactfulness has borne him triumphantly through these volumes: otherwise not a few pages of it would have been left unwritten. We might have learned less of the mental and moral shortcomings of Pasha, and Sheik, and "Alim," of Gordon, Tewfik, Nubar, Tigrane, of Turks and Moslems, and Copts, and Armenians, and the congeries of personalities and races through which this powerful, self-centred, highly-conscientious Englishman worked. We should not have mourned with Lord Cromer that he should be constrained by sad experience to think that the Oriental "in the loomp is bad." He may be right. But so far as he develops his thesis, he must forgive us for saying that he explains his own confession that native Egypt has yielded no meed of gratitude or affection for his and his country's great work of material renovation. To him East is East and West is West, and the two can never meet. In a moment of inadvertence the former gave the latter its religion. Lord Cromer would almost make us believe that the gift was more than repaid when the West retorted on the East by forcibly presenting it with its Progress and its Politics.

Until the full results of this munificence are revealed, Lord Cromer seems to be of opinion that the character of the Egyptian will continue to disclose such dark and un-English blemishes as being courteous when "he thinks it his interest to be so"; in "not wanting to be reformed," and imagining that the reformer "bodes him no good"; in cherishing political opinions "not infrequently connected with some personal grievance"; in lack of accuracy as to numbers and details of past events, like battles; in either putting too much salt into his soup or (on this fault being corrected) putting none at all; and in possessing ladies whose interference in politics is "mischievous." We confess that we have had some difficulty in discovering the root of Lord Cromer's scepticism as to the soundness of the Egyptian-Oriental type. Half the faults of which he takes such keen note might be alleged against the Englishman of the eighteenth century. If the Egyptian mixes his medicine with witchcraft or devil-worship, so did our ancestors. And is not the question of moral and political capacity affected by the mixture of races, the unfavourable interior history of the country and its rulers, the presence of bad European elements, the character of the international control, at once interested and capricious? Lord Cromer admits all these considerations; indeed, he states them with singular fairness. It is true that he adopts the conclusion of the immobility of the Moslem faith, and quotes approvingly Sir William Muir's saying, "Islam stands still." But he is not unaware of the rapid growth of the spirit of nationalism in Moslem lands, and of the extent to which Western science and culture are undermining the rigid forms of Mohammedan orthodoxy. "It is, indeed, not improbable," he writes, "that in its passage through the European crucible many of the distinctive features of Islam, the good alike with the bad, will be volatilised, and that it will eventually issue forth in a form scarcely capable of recognition." At least that form has been plastic enough to receive a tolerably deep imprint of Lord Cromer's system. And he is broad-minded enough both to desire a form of Egyptian "autonomy" rather than a British dominion, and to believe that through the development of local institutions a fairly efficient Oriental State may be created. The European stamp will be on it, and any guise which it may eventually assume must thus make possible the fusion in "one self-governing body" of the diverse elements, Moslem or Christian, Asiatic or African, that compose it. Lord Cromer says truly that this would mean the loss of the ideal of Moslem patriotism. But it would represent no mean addition to the circle of civilised and self-sustaining nations, and the people that could be deemed capable of conquering such a place in the modern world must be more richly endowed than Lord Cromer is willing, in terms, to admit.

Setting all these defects aside, no man who values the substantial gifts of order and good government will be disposed to depreciate this record, written at times with a certain massive strength, an imposing glitter of style and scholarship, that just recall the touch of Gibbon. If Lord Cromer has not freed Egypt from herself and for herself, from Europe and for civilisation, he has all but cut the bonds that were strangling all her activities at once. The work is his and England's. France unfortunately has no share in it. And so far as the material aspect of it is concerned—the wresting of the Soudan from Mahdism and (better still) from the Khalifa, the restoration of Egyptian finance and the reduction of direct and indirect taxation, the practical abolition of slavery, forced labour, and the lash, the stemming of the Oriental plague of extravagance and corruption in government, the introduction of European science and medicine, the thrusting of the thin steel ribbon of railways into the heart of the desert, the revival of agriculture, the loosening of the bondholder's clutch—it exhibits the best fruit that the best kind of English soldiering and organising, and, above all, the special English tradition of energy and uprightness in public work, can put forth. What the difficulties of the task must have been is powerfully suggested by Lord Cromer's vivid picture of the mixed human material out of which the structure had to be built. Think of governing, through perpetually changing squads of young or middle-aged Britons from India, Oxford, Sandhurst, and Whitehall, a country whose capital shows such sights as these:—

> "The first passer-by is manifestly an Egyptian fellah who has come into the city to sell his garden produce. The head-gear, dress, and aquiline nose of the second render it easy to recognise a Bedouin who is perhaps come to Cairo to buy ammunition for his flint-lock gun, but who is ill at ease amidst urban surroundings, and will hasten to return to the more congenial air of the desert. The small, thick-lipped man with dreamy eyes, who has a far-away look of one of the bas-reliefs on an ancient Egyptian tomb, but who Champollion and other savants tell us is not the lineal descendant of the ancient Egyptians, is presumably a Coptic clerk in some Government office. The face, which peers somewhat loweringly over a heavy moustache from the window of a passing brougham, is probably that of some Turco-Egyptian Pasha. The man with a bold, handsome, cruel face, who swaggers by in long boots and baggy trousers, must surely be a Circassian. The Syrian money-lender, who comes next, will get out of his way, albeit he may be about to sell up the Circassian's property the next day, to recover a loan of which the capital and interest, at any ordinary rate, have been already paid twenty times over. The green turban, dignified mien, and slow gait of the seventh passer-by denote some pious Sheik, perhaps on his way to the famous University of El-Azhar. The eighth must be a Jew, who has just returned from a tour in Asia Minor with a stock of embroideries, which he is about to sell to the winter tourists. The ninth would seem to be some Levantine nondescript, whose ethnological status defies diagnosis; and the tenth, though not easily distinguishable from the latter class, is in reality one of the petty traders of whom Greece is so prolific, and who are to be found dotted all over the Ottoman dominions."

So far as Lord Cromer's dealings with the simpler races, the exterior problems, are concerned, Lord Cromer has succeeded, and, with the aged Faust, he may hail as fair the moment in which all this work of amelioration reached its crown. If we are asked to assess as precisely the moral conquests of his rule, the extent to which it has created relations of sympathy between the British agents and the subtler, more cultivated types of Egyptians, sharpened by contact with French life and civilisation, we must confess with regret that we see the witness of failure in his own ironical and often acidulated criticism. Lord Cromer tells us himself that though he was at pains to acquire the Turkish language, he never learned Arabic. And that fact helps us to understand why he, who won so many things for Egypt, should never have tried to win its heart.

* "Modern Egypt." By the Earl of Cromer. Macmillan. 2 vols. 24s. net.

THE NEMESIS OF PRIDE.*

Let it be granted that literature is intended to be heard or read. Unheard, unread, it has failed of its purpose—an untimely birth, entombed in oblivion to all but the author's memory of vain hopes and pangs. Yet we keep an admiration for the writer who has no care who hears or who reads, or whether any will. It used to be said of an easy style that he who runs may read, but now the author in a hurry must write for one who rides upon the wings of the County Council's lightning. Yes, and an author must make haste in winning fame, for diuturnity is a folly of expectation, and a good book lives barely six months. So it is that in an age of haste and scraps we approach with grateful wonder the writer who regards time and space as equally indifferent, and with studious deliberation lays himself out for an eternity of forgetfulness. In him we realise again the slow quietude of ancient things; in him beyond these noises there is peace.

Such a writer Mr. Charles Doughty has always been. It is thirty years now since he wandered in Arabia Deserta, and the spacious books in which he wrote his unequalled account of those wanderings remained unknown, except to a few scholars and travellers, till Mr. Garnett the other day, as we have noticed before, reduced them to two large volumes as crammed with reading as two ordinary bookshelves. Even so, they elude the modern laws of industrial economy, nor are they assisted to popularity by a style unlike the habit of suburban tubes. Take any of these 600 closely-printed leaves; take these few sentences on an Arab encampment, where the first volume falls open of itself:

> "Sitting thus, if there any one rises, the mare snorts softly, looking that it is he who should now bring her delicious bever of warm camel milk, and, gazing after him, she whinnies with pleasance. There is a foster camel to every nomad mare, since they taste no corn, and the harsh desert stalks could not else sustain her. . . . Twice she will drink, and at the hottest of the summer season, even thrice in a daylight. . . . Who has wife or horse, after the ancient proverb, may rue; he shall never be in rest, for such brittle possessions are likely to be always ailing. Yet in that serene climate, where the element is the tent of the world, the Beduw have little other care of their mares; it is unknown in the desert so much as to rub them."

The style has an affectation of simplicity. It is not so affected as William Morris's prose. It does not talk of "wanhope" or "noseling to the ground." But there is the fatal touch of arts-and-crafts about it, though for tales of the desert, where the element is the tent of the world, it has its peculiar fitness, and if we dug up some Elizabethan book of travels written in style like that, with what tender satisfaction book-lovers would expatiate on their treasure!

Nearly a quarter of a century's silence followed the "Arabia," for here was a man who did not make haste. Then a work of similar immensity appeared, and of interest still more remote. Imagine the hardihood of one who could spend years of persistent labour upon a blank-verse history of ancient Britain and the introduction of Christianity into these islands! Imagine his proud disregard of advice! It is like the Chinaman's who sits down for a lifetime to carve an ivory ball. It is prouder, for the Chinaman may sell his ivory ball to pay for his funeral expenses, but we suppose the profits on "The Dawn in Britain" would not bury a cat. A more hopeless subject or form for modern success could hardly be found. Yet we can just imagine some Lewis Morris with sugared commonplace attracting a score of readers from religious circles, even with early British Christianity as his theme. About Mr. Doughty there is no soft attraction, no sentiment or tender appeal. Through all these six volumes of solid verse there is no touch of prettiness, no yielding to comfortable humanity; but all is stern, hard, and succinct; more like Cæsar's narrative than ordinary poetic stuff.

Opening the sixth volume at random, we light upon the place where Romans who have flogged the queen and outraged her daughters are dragged before Boadicea, our Celtic Joan of Arc:—

> "Whence they nigh dead, what for their heinous guilt,
> Durst not their craven eyes lift on her looks.
> Boudicca them, that, at her royal knees,
> Grovel, on their breasts! adjudged to hasty death.
> She spurned them; trode, with fury, on their base necks.
> Sith, when men have long worried them, with hounds;
> They lopped each brutish poll, from his lewd corse.
> Their bloody carcases, drawn without the walls,
> Of Prasutagos' dune; all, in that fosse,
> To beaks of hoodie crows and teeth of beasts,
> Those perfumed swarthy Romans forth were cast."

In which lines, the only concession to what people expect in poetry is the word "perfumed."

Or, for such tenderness as is, take a few lines where a child discovers her mother dead of childbirth in the fen, among tumbled rushes:—

> "Rosmerta, child, loud wept; nor wist she, aught,
> What thing is this! Loud weeps she, kissing oft
> Her clay-cold lips. All, in her little smock,
> The babe then lapped; and, shrieking, to the lake,
> Starts; though prick sedge, though cumber rush her feet,
> Blindfoot, for grief, nor wots her passing grief."

In which there is no touch of common tenderness, except the word "little." As for the two last lines, beautiful in conception though they are, we can picture some wretched schoolboy, when our language is dead as Latin, put on to construe them, and, weeping, flogged; him not detecting case accusative, nor subject case, nor verb, nor sense at all.

But then comes the disheartening question whether the book will be given to torment a schoolboy ever, and we think it will not. The poet's pride has something noble, something of the ancient time. His indifference to fame or mortality comes like a tonic air. His use of language is personal and strong, for he goes to the very heart of words. We believe his long epic to be excellent history also, perhaps the best history ever written of the time, and we know at least one man who has read it right through, almost without intermission, which is more than we can say of the "Faerie Queene." But we doubt if recording time will ever produce a second. The thing is too difficult, the language too harsh and constrained. It cannot be preserved as a monument of the English of any period, for the English is only its own. It may be objected that Milton's English also is only his own, and so it is. But none of his contemporaries would perceive anything quaint, difficult, or antiquated in Milton's English; nor do we even now, outside the use of half-a-dozen words, like "grain" or "tedded." The "Ring and the Book" was preserved for a time by its human and dramatic interest, in spite of its headstrong style. But even that interest could not keep it in the centre for long, and in "The Dawn in Britain" the human interest is carefully constrained, and there is no drama. We should like it to be preserved, for we admire its strength and flinty self-restraint. We can imagine a cult of it arising among scholarly and sensitive readers in a leisured countryside. But other life than this we can hardly hope for it here below.

In his new work of "Adam Cast Forth," the title alone shows the poet's pride and courage more than maintained. It is the story of those poor dear First Parents of ours, taken up where "Paradise Lost" left them, and carried on till they have issue of three children—all at one birth, a needless ferity, unsanctioned of Holy Writ, though perhaps Arabian tradition so records. Unhappily, the isolation of pride here exacts its penalty, and indifference to criticism exaggerates the poet's habit into tricks. Of Adama, who is Eve, we expect a simple tongue, but nothing will persuade us that German was the speech of Paradise, even after the Fall. Yet Adama enters the poem with the hideous German line:—

> "Spouse-father, it am Adama I that speak."

And too frequently we meet such language as these rocky and barren words:—

> "But ah now spouteth thick warm salt living blood,
> From the man's nostrils! Faltering stayeth him Adam:
> He him agonising leaneth up to cliff craig!
> He an hand réacheth fórth, which lo a stone uptaketh;
> To stanch, to purge that stain ah, of drizzling gore."

In a long experience of bloody wounds, the present reviewer had never thought of washing them with a stone. That hint he will remember, but hopes to forget the language. For, though saved from alliteration, it is like Wagner's so-called poems; it is almost worse. There lies the pity of it, for Mr. Doughty was born to be a master in language, as in adventurous life.

* "Adam Cast Forth." By Charles M. Doughty. Duckworth & Co. 4s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER MARINER.*

The appearance of a second and enlarged edition of Lord Dunraven's work is a proof of the high esteem in which this aid to self-instruction in the complex and mysterious science of navigation is held by those who aspire to become certificated masters of their own or other people's ships. Although the works of Lecky, Martin, and Rosser still hold high position as text-books in all nautical academies, there can be little doubt that, for all purposes of instruction, so far as the man of average educational attainments is concerned, no published work can compare with this book of Lord Dunraven's in the essentials of lucidity of explanation and accurate conception of the difficulties likely to be experienced by the learner. A most human and living treatment of the dry scientific bases of a somewhat uninspiring subject is maintained throughout the work, and an undercurrent of humorous commiseration for examinees adds a welcome touch to the otherwise dull pages of Logarithms and tables of "Day's work."

But whether Lord Dunraven's labours will help to swell appreciably the ranks of the 242 yacht owners and other gentlemen who, according to "Lloyd's Yacht Register" "have obtained certificates as Masters of their own yachts," is another question. In the first place, there is, at present, no law which prevents the owner of a yacht from signing himself on as Master, or from acting as Master if he thinks fit. Indeed, the yacht owner is wise in any case to register as "Owner and Master," even when he ships a sailing master to take charge of his vessel, because on the high seas the Master is the head and fount of all law, and it is not remotely inconceivable that under some circumstances a Master may put his owner in irons.

In the second place, the fact that the yachtsman who loves the sea for its own sake and delights in sailing and exploring, rarely owns anything larger than a twenty-tonner, on board of which he cruises from port to port, as his whims or the winds may direct. He is really only a coaster, and coasting is the boundary line where navigation ends and seamanship comes in. For him no traverse tables spread their arid deserts of sines, cosecants, and tangents. His one book of reference is the nautical almanack for the year—his guides, the large scale chart and the sailing directions which accompany it. With these, and a bosom friend of similar tastes to his own, and his two paid hands in the forecastle, the command of the narrow seas is his: and on him the pageant of the summer skies, and the songs of the wind and sea are freely lavished.

No phase of modern existence is quite comparable to the blessed state of freedom granted to the fortunate being who can thus spend his days and nights in this healthiest form of all sport, wherein adventure is freely commingled with perpetual and sustained interest. It is the nearest possible return to that golden age when to put to sea was to open up an unfathomable vista of imagination—to voyage into the unknown, with the glimmering vision of the Fortunate Isles as ultimate port.

His floating home of hollow oak, wherein is garnered all the accumulated knowledge and experience of a thousand years of seafaring, is, when built and rigged as a cruiser, staunch enough to cope with any gale likely to blow on our coasts. Give her sea room and she will ride out a summer storm, hove to and head to sea, as buoyantly as a gull. Let the breeze catch her on a lee shore, and she will work her way off long before there is weight enough in the sea to cripple her. Before a freshening gale she will wing her way to port, outfooting the following sea, lifting her bow high and clear above the wrinkled face of the overtaken wave, as she rushes onward to her haven; and her crew, washed with salt spray and whipped by the wind, will, when the anchor bites the ground and the wet sails are furled, sleep the sweet sleep of the labouring man.

The knowledge that will enable a man to handle a sailing yacht at sea, to carry her from port to port in safety, and to berth her securely in port or roadstead, cannot, however, be got from books, for it is the final development of the spirit of opportunism applied to the affairs of the sea. No two emergencies are ever alike—there is no "best way" of doing anything. There is rarely more than one way, all other ways may lead to disaster; and the one way must be taken almost instinctively. The man must not only be a part of his ship, he must be also a part of the wind and the tides, he must have merged his being into some portion of the universe and act in harmony with its elements.

The chapter dealing with the tides is, perhaps, the most interesting part of the book to the coasting yachtsman. It is full of accurate information, and elaborate examples of methods of finding the times of high water by the moon's transit, of places as wide apart as Brest and Natal. But these are only for the wretched candidate for examination by the Board of Trade. The consummate coaster will smile at them, and pass on to the end of the chapter, where he will find agreement with his attitude when he reads the author's closing words, "I should add that in these cases the times obtained are only approximate, and that it is quite useless, except for the examination, to dive into these minutiæ."

The cruiser's tide-table is in his head. The tides are so much a part of his daily life that their rise and fall, height, direction and velocity are felt by instinct. He plays on them as upon an instrument. Sea-lawyer that he is, he cheats them legally when he can, and patiently abides their strength when no breath from the heavens helps him to master it.

Lord Dunraven's services to yachting have been many and various, and all yachtsmen will remember his able contributions to the "Field" on the proposed alterations in the rule of rating for racing yachts in 1892, when the whole system of measurement was changed in the most revolutionary manner. His latest service to seamen and yachtsmen is, perhaps, his greatest; and all who go down to the sea in ships will be grateful to him for it, whether they desire to possess the coveted "blue ticket" or are merely content to sail the seas by the simple methods of their forefathers, the fisherman and the coaster.

* "The Practice and Theory of Navigation." By the Earl of Dunraven. Macmillan & Co. 25s. 6d. net.

CRITICS FOR SOCIALISM.

II.—Mr. Brougham Villiers.*

The successful literary exposition of any important contemporary movement demands a rare combination of sympathy and critical restraint. No subject has suffered more for lack of this treatment than Socialism. Most writers upon this theme are unprofitable partisans, while the few cooler and more scientific critics are so much concerned with doctrines or experiments that they fail to convey the vital unity, the élan, of the movement. The great merit of this book of Mr. Villiers is that it is a lucid exposition of the actual movement of Socialism in this country by a fully-informed and sympathetic student, who understands the limits of the use of sympathy in the art of interpretation. It is in our judgment by far the best general historical treatment of the origin and play of forces in the Labour-Socialist movement of this country that has yet appeared.

Wisely eschewing any close examination of the economic and political formulæ which middle-class theorists in Germany and elsewhere have imported into the revolt of the workers against the economic and political domination of the possessing and directing classes, Mr. Villiers traces the gathering of interests and passions which in each advanced industrial nation have gradually fashioned the sort of Socialism adapted to their history and their national character. The main current of the whole movement, as he shows it, is the organisation of the masses of workmen first brought into close contact and into solidarity of interests and grievances by the new industrial conditions of the industrial revolution. In the trade unions, co-operative societies, and other working-class institutions for industrial, educational, and recreative purposes, which sprang up in the early decades of the nineteenth century, he finds the expressions of that instinct of association which later on was to be drawn more and more into the use of political institutions, and so to take on the form of State Socialism. Full justice is done to the educative and inspiring efforts of the early Owenites, Chartists, and Christian Socialists of the middle century, as later to the teaching of such writers as Carlyle and Ruskin, but Mr. Villiers rightly assigns the chief importance to the gradual moulding of a working-class policy through the changing relations between capital and labour. Not until formal political democracy was achieved by the widening of the franchise, and the general spread of the elements of education gave increased mobility to ideas, did the movement begin to take on any conscious tinge of Socialism. The early English doctrinal Socialism, as given in various writers contemporary with Ricardo, was a premature intellectual product almost entirely barren of results, and not until the re-formulation of doctrine by Lassalle, Marx, and others in the early 'sixties did any intellectual stiffening pass into the working-class movement. Even then, as Mr. Villiers clearly recognises, the British movement was very slow to take on the useful thought and tactics of the Continental movement. "British Socialists received from Germany two invaluable things, each necessary to the warfare with modern capitalism—the idea of the careful and scientific study of modern conditions, and that of independent political organisation. Unfortunately, they were slow to recognise either the necessity of making a fresh and independent study of contemporary British industrial society as thorough as that of Marx, or that the Socialist Party in Britain must be constructed on British lines."

* "The Socialist Movement in England." By Brougham Villiers. Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

It may well be doubted whether English workers ever have taken either of these necessities from Germany: the first they have never taken at all, for with the exception of a few middle-class Socialists there has been no serious endeavour to accumulate a stock of ordered knowledge; the second, as indeed Mr. Villiers recognises, is in the course of being evolved from the logic of events rather than from the example of Germany. Though the powerful impetus given to economic thinking among the intelligent artisans by Henry George (to whose influence Mr. Villiers hardly does justice), by the fiery preaching of the Social Democrats and the more sober instruction of other definitely Socialistic bodies and journals, has now begun to make the Socialistic implications of our democratic movement manifest to thoughtful onlookers, Socialism is still in the main an unconscious force. It may remain so. English people do things, and they do not always come even afterwards to recognise the nature or intellectual significance of what they have done. But no doubt Mr. Villiers is correct in regarding the Labour Representation Committee and the Labour Party as genuine instruments of British Socialism, engaged in the work of forwarding the policy of nationalisation and municipalisation, the public support of social weaklings, the fuller control over private industry, and the taxation of unearned incomes, which constitute the actual Socialism of to-day.

It is not quite clear how Mr. Villiers diagnoses the changes in political parties which must follow the growth of this potential or actual Socialist Party in Parliament. He tells us that "the first practical effect of Labour's arrival in the House is that Parliament will, for the future, be compelled to give continuous attention to the 'condition of England' question, whatever party is in power." And again: "Liberalism, in particular, will be compelled to support its assertion that there is no need for a Labour Party by becoming more and more like the Labour Party itself. The advent of a Labour Party must ere long be followed by the retirement of the typical Liberal capitalist from every industrial constituency where the Labour Party gains a foothold."

The "urge of the world" towards co-operation as the great human economy Mr. Villiers holds to be the driving force in Socialism; for as the people realises more its political power, and so trusts the State and the municipality not as outside powers but as instruments for the expression of the popular will, it will tend more and more to substitute these forms of public co-operation for the private co-operative forms, the companies and societies, into which the co-operative spirit flows at present. Though English Socialism will imbibe little either of the formularist or the revolutionary spirit of Continental Socialism, it will move along in a constant instinctive pressure, by a series of more or less opportunist steps, towards a State which shall replace much of the competition and the private monopolies of to-day by public industries.

Mr. Villiers does not see, even in the remote future, a complete Socialist State directly ordering the entire field of production. Provided the great instruments of capitalism engaged in the production and the distribution of the chief national and intellectual necessaries by routine processes are public operated, there may still remain a host of arts and crafts, chiefly occupied in making special and superior sorts of goods which may be left to private enterprise.

Several interesting chapters treat of the right attitude of the State towards the claim of women through maternity, the liquor trade and the question how far public services should be communised, and a particularly powerful refutation is given of the charge that Socialism destroys individual liberty. But though Mr. Villiers' discussion of these highly-controversial themes is often brilliant and always profitable, the great value of his book consists in its lucid account of the rough, unintellectual, adaptive type of Socialism which in England has emerged from a medley of popular movements, causes, and demands, and has found a rude instrument in the new Labour Party, through which it is striving to obtain some more or less coherent and effective expression.

All Liberals who are not too scornful of Socialism to wish to understand it as set forth by this brilliant exponent will read Mr. Villiers' book.

FLORENCE AND SOME BUILDINGS.*

The author of this exceedingly clever and thoughtful book anticipates the most obvious criticisms that can be passed upon it. Because, he says, he has arranged his buildings in historic rather than architectural order, the reader with architectural sympathies may find it desultory; and because he has written of the Badia a Settimo and not of that of Florence, of Santa Maria Novella and not of Santa Croce, the student with his own ideas of the importance of various buildings will consider him capricious. Now there is nothing more likely than that these preferences and omissions will be found fault with, if only for the simple reason that it is impossible to please everyone; and we ourselves could increase the list of whys and wherefores. We might ask, for instance, why in the many pages devoted to the Baptistery there is not even a bare reference to Ghiberti's gates; why in a book that deals so intimately with the civil and military life of Florence there is no mention of the military engineering that Michelangelo undertook at the bidding of the Signory in 1527, and why half a dozen other artist notabilities closely connected with the city have been ignored? For one may note that the "Builders of Florence" in Mr. Wood Brown's scheme are not restricted to the makers of structures in brick or stone, but include anybody who contributed prominently to its moral and material prosperity, or, indeed, to its decadence. Yet we should be extremely reluctant to press these or any omissions, since after reading the book we are quite ready to admit that they are easily accounted for.

Florentine architecture is to a peculiar extent the outward and visible expression of the city's growth and of the inward and spiritual forces that swayed that growth. It recalls not merely her instinct for beauty, but her laws, her social code, her system of defence, and especially her commerce. The latter is important because Florence, the home of art, was first and foremost a commercial city. Her artes were those of wool-weaving and silk-making, not less than those of building, painting, and sculpture. She resembled Venice in this respect. Indeed, her history is like that of Venice in nearly everything except the form of government, which was as variable in Florence as it was stable in the Adriatic city. Even in regard to the Oriental influence the analogy between the two cities holds true. Florence had her Greek colony, which brought her Christianity in the first instance, and in the second leavened her humanism. The close relationship, therefore, between the buildings of Florence and her life, her development and commerce, is one of the big facts to be grasped by any serious student of her art and architecture, and Mr. Wood Brown has not forgotten to keep it well to the front. His purpose is to connect history and architecture as surely as they are connected in life. In a task of such magnitude that which

* "The Builders of Florence." By J. Wood Brown, M.A. With seventy-four Illustrations by Herbert Railton. Methuen & Co. 18s. net.

SEVENTH THOUSAND.

MODERN EGYPT

By the EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait and Map. Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

F. C. SELOUS'S New Book

African Nature Notes and Reminiscences.

By F. C. SELOUS, F.Z.S., Author of "A Hunter's Wandering's in Africa," "Travel and Adventure in South East Africa." With a Foreword by President ROOSEVELT and Illustrations by E. H. CALDWELL. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Story of the Guides. By Col. C. J. YOUNGHUSBAND, C.B. With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A concise record of the busy career of service—the Mutiny, Kabul, Afghan War, 1878-80, Chitral, the Malakand, and minor wars—seen by the corps since, some sixty years ago, it was originated by Sir Henry Lawrence and raised by Sir Harry Lumsden.

Autobiography of Montagu Burrows, Captain R.N., Chichele Professor of Modern History, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. Edited by His Son, STEPHEN M. BURROWS. With Portraits. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. [Next week.

The Eversley Tennyson. Annotated by ALFRED LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM LORD TENNYSON. In 9 vols.

Vol. I. Poems, with Portrait. Vol. II. Poems. Vol. III. Enoch Arden and In Memoriam. Vol. IV. The Princess and Maud. Vol. V. Idylls of the King. Globe 8vo, 4s. net each.

National and Social Problems. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. April 28.

A volume of great and varied interest. These collected papers deal with European political problems of the highest moment and with questions of Labour, Unionism and Socialism.

General History of Western Nations from 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D. By EMIL REICH, Doctor Juris, Author of "New Student's Atlas of English History," etc. Part I. ANTIQUITY, Vols. I. and II. 8vo., 15s. net.

The two volumes treat (1) of the method of history; (2) of the great inland empires of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, the Hittites, &c.; (3) of the border nations called the Hebrews, the Phœnicians, and the Archaic Hellenes; (4) the historic Greeks; (5) the Romans.

Atlas Antiquus. In 48 Original Graphic Maps, with Elaborate Text to each Map, and full Index. By Dr. EMIL REICH. Crown 4to, 10s. net.

Herodotus, BOOKS VII.—IX. With Introduction, Text, Apparatus, Commentary, Appendices, Indices, Maps. By REGINALD WALTER MACAN, D.Litt. 3 vols. 8vo, 30s. net. [Classical Library.

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

Herodotus, Books IV.—VI. By the same editor. In 2 vols. 8vo, Reduced to 20s. net.

Plays of Aeschylus. The Suppliant Maidens—The Persians—The Seven Against Thebes—The Prometheus Bound. Translated into English Verse by E. D. A. MORSHEAD, M.A. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Golden Treasury Series.

Highways & Byways in Hampshire. By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. CONNOR. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

Diary of John Evelyn. With Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3s. 6d. Or Limp Leather, 5s. net. [Globe Library.

H.M.I. Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, by E. M. SNEYD-KYNNERSLEY, formerly H.M.I. North-west Division. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A highly entertaining book, containing a large number of good stories told by a raconteur of exceptional ability.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

If you Live in the Country,
If you Love the Country,

READ

THE COUNTRY HOME

An Illustrated Monthly Magazine.	Price 6d. Net.	Now on Sale Everywhere.

¶ To all who have a common interest in the country, THE COUNTRY HOME will appeal. Illustrated articles on interesting homes with their surroundings. —Natural History.—Rural Industries.—Country Customs. —Garden and Greenhouse.—Poultry.—Insect Pests.— The Planning of Cottages and Buildings.—The Interior of the Home.—Furnishing.—The Gathering Together of Old Ornaments.

These are but a few of the subjects dealt with in THE COUNTRY HOME.

6s. NOVELS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

THE TREE OF HEAVEN

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Younger Set."

MAROTZ. By JOHN AYSCOUGH.

THE ANCIENT LAW. By ELLEN GLASGOW.
Author of "The Deliverance."

A COMEDY OF MOODS. By GREVILLE H. TEMPANY.

THE DAUGHTER. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.
Author of "Conflict."

THE BURNING CRESSET. By HOWARD PEASE.
Author of "Magnus Sinclair."

THE BEST EXPLANATION OF THE SOCIALIST IDEA IS CONTAINED IN

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD

BY

H. G. WELLS. 6/-

Mr. BERNARD SHAW'S WORKS

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND. 6s.
CONTENTS: "John Bull's Other Island"; "How He Lied to Her Husband"; "Major Barbara."

MAN AND SUPERMAN. 6s.
A Comedy and a Philosophy, containing as well "The Revolutionist's Handbook" and "Maxims for Revolutionists."

PLAYS PLEASANT. 6s.
CONTENTS: (1) Arms and the Man. (2) Candida. (3) The Man of Destiny. (4) You never can Tell.

PLAYS UNPLEASANT. 6s.
CONTENTS: (1) Widowers' Houses. (2) The Philanderer. (3) Mrs. Warren's Profession.

THREE PLAYS FOR PURITANS. 6s.
CONTENTS: (1) The Devil's Disciple. (2) Cæsar and Cleopatra. (3) Captain Brassbound's Conversion.

CASHEL BYRON'S PROFESSION. 6s.
Being No. 4 of the Novels of his Nonage, containing also "The Admirable Bashville," and an Essay on Modern Prize-Fighting.

THE IRRATIONAL KNOT. A Novel. 6s.

THE COMMON SENSE OF MUNICIPAL TRADING. 2s. 6d.

THE PERFECT WAGNERITE.
A New Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS.
With the Author's Apology. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

London: A. CONSTABLE and Co., Ltd.

seems capricious in choice of details may be understood and condoned.

Mr. Wood Brown divides his work into four parts, each of which contains four chapters. The first part, devoted to the substance, the spirit, and the form of the city, is mainly introductory and expository. The principal features are the tracing of the gradual supersession of the classic spirit by Christianity and that of the evolution of civic government from the trade guilds; the latter including a carefully wrought investigation of the forms of government in town and country, the principal difference between which lay in the former's possession of Charlemagne's "Libertas." The concluding chapter of this part introduces us fairly to the architectural side of the volume. It is in the main a general discussion of first principles, in which readers should note especially the pages on the root idea of the Florentine palazzo and on the miltiary models that were adapted by civil architects. The twelve buildings dealt with are as follows: the Church of Ognissanti, the Certosa of the Val d'Ema, Or S. Michele, Santa Maria Novella, Santa Felicita, San Stephano and San Giovani, S. Maria del Fiore, the Badia a Settimo, the Bargello, the Palazzo della Signoria, and San Marco. To each building is appended a story, and each story has not merely a specific interest, but also one that bears directly upon the whole organic life of the city.

As part of that life, the politics of Florence are abnormally interesting. They were opportunist in a sense. She had to steer her course through the turmoil of the eternal conflict between Church and Empire, that occupied medieval Italy for centuries. If anything, she was Guelph rather than Ghibelline, for the reason that self-interest drove her into the arms of the less material oppressor. But she made use of both, whilst keeping tenaciously to her main purpose of independence, and in time emerged, a triumphant city, from the struggle betwixt the two.

The author has given us a valuable and readable book despite its discursiveness. Mr. Railton's line drawings show feeling for architectural detail, and fulfil their illustrative purpose.

TWO HISTORICAL NOVELS.*

The difficulties of writing a historical novel that shall convey to us a complete illusion of time and place do not lie on the surface. It may be doubted, indeed, whether the best historical novel ever written does recreate for us the actual men and manners of, say, two centuries ago. Even Tolstoy, in "War and Peace," peopled the Russia of 1800 with the men of two generations later, and we have only to turn to the pages of Fielding, let alone of Defoe, to realise how impossible it is for the modern Englishman to draw out of his consciousness the mental tones and shades of feeling of eighteenth century society. Here lies the difficulty: given a social environment, with necessities, a mental outlook, that are different from ours and that have vanished, our shades of modern thought and feeling are utterly foreign to it. And yet the novelist is forced to work with his modern feelings and conceptions. The genius of Shakespeare conquered the problem by his universality: his Romans and his Elizabethans are not of their age but for all time. Scott's success rested largely on his careful study of old-fashioned types, "throwbacks," or Conservative survivals in the Scotch countryside which bred him. He succeeded best with an atmosphere familiar to him, as in "Rob Roy," which is immensely superior to "Ivanhoe," for example. And this is natural, for science, indeed, teaches us that the further we go back along the line of our ancestors the more unlike to them are we, according to their remoteness. This is borne out by an examination of any series of historical portraits, say of Holbein's Windsor drawings of the Court nobles of Henry VIII. The types of face in that collection bear little resemblance to the upper-class types of to-day: they are obviously at a greater remove from us than are the Georgian types of Hogarth. As with the face so with the mind. How is the historical novelist to recreate the mental atmosphere of the men, say, of Charles I. or of Henry VIII.? He relies a good deal on literary and documentary evidence of the period, but his people, underneath their doublets and jerkins, practically think and feel as modern men. To do Mr. Hueffer justice, we must concede that his characters in "The Fifth Queen Crowned" are not modern types. Whatever they may be, their thoughts, motives, and actions are quite unlike those of our contemporaries. In this respect Mr. Hueffer creates a strange psychological atmosphere which, though we often question it sharply, retains a dream-like power over us. It is not always humanly satisfactory, but it is undeniably picturesquely effective.

The artistic method, indeed, of our author's historical triology, which, we are glad to see, has won the encomium of the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and will shortly appear in translation in the "Journal des Débats," an honour which has been rarely paid to an English novelist, is conditioned by the flow of an extraordinarily picturesque fancy. Apparently without effort, whole scenes are visualised by him, with groups of figures, sitting, standing, moving away, gesticulating in dumb show, and all the detail of the scene down to the dust on the wall, or the crumbs fallen on the floor, are as sharply in place as is the detail of a pre-Raphaelite picture. In a curious way the appearance, movements, and gesticulations of the characters seem to govern and determine their speech, and there is a sort of break between the two, as though the figures in a picture sudden began to move, and came to a halt before speaking. Something of the same effect may be noted in William Morris's poems and in work of his school, that aimed first and foremost at the perfect visualisation of a scene. How cleverly these little picturesque etchings are wrought by our author a single quotation may convey:—

> ". . . Mary Hall was afraid, and she sent her yard-worker and a shepherd a great way round to fetch the larger boat of two to ferry over the Queen's men. Then she went indoors to redd up the houseplace, and to attire herself.
>
> "To the old farmstead, that was made of wood, hung over here and there with tilework, with a base of bricks, she had added a houseplace for the old folk to sit all day. It was built of wattles that had had clay cast over them, and was whitened on the outside, and thatched nearly down to the ground like any squatter's hut; it had cupboards of wood nearly all round it, and beneath the cupboards were lockers, worn smooth with men sitting upon them, after the Dutch fashion—for there in Lincolnshire they had much traffic with the Dutch. There was a great table, made of one slab of a huge oak from near Boston. Here they all ate. And above the ingle was another slab of oak from the same tree. Her little old stepmother sat in a stuff chair covered with a sheepskin; she sat there night and day, shivering with the shaking palsy. At times she let out of her an eldritch shriek, very like the call of a hedgehog, but she never spoke, and she was fed with a spoon by a little misbegotten son of Edward Hall's. The old stepfather always sat opposite her; he had no use of his legs, and his head was always stiffly screwed round towards the door as if he were peering; but that was the rheumatism. To atone for his wife's dumbness, he chattered incessantly whenever anyone was on that floor; but because he spoke always in Lincolnshire, May Hall could scarce understand him, and, indeed, she had long ceased to listen. He spoke of forgotten floods and ploughings, ancient fairs, the boundaries of fields long since flooded over, of a visit to Boston that King Edward IV. had made, and of how he, for his fair speech and old lineage, had been chosen of all the Radigund's men to present into the King's hands three silver horseshoes. Behind his back was a great dresser with nailed shelves, having upon them a little pewter ware and many wooden bowls for the hinds' feeding. A door on the right side, painted black, went down into the cellar beneath the old house. Another door, of bars of iron with huge locks, where slept the maids and the hinds. This was always open by day, but locked in the dark hours. For the hinds were accounted brutish lumps that went savage at night, like wild beasts, so that if they spared the master's throat, which was unlikely, it was certain that they would little spare the salted meat, the dried fish, the moad, metheglin, and cyder that their poor cellar afforded. The floor was of stamped clay, wet and sweating, but covered with rushes, so that the place had a mouldering smell. Behind the heavy door there were huge bolts and crossbars against robbers; the raftered ceiling was so low that it touched her hair when she walked across the floor. The windows had no glass, but were filled with a thin, reddish sheepskin-like parchment. Before the stairway was a wicket gate to keep the dogs—of whom there were many, large and fierce, to protect them alike from robbers and the hinds—to keep the dogs from going into the upper room . . .
>
> "Her best gown was all damp and mouldy in the attic that was her bower. She made it meet as best she could, and, indeed, she had so little fat living sitting at the head of her table with a whip for unruly hinds and louts before her—so little

---

* "The Fifth Queen Crowned." By Ford Madox Hueffer. Nash. 6s.

"The Burning Cresset." By Howard Pease. Constable. 6s.

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

THE GREY KNIGHT:

An Autumn Love Story.

By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "Peter's Mother."

Daily Graphic.—"An interesting story. A sense of pleasant rest is imparted, and it is made the more pleasant by many delightful touches of humour."

CROSSRIGGS.

By MARY and JANE FINDLATER.

Authors of "A Blind Bird's Nest," "The Green Graves of Balgowrie," &c.

DAN RIACH: SOCIALIST.

By the Author of "MISS MOLLY."

Manchester Courier.—"A fascinating study of character. The plot is admirably unfolded, but the strength of the book lies in its clear delineation of character."

MEMOIRS OF FIELD-MARSHAL

SIR HENRY WYLIE NORMAN.

By Sir WILLIAM LEE-WARNER, K.C.S.I.

With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"The story of a man of remarkable ability and of remarkable personal charm, told in a simple, dignified, and deeply interesting fashion."

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING.

By MRS. SUTHERLAND ORR.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Revised and in Parts Re-written, by FREDERIC G. KENYON, D.Litt., late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. With 2 Portraits, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Evening Standard.—"The work of the present editor has aimed solely at making a valuable book more serviceable to future generations of students and lovers of Robert Browning."

MEMORIES OF MEN & BOOKS.

By REV. PROFESSOR ALFRED JOHN CHURCH, M.A.

With a Portrait, small demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Globe.—"As a contribution to one side of the social life of the past century, Mr. Church's volume is of much value."

THE PASSING OF MOROCCO.

By FREDERICK MOORE, Author of "The Balkan Trail."

With a Cover Design, Men and Illustrations, 5s. net. [Just published.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

From . . .

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons' List.

Prospectuses of these books may be had post-free on application.

JUST OUT.

SERVIA AND THE SERVIANS.

By M. CHEDO MIJATOVICH, late Servian Minister to the Court of St. James's.

With 16 Illustrations, in demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s. net.

The author of this book is a recognised authority on all Servian affairs, and in this book he gives us a very vivid account of the religious and social life, the institutions and the traditions of Servian folk. As an authoritative history of Servia from an ethnographical, historical and political point of view, this book is believed to stand alone.

SIR JOHN GORST'S RECOLLECTIONS.

NEW ZEALAND REVISITED.

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net, with 16 Illustrations.

"This charmingly chatty book."—Western Mail. "Amusing and instructive."—Morning Leader. "Will be valued at its true worth by every intelligent reader."—Daily Telegraph. "Sir John has a fluent and descriptive pen."—Daily Express. "Delightful."—Manchester Guardian. "A pleasant and readable book."—Globe.

"A Book of Very Deep Interest."

MODERNISM: a Record and Review.

By the Rev. A. LESLIE LILLEY, M.A., Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington.

With Epistle Dedicatory to the Rev. Father G. Tyrrell. 6s. net.

"Mr. Lilley's lively pages make us feel the excitement of the contemporary movement in France. The volume will help anyone who cares so to do to trace for himself the growth of a controversy which is of momentous importance for Western Christianity. . . . It is wholesome reading."
—Manchester Guardian.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MESSIANIC IDEA: a Study in Comparative Religions.

By the Rev. W. O. E. OESTERLEY, D.D.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net.

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD., 1, Amen Corner, London, E.C.

From ROUTLEDGE'S SPRING LIST.

ASPECTS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

By RICHARD H. P. CURLE. With an Engraved Portrait after G. F. WATTS. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A distinguished and well-balanced piece of work, which should gain its author immediate recognition, as among the most sane and well informed of the younger critics of the day."—Daily Telegraph.

"I would advise any aspirant to the study of Meredith to read a book by Mr. Richard Curle, very recently published, entitled 'Aspects of George Meredith.' It is the work of a convinced and penetrating admirer, and analyses a number of points highly deserving of being taken into consideration."—Mr. W. M. ROSSETTI, in the Daily News.

A RESIDENT'S WIFE IN NIGERIA

By CONSTANCE LARYMORE. With 41 Illustrations on Art Paper, and a Portrait of the Author, 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mrs. Larymore is not only a skilled traveller in wild countries, but is able to describe her wanderings most graphically with pen and camera. One of the most enjoyable books of travel we have seen of late."—Globe.

"Miss Kingsley has shown us that a woman can travel. . . . Mrs. Larymore gives a further demonstration of the fact. . . . In Miss Kingsley's book nothing is more striking than the good humour of the writer; Mrs. Larymore has the same fine gift of kindly optimism. A most engaging account of her life and experiences in Nigeria."—Liverpool Courier.

THE LAND OF THE MAPLE LEAF;

OR, CANADA AS I SAW IT.

By B. STEWART, Author of "My Experiences in Cyprus," &c. With 16 Plates, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"There has been quite a flood of books about Canada of late, but few of them have been of such deep interest as this. . . . In every way this latest volume on Canada is a valuable one. It gives a true picture of the country from the Canadian side, and all through the reader feels that he is in the hands of a writer who has a thorough grasp of his subject."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE CASE FOR THE GOAT,

WITH THE PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE OF 24 EXPERTS.

By "HOME COUNTIES." With 16 Full-page Plates, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s.6d.; also with 4 Full-page Plates, boards, 1s.

"Shows how easily anybody with no more accommodation than a backyard in the suburbs can become a keeper of live stock which will make him independent of the dairyman."—Lancet.

"May be warmly recommended as containing much that is very likely to be useful."—Spectator.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LIMITED.
Carter Lane, E.C.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one a wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,
30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

PERCY L. PARKER.

fat living that she could well get into her wedding-gown of yellow cramosyn. She smoothed her hair back into her cord hood that for so long had not come out of its press. She washed her face in a bucket of water; that and the press and her bed, with grey woollen curtains, were all the furnishing her room had. The straw of the roof caught in her hood when she moved, and she heard her old father-in-law cackling to the servant-maids through the cracks of the floor."

How pictorial is every touch here, reminding us of one of the medieval interiors with which the members of the P.R.B. discomforted the pundits of the Royal Academy in the 'fifties.

Although there is strain and artificiality in the highly mannered conversation put into the mouths of most of the characters, the author undoubtedly succeeds in painting a very interesting portrait of Henry VIII. Historians have always been at loggerheads over Henry's character, and Mr. Hueffer's reading of him as a man whose full-blooded, gross-hearted nature was inspired by the craft of our insular, unconscious hypocrisy, is probably near the mark. On our author's Katharine Howard, the Fifth Queen, and her simple virtue, her clear-eyed pride, and her intense devotion to the Catholic faith, the historians will probably have something to say. His Katharine could probably be less easily defended than his Mary Tudor, whose relentless nature is better indicated than the narrow bigotry which makes her memory so detestable. The scenes between Katharine and Mary are among the best in the book, and the analysis of the forces at work which led to Katharine's downfall is clever. In the closing scenes, which show us the web of Court intrigue closing around the young Queen, there is a sombreness which is certainly impressive. If the wires are too often jerked by the author's hand the atmosphere is of highly original quality. Altogether the last volume of his triology strengthens a work which, in its wealth of richly-picturesque archæological detail, may be compared with a latter-day tapestry.

Readers who demand less illusion and originality in a historical novel than Mr. Hueffer provides for them may find entertainment and profit in "The Burning Cresset," a study of the abortive rising in 1715 by Lord Derwentwater and the Northumbrian adherents of the Stuart cause. The figure of the unfortunate leader is sketched sympathetically, and the author outlines, creditably if vaguely, the most picturesque features of the short campaign which brought the Earl to the scaffold. The best character in the story is the fighting Irishman, Brian, whose unquenchable pugnacity and native craft are well set off by the infirm purpose and incompetence of the Jacobite generals. Mr. Pease, we think, is happiest when dealing with his humble country folk, and we may note here that we should find much more variety in historical romance if the narrative came more often from the lips of humble soldiers of fortune, and less from the principals in command. The chief defect of "The Burning Cresset" lies in the author's extremely modern style, and the unnaturally stilted phraseology of most of the characters. The novel is, however, vigorous and readable, and is much easier and not less profitable to read than the account given of Lord Derwentwater's rising in most of our English histories.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Most of the historians and diarists of her own age have given us anything but a favourable portrait of Charles II.'s Portuguese Queen, whose dowry added Tangier and Bombay to our possessions, and so laid the foundation of British supremacy in the East. Miss Lillias C. Davidson's capable and picturesque biography, "Catherine of Bragança, Infanta of Portugal and Queen-Consort of England" (Murray, 15s. net), is a spirited attempt to place Catherine before English readers in a more attractive light. It would be hard to imagine anyone less fitted by nature and by training than Catherine was to be the wife of such a man as Charles II., or to preside over the dissolute Court of the Restoration. In person she was far from beautiful. One writer describes her as "a woman of mean appearance and of no agreeable temper," and Lord Dartmouth says that "she was very short and broad, of a swarthy complexion, one of her foreteeth stood out, which held her upper lip." She had, however, fine eyes, a mass of glossy hair, and beautifully proportioned hands and feet. In spite of her low stature she had a dignified carriage. Pepys saw her driving in the Park in 1663, looking "mighty pretty in a white-laced waistcoat and crimson short petticoat." Brought up in the stiff formality and seclusion of the Portuguese Court, unable to speak either English or French, and of a pious, almost ascetic, temperament, she was, at the time of her marriage, better fitted to enter a convent than to become the mate of a crowned rake like Charles II. For the mixture of contempt and negligence with which Charles treated her in the early years of their married life Miss Davidson (without great weight of evidence) blames Clarendon. By compelling her to receive Lady Castlemaine he put upon her an indignity which any woman of spirit would be bound to resent, but though Catherine held out for a time, she capitulated tamely enough, and afterwards treated the long train of royal favourites with equanimity. So complaisant did she become that Pepys tells us she never entered her own dressing-room without warning, lest she should surprise her husband flirting with her maids. Charles in return treated her with greater consideration, and though he never loved her, when, owing to her childlessness, there was a strong movement to have her divorced, he resisted the attempt. He also championed her cause at the time of the Popish Plot, when she ran some danger of death on a false charge of treason. These facts do something to redeem Charles II.'s conduct towards her. Seven years after her husband's death Catherine returned to Portugal, and on the failure of her brother's health she became Queen-Regent of the country in 1705. Her brief but just and vigorous rule shows that she possessed powers which, under more favourable circumstances, might have won for her an independent reputation. If Miss Davidson hardly makes out her case that Catherine was "one of the best and purest women who ever shared the throne of England," she has at least given us a readable and sympathetic biography and a carefully studied picture of the society in which Catherine moved.

* * *

Professor C. E. Vaughan's "Types of Tragic Drama" (Macmillan, 5s. net) is a contribution to literary criticism of real value and freshness, which want of space compels us to dismiss more briefly than we should have wished. It is composed of lectures delivered to a general audience at the University of Leeds upon the great writers of tragedy from Æschylus and Sophocles to Browning and Ibsen. Professor Vaughan's main thesis is that the development of tragedy has been, on the whole, "a change from the presentation of action to the presentation of character, a gradual shifting of the scene from that which is without to that which is within." This theme is worked out with great skill and judgment. Professor Vaughan shows how greatly the romantic drama gained in force and interest by the admission of those humorous and grotesque elements which classical tragedy excluded. What strikes us most in reading his book is the catholic sympathy which enables him to do full justice to writers as violently opposed to each other as Racine and Victor Hugo. The lecture on Seneca and Roman tragedy is also a fine piece of criticism, particularly valuable from the fact that, despite his enormous influence upon Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, and the other Elizabethans, Seneca has seldom been studied in a workmanlike way. It is a pity that Professor Vaughan did not allow two lectures instead of one for his discussion of some recent types of drama. What he says upon the subject is excellent, though it leaves room for fuller treatment. Browning, Maeterlinck, and Ibsen can hardly be treated to much solid purpose in a single lecture. We heartily recommend his book. It is a sound and masterly examination of the development of dramatic literature, and no student can afford to overlook it.

* * *

Few men have lived a life of such unremitting labour and hardships on the outskirts of civilisation as the late Bishop Bompas. Mr. H. A. Cody's memoir, "An Apostle of the North" (Seeley, 7s. 6d. net), is a memorial to one of the most self-denying missionaries of our time. A sound scholar and a book-lover, Bishop Bompas threw himself heart and soul into the work of spreading Christianity

NEW EDITIONS OF "EREWHON" BUTLER

"Samuel Butler was, in his own department, the greatest English writer of the latter half of the 19th century."—Bernard Shaw.

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. A Novel. Entirely re-set. 6s. 424 pp.
EREWHON A Satire. 11th issue. 2s. 6d. net. ... ... 324 pp.
EREWHON RE-VISITED. 3rd issue. 2s. 6d. net. ... ... 340 pp.
ESSAYS ON LIFE, ART, AND SCIENCE. 2s. 6d. net. ... 340 pp

Now Ready. 6s.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A SUPER-TRAMP

By W. H. DAVIES (Author of "The Soul's Destroyer.")

WITH 8-PAGE PREFACE BY BERNARD SHAW.

"I recommend this most remarkable Autobiography of a Super-Tramp to your special attention." (Note made by Mr. Bernard Shaw on the MS. sent to the publisher.

Now Ready. 3s. 6d. nett.

ON CAMBRIAN AND CUMBRIAN HILLS

By HENRY S. SALT. With Two Photographs.
A record of forty years' experience. A delightful companion for the hills.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—
Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.

Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:
6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at
3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

among the Indians and Eskimos of the North-West. He was the first bishop of Athabasca, and when the diocese was sub-divided in 1883 he selected the less accessible district of Mackenzie River. When, later on, another sub-division took place, he retreated still farther north, and became Bishop of Selkirk, presiding over the Yukon region. So remote was he from civilisation that there usually elapsed a period of from three to four years between the time he ordered a parcel of books and the time they reached him. Apart from its picture of the great missionary bishop, this book is of interest from the account it gives of the lives of trappers and Indians in the North-West at a time when the district was less known than it is at present. The opening up of the Klondyke region and the state of the gold-mining camps there are also dealt with. The book is illustrated by an unusually interesting series of photographs.

* * *

The story of the Herkomer Art School, which was founded at Bushey in 1883, and ended its career twenty-one years later with the severance of Sir Hubert Herkomer's connection with its management, is set forth in Sir Hubert's "My School and My Gospel" (Constable, 21s. net). The starting of a school in a small country village, at that time far less accessible than it is now, was a daring scheme in itself, and perhaps justified the epithet of "Utopian" applied by those who doubted whether it would ever compete successfully with metropolitan institutions like the Slade or Heatherley's; yet few schools have enjoyed a better reputation for soundness of instruction, and few were more materially prosperous. In this book Professor Herkomer tells us of the school's beginnings, its stringent curriculum, the life of its students; explains his own practice as a teacher; and incidentally epitomises his many-sided activity. His theory of teaching is decidedly anti-Academic: search for the student's personality, and direct him accordingly—this is virtually his motto. He is against the copying of casts from the antique, holding that the beginner in art cannot understand the antique. In fact, he is against anything, including an unduly protracted course of pencil drawing, that tends to hinder the development of the painting instinct in the student who means to paint. What differentiated the Herkomer school from most others was the fact that the teaching was extended beyond the school curriculum. Artists who had been through the school were encouraged to settle in Bushey, and to begin their professional career under the surveillance of their former master. During this first period of independence, the most critical of all, perhaps, as Professor Herkomer suggests, an occasional piece of friendly advice was particularly helpful; and correspondingly it was valuable inasmuch as the master could best estimate the effect of his teaching when the student was just beginning work on his own account. In this connection one may note that, though the Herkomer School has ceased to exist, its fruits remain in a large and flourishing colony of artists, amongst whom the professor still lives and labours. His theatrical experiments, which took the form of pictorial music plays, are described here. It will be remembered that a revolt against too much convention in stage scenery—particularly against the stage moon—was inaugurated at Bushey, and that the ventures at the theatre built in connection with the art school aroused much comment at the time. The book bears full witness to its author's wholesome ideals and enormous human energy.

* * *

The late Mr. Henry Grey Graham was a scholarly minister of the Church of Scotland, whose knowledge of the life and letters of the eighteenth century was almost unrivalled. His "Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century" will long hold the field as by far the best book on the subject, and "Scottish Men of Letters in the Eighteenth Century" gives a capital picture of Edinburgh literary society during that period. A posthumous volume, "Literary and Historical Essays" (Black, 5s. net), opens with a brief account of Mr. Graham's quiet and uneventful career. He began his ministerial work at Nenthorn in Berwickshire. When Russel of "The Scotsman" went to live there, Graham was very nervous about preaching before him. A friendship soon sprang up between the two men, and at Russel's request, Graham contributed many reviews and some leading articles to "The Scotsman." The concluding essay in the present volume is an appreciation of Russel, a journalist of marked and striking personality, who made "The Scotsman" one of the most powerful organs in the country. The three lectures on "Society in France Before the Revolution," originally delivered at the Royal Institution, are marked by sureness of touch and profound knowledge of the period. Other subjects treated in the volume are Samuel Richardson (a writer for whom Mr. Graham shows a want of sympathy which prevents his essay from being first rate), Robert Heron, the origins of Glasgow University, and life in a country manse in the early eighteenth century. All of them are written in a vivid style, and bear traces of wide reading.

* * *

"Records of Stirring Times, 1726-1822" (Heinemann, 10s. net), by the authoress of "Old Days in Diplomacy," and edited by M. Montgomery-Campbell, is based upon unpublished documents in possession of the authoress. The most interesting of them are those addressed to Colonel Disbrowe, from whom the authoress is descended. Colonel Disbrowe was Vice-Chamberlain to Queen Charlotte, wife of George III., and though his letters add little to our knowledge of the political history of the times when they were written, they furnish an agreeable picture of Queen Charlotte and her daughters. The Queen was a great stickler for etiquette. The ceremony known as the Message of Form, which consisted in the formal presentation of the Queen's congratulations to ladies of rank after the birth of a child, is amusingly described, and the ingredients of the caudle which played so important a part in the ceremony are given. The latter part of the book is taken up with an account of the turmoil caused in European diplomatic relations by Napoleon's wars. The "Manuscrit de St. Hélène," which appeared in 1817, and was supposed to be the work of Napoleon, is considered at some length, but the authoress does not seem to know the theory—or at any rate, does not accept it—that the "Manuscrit" is the work of a Swiss forger. The book affords some agreeable glimpses into the social life of the Georgian era, but its historical value is slight.

* * *

Centenarians who have other claims to distinction than the energy they showed in keeping themselves alive are few in number, but the subject of Mr. M. Sterling Mackinlay's pleasantly anecdotal memoir, "Garcia the Centenarian, and His Times" (Blackwood, 15s. net), achieved fame in two separate fields. He was the greatest of modern teachers of singing, and he invented the laryngoscope, an instrument which Huxley placed among the most important inventions of the medical world. The famous Spanish maestro, who died less than two years ago, was born at Zafra in Catalonia (not Madrid, as has been often stated) in 1805, seven months before the battle of Trafalgar. With a view to helping his readers to realise the space covered by Garcia's career, Mr. Mackinlay brings together some interesting historical events, but more to the point is his survey of the musical world at the date when Garcia was born. "Beethoven had not yet completed his thirty-seventh year, Schubert was a boy of eight, Auber, Bishop, Charles Burney, Callcott, Cherubini, Dibden, Halévy, 'Papa' Haydn, Meyerbeer, Paganini, Rossini, Spohr, Weber, these were all living, and many of them had yet to become famous. As for Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Brahms, they were not even born; while Gounod, Wagner, and Verdi were still mere schoolboys when Garcia was a full-blown operatic baritone." The list of Garcia's pupils includes nearly all the most famous singers of the nineteenth century, from Jenny Lind and his own sisters, Maria Malibron and Pauline Viardot, to Miss Marie Tempest. His influence upon music was exerted almost entirely through his pupils, many of whom became in turn teachers whose methods are still a force in the musical world. We are told that Garcia disliked the heavy orchestration of Wagner's compositions, but the relations between the two men were cordial. Wagner was so delighted with the way in which his niece's voice improved under Garcia's tuition that he wrote a letter full of the warmest recognition, and twenty-five years later he urged Garcia to undertake the training of the singers for the first Bayreuth Festival. Garcia, who was then over seventy, had to decline owing to his engagements in London. Mr. Mackinlay does not attempt to paint a picture of Garcia's per-

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:
Things Heard and Seen.
By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING.]
MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS WANTED.—£20 each offered. Guy Mannering, 1st edit., 3 vols. 1815, in boards uncut. Thackeray's Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48. Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols., Salisbury, 1766. Walton's Angler, 1653. Paradise Lost, 1667. Lamb's Shakespeare Tales, 2 vols., boards, 1827, 30/- each offered for. Scrope's Salmon Fishing, 1843. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Ireland's Napoleon, 4 vols., coloured plates. Jesse's George Selwyn, 4 vols., 1843. Books with inscriptions written inside by Carlyle, Meredith, Keats, Lamb, &c. All books with coloured plates by Ackerman, &c. Special list of wants free, high prices paid. Please let us know your wants. We can supply everything.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Experts, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.
[Bargain, Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 10 vols., 25/- cost £2 16s. net.]

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD
(Viâ NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the { PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. / OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. / TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the
GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,
London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.;
City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.;
And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Will be ready in a few days.

sonality. His method is discursive and a trifle scrappy, but his book makes an entertaining record of the musical life of the last century, full of lively gossip and anecdote.

* * *

The title of Mr. Percival Hislam's "The Admiralty of the Atlantic" (Longmans, 6s. 6d. net), was suggested by a signal made at Revel six years ago by the German Emperor to the Tsar to the effect that "the Admiral of the Atlantic greets the Admiral of the Pacific." The book claims to be an inquiry into the development of German sea-power—past, present, and prospective—but the past history of the German Navy is dismissed in thirty pages (which are hardly fresh), another thirty are given to its present position, while the remaining one hundred and fifty pages are devoted to future possibilities, and to comparisons between the different navies of the world. Mr. Hislam's work is apparently intended for the general reader rather than for the student of naval affairs. His point of view may be judged from the ingenuous dictum that "the continuance of the present system of free imports into England is vital to German ambitions, a fact which she fully realises, but which has not received by any means its share of attention in this country. . . . The substitution of a tariff would undoubtedly lead to international complications, and possibly to a conflict; but the conflict must come sooner or later, and the sooner it comes the shorter, less costly, and less bloody it will be." We are surprised to find this baseless and pernicious doctrine set forth in a book which purports to be a serious study of naval policy. On the question of the possibility of an invasion of England, Mr. Hislam supports General Maurice's view that with proper precautions we have little to fear from such an attempt "so long as the British navy bears to the German something like its present ratio of superiority." The book will give ordinary readers a rough view of the comparative naval strengths of the Powers, but the author's attitude to Germany is bad. He suggests that she is only waiting for a chance to declare war against us. That is the usual anti-German pose. The anti-British party in Germany takes the same view about this country.

* * *

If the auction prices realised by the pictures of Richard Wilson during the last eighteen years are an index to this painter's popularity, he is still waiting for the public appreciation that his delicate and original talent deserves. The average figure is extremely low. Yet quite recently there has been some slight improvement, and a decided increase of interest on the part of connoisseurs is likely to enhance the market value of his work in the near future. Apart from this matter, however, Mr. Beaumont Fletcher has done good service in writing the artist's biography for "The Makers of British Art" series (Walter Scott, 3s. 6d. net). Certainly the book is less biographical than most of the volumes in the same series, but we get the outstanding details of a career, half sordid and wholly pathetic, that was one long struggle against financial adversity. If the tale is not more complete, it is hardly the author's fault, since the material provided by Wilson's old-time apologists, Allan Cunningham and Thomas Wright, of Norwood, is but scanty, and no modern writer has essayed a "Life" on which to draw. As a critical study, Mr. Fletcher's book has considerable interest. In vindicating Wilson's title to be called the father of English landscape painting, he connects the love of nature and the serene melancholy observable in his art with the Celtism derived from his Welsh origin, and shows how it was that the artist's temperament found its final expression in those classical compositions of Italian landscape with which his name is most intimately associated. Contrasting Wilson with Gainsborough, he considers the former to be a distinctly "objective" painter. This is obviously true in regard to Wilson's portraiture, but, assuming that Mr. Fletcher means by an "objective" landscape a transcript of nature in which individual temperament is subordinated to the point of elimination, we cannot follow him in this estimate of Wilson's landscape. Constable was a far more direct and literal interpreter of nature than Wilson; but one cannot call even Constable "objective." As is usual with this series, the pictures are finely reproduced and the appendices are useful, while these decided advantages are balanced by the raucous blue cover, which is, as ever, a blot upon the book's attractiveness.

The Week in the City.

The stock markets have been rather quiet and stagnant, expecting the Easter vacation, and doubtful about the future of the money market. There is talk of a Russian loan, and the German loan has evidently not been a great success. That a four per cent. loan has only just been covered with the help of the banks shows the nakedness and poverty of the Fatherland in a startling light. But what is still more disconcerting is the fact that Berlin cannot rid itself of the 5½ per cent. bank rate. And yet even with this rate they do not draw gold from London. If the situation were reversed we should all be in a panic. Trade shows no signs of mending anywhere, and few people expect any revival until after the harvest. A good harvest in America might set everything in motion again. As it is, we can only be thankful that things are so much better here than in Germany or the United States, where the natural decline is exaggerated by the artificial conditions produced by tariffs. It is quite heartrending to read the accounts of the misery of the labouring classes in the great towns of Germany and the United States. And in the former the proposed new taxes have created such a panic that the Radical Congress, which represents an important section of the Bloc, has been driven to propose military and naval retrenchment! Some light on the state of things in Hamburg is thrown by the fact that a large London grain company, which is about to go into liquidation, is reported to have lost £70,000 in bad debts in Hamburg alone. One would like to be able to say something cheerful about the commercial outlook, but the truth is that the air is full of failure; and things, in Germany especially, are likely to be worse before they are better.

Germany's Corn Imports.

Fifty years ago Germany was a large exporter of corn. Now she imports considerably, and suffers accordingly in consequence of the heavy tariff. It is estimated that the total requirement of breadstuffs for Germany, for the year 1907-08, will be about 16,200,000 tons. A writer in the "Corn Trade News" has estimated that the crop yield for this year (assuming a normal season) will be 9,842,000 tons of rye, and 4,612,000 tons of wheat. Taking all kinds of grain, he puts the German crop at 14,855,000 tons. There would therefore be 1,345,000 tons to be provided by imports, mainly wheat. Germany on the average imports between 70,000,000 and 85,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. In the last season the wheat crop was unusually poor, and therefore a more than ordinary deficit had to be made up by imports. The record of crops and imports of wheat in metric tons for five years past shows that imports tend to increase rather than to diminish, in spite of the protective tariff. That the total needs of the Empire are nearly 6,000,000 tons of wheat is shown by the following Table:—

Wheat.	Crop.	Imports.	Total Tons.
1906-07 ...	3,939,563 ...	2,003,671 ...	5,943,234
1905-06 ...	3,699,882 ...	2,268,203 ...	5,969,085
1904-05 ...	3,804,828 ...	1,694,724 ...	5,499,552
1903-04 ...	3,555,064 ...	1,915,966 ...	5,471,030
1902-03 ...	3,900,396 ...	1,808,082 ...	5,708,478

How small a part rye plays in the imports of breadstuffs is shown by a second Table, comparing crops and imports for the five-year period. The normal rye needs are 10,000,000 tons a year, while imports do not average more than 400,000 tons:—

Rye.	Crop.	Imports.	Total Tons.
1906-07 ...	9,625,738 ...	269,711 ...	9,895,449
1905-06 ...	9,606,727 ...	460,630 ...	10,067,457
1904-05 ...	10,060,762 ...	251,003 ...	9,809,759
1903-04 ...	9,904,493 ...	195,667 ...	10,100,160
1902-03 ...	9,494,150 ...	757,373 ...	10,251,523

But, unfortunately for the German working-classes, who eat mainly dark-coloured bread made of rye, the rye imports are now usually sufficient to raise the price in the home market by the full amount of the duty.

Lucellum.

To the PROFIT-SHARING SECURED NOTEHOLDERS OF THE UNDERGROUND ELECTRIC RAILWAYS COMPANY OF LONDON, LIMITED.

The Directors of the Underground Electric Railways Company of London, Limited, have carefully considered the best means for meeting the Company's financial requirements, and for dealing with its 5 per Cent. Profit Sharing Secured Notes, which mature 1st June, 1908. The Directors have, in consultation with Messrs. Speyer and with Advisory Committees in London and Amsterdam, formulated a Scheme of readjustment which they, Messrs. Speyer and the Committees, recommend to your consideration and approval.

The main features of the Scheme may be briefly summarised as follows:—

The Company is to create the following securities:—

£1,000,000 5 PER CENT. PRIOR LIEN BONDS to Bearer, due 1st November, 1920.

(Redeemable at par in whole or part, at the Company's option, at any time on six months' notice.)

Principal and interest will be payable in London in Sterling, or at the holder's option in New York at the exchange of $4.86·66 per £, or in Frankfort on Maine at the exchange of Mks. 20.40 per £, or in Amsterdam at the exchange of Fl. 12.12 per £.

Interest will run from the 1st May, 1908, and will be payable half-yearly on the 1st May and 1st November. The rate of interest will be such as to yield a clear 5 per cent. per annum after payment of British income-tax.

The Trust Deed will, under carefully drawn restrictions, empower the Company to issue an additional £250,000 Bonds, ranking pari passu with the other Prior Lien Bonds for the time being outstanding.

The Bonds are to be secured by a first charge upon the collaterals now deposited as security for the Profit Sharing Secured Notes, with an addition of £3,500,000 (nominal) of Shares of the Baker Street and Waterloo, Great Northern, Piccadilly and Brompton, and Charing Cross, Euston and Hampstead Railway Companies, and a charge (without power of sale or foreclosure) on the Company's Power House undertaking, subject to the now authorised Power House First and Second Debenture Issues or any reissue thereof or re-borrowing to redeem such Debentures.

£3,000,000 4½ PER CENT. BONDS OF 1933 to Bearer, due 1st January, 1933.

(Redeemable at par in whole or part, at the Company's option, at any time on six months' notice.)

Principal and interest will be payable in London in Sterling, or at the holder's option in New York at the exchange of $4.86·66 per £, or in Frankfort on Maine at the Exchange of Mks. 20.40 per £, or in Amsterdam at the exchange of Fl. 12.12 per £.

Interest will run from the 1st December, 1907. The first coupon will represent seven months' interest, and will be payable one month after the Scheme becomes binding. Subsequent coupons will be payable half-yearly on the 1st January and 1st July. The rate of interest will be such as to yield a clear 4½ per cent. per annum after payment of British income-tax.

The 4½ per Cent. Bonds will be secured by a charge on the same collaterals as the Prior Lien Bonds, similar to but ranking immediately after the charge of those Bonds.

The Trust Deed will provide, inter alia, that, in the event of four consecutive coupons being at any one time in arrear and unpaid, the charge for securing the 4½ per Cent. Bonds shall become immediately enforceable, in which event the Trustee may and, upon request of bearers of a majority in value of the outstanding amount of such Bonds, shall (subject to the rights of the Prior Lien Bondholders) realise the Stocks and Shares deposited as collateral.

£5,200,000 6 PER CENT. INCOME BONDS to Bearer, due 1st January, 1948.

(Redeemable at par in whole or part, at the Company's option, at any time on six months' notice.)

Principal and interest will be payable in London in Sterling, or at the holder's option in New York at the exchange of $4.86·66 per £, or in Frankfort on Maine at the exchange of Mks. 20.40 per £, or in Amsterdam at the exchange of Fl. 12.12 per £.

The Trust Deed will provide for payment of the interest on the Income Bonds (which is to be non-cumulative) in semi-annual instalments out of the profits of each half-year available for the purpose and remaining after making or providing for all other payments on revenue account for such half-year and setting aside such sums for reserve as the Directors may think expedient. The full rate of interest will be such as to yield a clear 6 per cent. per annum, free of British income-tax.

The holders of the Income Bonds are to be entitled, as far as the law will permit, to attend and vote at all Meetings of the Company, but they are not to vote on any resolution for putting the Company into liquidation. They are to have eleven votes for each £100 of principal of the said Bonds.

TERMS OF CONVERSION.

Noteholders will be asked to exchange their Notes as to 40 per cent. of their nominal value into 4½ per Cent. Bonds of 1933 at par, and as to 70 per cent. of their nominal value into Income Bonds at par, the exchange taking place as on the 1st December, 1907.

The 4½ per Cent. Bonds of 1933 and the Income Bonds given in exchange for those Notes which are payable in United States currency, will be issued in even amounts of Sterling, the exchange being made at the rate of $4.86·66 to the £ sterling, and Scrip will be given for the resulting fractional parts, convertible into new Bonds when presented in amounts of £20 or multiples thereof.

The following table shows the way in which it is proposed to deal with the new securities:—

APPLICATION OF PROPOSED NEW SECURITIES.

	5 per cent. Prior Lien Bonds.	4½ per cent. Bonds of 1933.	6 per cent. Income Bonds.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
To Holders of £3,599 268 9s. 8d. 5 per cent. Profit Sharing Secured Notes ..	—	1,439,707 7 10	2,519,487 18 9
To Holders of 16,550,000 dols. 5 per cent. Profit Sharing Secured Notes (taken at 4·86·66 dols.) ..	—	1,360,292 12 2	2,380,512 1 3
Reserved for Special Interest Fund	—	200,000 0 0	300,000 0 0
Underwritten by Messrs. Speyer and their friends	1,000,000 0 0	—	—
	£1,000,000 0 0	£3,000,000 0 0	£5,200,000 0 0

The Coupon due the 1st December, 1907, on the Notes, and the seven months' interest, due 1st July, 1908, on the 4½ per cent. Bonds of 1933, will be paid in full in cash out of the proceeds of the issue of Prior Lien Bonds.

SPECIAL INTEREST FUND.

The estimated net revenues of the Company would scarcely warrant the Company in undertaking a definite obligation to pay the interest during the first few years on the 4½ per cent. Bonds of 1933, but in order that the Noteholders may not suffer so serious a reduction in their income as would otherwise be the case during the further development of the enterprise, Messrs. Speyer Brothers, of London, Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York, and Mr. Lazard Speyer-Ellissen, of Frankfort on Maine, have by Agreement with the Company dated the 7th April, 1908, undertaken to purchase on or before each 1st January and 1st July, commencing with the 1st January, 1909, such an amount of 4½ per Cent. Bonds and Income Bonds at the price and rate of £300 and accrued interest on the 4½ per Cent. Bonds for £200 (nominal) of 4½ per Cent. Bonds, and £300 (nominal) of Income Bonds (taken together) as will by the proceeds make good any deficiency in the full interest for the preceding half-year on the 4½ per cent. Bonds which the Revenues of the Company to the close of such half-year remaining after making or providing for all payments on revenue account (except interest on the Income Bonds) for the same half-year, but before providing for reserve, are insufficient to meet. Messrs. Speyer, however, stipulate that they are not to be liable under such undertaking for more than £300,000 in all (being the purchase money of £200,000 of 4½ per Cent. Bonds and £300,000 of Income Bonds). The Company are to set aside the purchase money of the said Bonds, and apply it solely for payment of the interest on the 4½ per cent. Bonds.

The Directors are of opinion that the Special Interest Fund of £300,000 will be sufficient to make up any deficiencies down to and including the 1st July, 1912, and that thereafter, if not before, the surplus income of the Company will be sufficient to meet all the Company's fixed charges.

As Messrs. Speyer agree to purchase the above Bonds at the price named from a desire to assist the Company in arranging with the Noteholders, and their agreement to do so is conditional upon the Scheme becoming binding, all Noteholders are urged to accept th Scheme and deposit their Notes under the Deposit Agreement referred to below without delay.

SALE OF PRIOR LIEN BONDS AND APPLICATION OF PROCEEDS.

The proposed issue of £1,000,000 Prior Lien Bonds will be offered to the Noteholders and Shareholders for subscription at the price of £93 per £100 Bond as soon as may be after the Scheme becomes binding, the Bonds to carry interest from the date of payment of the final instalment in each case, and the whole of such proposed issue has been underwritten by Messrs. Speyer and their friends at the foregoing price, conditionally on the Scheme being accepted by the Noteholders and Shareholders and becoming binding.

An Agreement dated 7th April, 1908, has been entered into between Messrs. Speyer Brothers, Messrs. Speyer & Co., Mr. Lazard Speyer-Ellissen, and Messrs. Teixeira de Mattos Bros., all therein referred to as "the Readjustment Managers," of the first part, those holders of Profit Sharing Secured Notes who deposit their Notes under that Agreement, of the second part, and the Depositaries referred to below of the third part. This Agreement provides for the deposit of Notes for the purpose of better ensuring the carrying of the Scheme. The Directors, however, reserve the right to decide whether, in view of the number of Notes deposited under this Agreement or otherwise, they are justified in proceeding with the Scheme.

DEPOSIT OF NOTES.

Noteholders are invited to deposit their Notes, under the terms of the foregoing Agreement, on or before the 1st May, 1908, with one or other of the following Depositaries, viz.:—

The London & Westminster Bank, Limited, Lothbury, London, E.C.;

The Guaranty Trust Company of New York, No. 28, Nassau Street, New York;

The Associatie Cassa, Amsterdam;

Or with Mr. Lazard Speyer-Ellissen, Frankfort on Maine, as Agent for the first-named Depositary.

Under the above Deposit Agreement negotiable receipts for the deposited Notes will be issued by the respective Depositaries, which, if the Scheme becomes binding with or without modification, will be exchanged in due course for the new securities mentioned above, stamped with the British Stamp duty where necessary. If the Scheme does not become binding, receipt holders are, on being so requested by advertisement, to surrender their receipts and withdraw the Notes and coupons represented thereby (or a like amount of Notes and coupons).

Owing to there being no other means of binding a dissentient minority of the Noteholders, it is intended to proceed with the scheme under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870.

Copies of the complete Circular (of which this notice is only a synopsis), to which the Deposit Agreement and the full Scheme are scheduled, may be obtained at the Offices of the Company in London, or at the Offices of the above-mentioned Readjustment Managers, where copies of the Agreement as to the Special Interest Fund can also be inspected.

By order of the Board,

W. E. MANDELICK,
Secretary.

14th April, 1908.

Referring to the foregoing Notice, the undersigned recommend to the Noteholders the prompt acceptance of the Company's proposals, and urge them to deposit their Notes on or before 1st May, 1908, with one or other of the Depositaries mentioned in the foregoing Notice.

As the Company's Circular contains further information of importance to the Noteholders, they are advised to obtain copies thereof at the Office of either of the undersigned.

SPEYER BROTHERS.
SPEYER & CO.

LONDON AND NEW YORK.
14th April, 1908.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5.9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.

Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

RUGBY SCHOOL.

THE EXAMINATION FOR SCHOLARSHIPS

Will Begin MONDAY, JUNE 1st.

Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of College life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been Opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters," Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Ten Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years at the College, will be awarded on the results of an Examination to be held from June 29th to July 4th, 1908. Names must be entered before May 30th. The College prepares Students for London Degrees and also for certain of the Oxford Honour Examinations. Inclusive fee, £100 a year.

For forms of entry and further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class: Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

NEXT TERM, MAY 1st.

ST. GEORGE'S PUBLIC CO-EDUCATIONAL SCHOOL,

HARPENDEN, HERTS.

Headmaster—The REV. CECIL GRANT, M.A.

The next Term begins on Thursday, May 7th.

For prospectus and full particulars apply to The CO-EDUCATIONAL PUBLIC SCHOOLS TRUST, LTD., 41, Moorgate Street, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Car Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

By the Author of "The Opportunity of Liberalism."

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

The Manchester Guardian says: "Mr. Villiers's book does just what such a history ought to do—sets out clearly the main facts and personalities, but does not load the story with minutiæ, giving the main attention to a spirited account of the stream of tendencies which have expressed themselves in the more definite socialistic movement."

The Scotsman says: "Thoughtful, clearly written, and wel based in the study of the severer socialistic literature, of whicl it provides a useful bibliography, the work cannot but prov of interest to readers in search of an introduction, at onc informative and sympathetic, to this important subject."

THE STANDARD LIBRARY OF HISTORY.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS.

NEW VOLUME READY.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

(B.C. 29—A.D. 476.)

By H. STUART JONES, M.A. With Maps and many other Illustrations. 5s.

A complete list of the Volumes in the Story of the Nations, the greatest historical library in the world, will be sent post free on application to T. Fisher Unwin, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

PORTUGAL.

By H. MORSE STEPHENS, M.A. New Edition. With a new chapter dealing with the most recent events, by Major MARTIN HUME, and 5 new Illustrations, including Portraits of the late King and Crown Prince and the new King. 5s. (Nations series.)

HISTORY OF IRELAND TO THE COMING OF HENRY II.

By ARTHUR UA CLERIGH, M.A., K.C. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

This volume is complete in itself. It is a record of Irish history from the earliest times to 1171.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

A Record of his Life and Work.

By his Daughter, HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With an account of his Parliamentary Struggle, Politics, and Teachings, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON, M.P. New and Cheaper Edition. With New Introductory Chapter. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. Uniform with Mr. Morley's "Life of Richard Cobden."

LIFE OF GOETHE.

By HEINRICH DUNTZER. With Authentic Illustrations and Facsimiles. Cheap Edition. Cloth 2s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Charles Bradlaugh."

HISTORY OF CIVILISATION.

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 5s. net each.

Vol. I. HISTORY OF ANCIENT CIVILISATION.
Vol. II. HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL CIVILISATION.

A concise review of the development of European civilisation since the downfall o the Roman Empire.

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM: A Reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X.

Translated from the Italian by FATHER TYRRELL. 5s. net.

"Amidst the quickly growing mass of literature dealing with the Modernist Movement in the Roman Catholic Church, this little volume may, without hesitation, be singled out as the best source of information for those who want to know the facts in brief."—Manchester Guardian.

WILD HONEY FROM VARIOUS THYME.

By MICHAEL FIELD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"'Wild Honey' is one of the most delightful books that the last ten years have given us, and should be read by every lover of poetry."—The Academy.

THE CANADIAN KIPLING.

THE SONGS OF A SOURDOUGH.

By ROBERT W. SERVICE. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"In 'Songs of a Sourdough' Mr. Service has got nearer to the heart of the old-time-place miner than any other verse-maker in all the length and height of the great Dominion."—The Morning Post.

MY LIFE IN THE OPEN.

By WILL H. OGILVIE, Author of "Fair Girls and Grey Horses." With an Introduction and a Portrait. 5s. net.

Vital impressions of open-air life in many parts of the world.

BRITISH BIRD LIFE.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, M.B.O.U., F.R.H.S. With an Introduction by SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., and over 50 Illustrations. Cheap Edition, 3s. 6d.

Popular sketches of every species of bird which regularly nests in the British Isles.

LAST HOURS WITH NATURE.

By MRS. BRIGHTWEN. Edited by W. H. CHESSON Profusely Illustrated. Cloth 2s. 6d. net.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT

Readers of The Nation will be interested in seeing a list of books written by members of the New Parliament.

Published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY.
"The Life of Richard Cobden."

Mr. JOHN BURNS.
In "Labour and Protection."

Mr. R. B. HALDANE.
"Army Reform."

Mr. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.
In "The Johnson Club Papers."

Mr. W. RUNCIMAN.
In "British Industries under Free Trade

Mr. C. F. G. MASTERMAN.
"In Peril of Change," and
"The Heart of the Empire."

ORIENTAL CAMPAIGNS AND EUROPEAN FURLOUGHS.

The Autobiography of an Indian Mutiny Veteran.

By Col. EDWIN MAUDE, late H.M. 2nd (Leinster Regiment. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"We have thoroughly enjoyed every page of these reminiscences of an ol soldier."—Daily Graphic.

CRIMINAL APPEAL AND EVIDENCE.

By N. W. SIBLEY, B.A., LL.M., Joint Author of "Inter national Law as interpreted during the Russo-Japanese War," 15s. net.

"Mr. Sibley's work is so exhaustive that its adoption as a text book b students may be confidently recommended."—Journal of Commerce.

HEALTH AT ITS BEST v. CANCER AND OTHER DISEASES.

By ROBERT BELL, M.B., M.D., F.F.P.S. 5s. net.

"A book to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest."—The Referee.

THE MOTOR CAR AND ITS ENGINE

A Practical Treatise for Motor Engineers, includin owners and chauffeurs.

By JOHN BATEY. Cloth, 5s. net.

SPECIAL EDITION.

THE MERMAID SERIES.

THE BEST PLAYS OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

LITERAL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE OLD TEXT

With Photogravure Frontispieces.

A complete list of volumes and particulars of the specia editions in preparation will be sent post free to any address o application to T. FISHER UNWIN, Adelphi Terrace, London.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London, W.C.

THE NATION, with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 4.] SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
The Diary of the Week	105
Politics and Affairs:—
Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman	108
Idealism in Politics	109
A Vision of New Toryism	111
The Peril in the Balkans	112
Some Abuses of Club Life	114
Life and Letters:—
The Economics of Tipping	115
The Child's Fetish	116
Sharing. By K....	117
The Tyranny of the Clock	118
Short Story:—
The Death of the Rich Man. By Padraic Colum	119
Art:—
Pictures at the Paris Salon	120
Communications:—
Mr. McKenna's Opportunity. By One who Knows...	121
Letters to the Editor:—
Martial Law in Natal. By George Greenwood, M.P.	123
The "Crux" in "The Tempest." By E. W. Lummis	123
The Garrotting Fallacy. By Criminologist	124
"The Practical Reconstruction of Country Life." By J. Frome Wilkinson	124
"The Merchant of Venice," at His Majesty's Theatre. By H. V. R.	124
Protection and Unemployment. By Forrest Hewit...	125
Women and the Suffrage. By B. C. S. and A. Kelly	125
Poetry:—
The Forsaken Room. By J. Marjoram	125
The World of Books	126
Books to be Read	126
Reviews:—
The England of Domesday. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb	128
A Master in Israel	130
Arab and Greek...	132
Two Novels of Domestic Life	134
Books in Brief:—
The King's General in the West	136
The Cave Boy	136
The Week in the City	136

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman died without pain at a quarter past nine on Wednesday, after a period of unconsciousness. He was in his seventy-second year and had been for forty years continuously a member of the House of Commons. Till within a few days of his death, he was at once its leader and its "Father," his association stretching back to the first Gladstone Government. He had borne his long illness with the courage which was his outstanding and ennobling quality, and had fought for life with the full knowledge that the battle might go against him. We have endeavoured to describe his work and personality elsewhere, but we think we may say here that of late his most profound feeling and source of public anxiety were on the score of Ireland. His desire to aid the cause of nationality was so strong that at a time when his illness had assumed the gravest symptoms, and when it seemed impossible to postpone Mr. Redmond's motion on Home Rule, he insisted that he must join in the debate, against the urgent counsel of his doctors, and with the knowledge that an attempt to rise from his sick bed and to speak in the House of Commons might instantly be fatal. Mr. Birrell's illness averted this heroic decision. We may further add that the common notion of Sir Henry's great wealth was erroneous. He was not a man of very large possessions, though he gave generously to many public objects. He was in private life an example of amiability, of a serenity of mind and temper, which no public tumult could ruffle. He thus bestowed and received affection, and both in rich measure. He was singularly free from the vanity or the selfishness of public life; so that, though he won the attachment of the outer world, those who knew him best will mourn him most.

* * *

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman is to be buried at Meigle, which is close to his Scottish seat, on Tuesday, and a funeral service will be held in Westminster Abbey at noon on Monday. The King and Queen, now absent in Copenhagen, and other members of the Royal Family, have sent messages of condolence, which have been especially warm in view of the singular affection which was entertained for him by most of the members of the Royal House. Since the days of Lord Beaconsfield, no Prime Minister has been so popular with Royalty, a relationship which was maintained without any practice or suggestion of the courtier's art. The tone of the Opposition Press has been notably warm, "The Times" describing Sir Henry "as a power for peace and reconciliation," and happily quoting Lockhart's phrase that public life was to him "an extension of the hearth." The feeling abroad and in the Colonies has been not less sympathetically expressed. The Radical German papers claim him especially as an "idealist" and a friend of international peace. Votes of condolence were carried unanimously in both Houses of the Cape Parliament, Mr. Merriman, the Premier, declaring that the unification of South Africa, if it were accomplished, would be his work. General Botha, in a message to the "Daily Chronicle," telegraphed that "in making it possible for the two races to live and work together harmoniously he has laid the foundations of a united South Africa." The Ministry of the Orange Colony have sent special messages of condolence.

* * *

The result of the Manchester election will be known by the time that The Nation is in the hands of its readers. The contest has been fought with unexampled energy, and, though the method has been popular, it has been more intellectual and less sensational than the saturnalia of Peckham. Mr. Churchill has secured the votes of the Jews, of a body of Manchester merchants who adhere to Free Trade, and of those Irish Catholics who decline to be led by their priests, who, in their turn, follow the strong Conservative bias of the English Catholic Bishops. This choice has been determined by Mr. Churchill's notable declaration on Home Rule. Speaking "with the full confidence of the Prime Minister," he said that the "Liberal Party should claim full authority and a free hand to deal with the problem of Irish self-government without being restricted to mere measures of devolution of the character of the Irish Council Bill." On this declaration Mr. Redmond and Mr. T. P. O'Connor advised the Irish to vote in his favour, since they had "elicited a declaration, on the authority of the Prime Minister, that Home Rule, in the sense of Mr. Redmond's resolution, will be put before the Government by the electors at the general election." Mr. Lloyd George, in the course of an electric speech, remarkable for its sustained brilliancy of spirit and phrasing, also stated that Old Age Pensions would be conceded within a twelvemonth. The chief factors hostile to Mr. Churchill have been the unscrupulous use made of the rise in the price of coal and bread, the organisation of the liquor interest, the work of suffragettes and friends of the barmaids, coupled with the inevitable loss of votes which active Governments sustain. The correspondent of "The Times," in a careful review of the situation on the eve of the poll, thinks that the most dangerous element is the candidature of Mr. Irving, the doctrinaire Socialist, and concludes that if he polls well Mr. Churchill must lose. Should this be the case, revolutionary Socialism will merely have played its accustomed part in British politics of taking a back seat in the reactionist procession.

* * *

Mr. Runciman has been re-elected for Dewsbury by a majority of 1,516. His majority at the General Election was 3,810. The contest, like that at North-West Manchester, was three-cornered. The Liberal poll has fallen by 1,170 votes, that of the Labor candidate, Mr. Turner, by 183 votes, that of the Conservative-Protectionist has risen by 1,124. The Free Trade majority is still overwhelming, for both Liberalism and Labor based their appeal upon it, and the abnormal conditions of 1906 cannot, of course, be maintained. But some breach has been made in the Liberal strength. The topics of the election were all domestic—trade, unemployment, liquor reform; and the Labor opposition was pointed by some sharp criticisms by Mr. Runciman of the Unemployed Bill. But it is significant that, as we have often urged, Liberalism and Labor tend to decline, if they do decline, together, and one does not gain at the expense of the other.

* * *

Italy commenced a naval demonstration against Turkey to compel her to consent to the establishment of Italian post-offices in the five Turkish towns in which the other Powers have them. The demonstration was cancelled on Monday, when Turkey yielded, reserving, however, the right to take future action against the whole system of foreign post-offices on Turkish territory. There can be no doubt that Italy's object was political rather than commercial, and the Turkish objections were also political. The foreign post-offices are extensions of the doctrine of extra-territoriality, which is obnoxious because a limitation of Turkish sovereignty. Italy is pressing other claims in connection with Tripoli, and her energy in pushing her private interests is no doubt calculated to stir the Concert to emulation, and to inspire the Turkish Government with a fuller consciousness of its moral inferiority to the Western Powers.

* * *

The Mohmands to the north of the Kabul River and the Khaiber are threatening trouble. They are reported to have gathered 10,000 tribesmen, and they have sniped some posts. The Mohmands have been restless since the Zakkha Khel expedition, which they, no doubt, regarded as the beginning of a movement to bring the frontier tribes under administrative control. The Indian Government has concentrated a large force, but is obviously not anxious for another expedition, especially as the weather is very hot. The Mohmands themselves should not prove a very serious nut to crack. The country is more accessible than that south of the Khaiber, and the tribes inferior fighting material. On the other hand, they are very near the Afghan frontier, and complications with Afghanistan might well arise if the Amir's subjects, as in 1897, were to assist the Mohmands. It is to be hoped that an expedition will not be necessary, otherwise it is only too likely that another nail may be put into the coffin of the Curzon frontier settlement.

The National Union, which represents between six and seven thousand of elementary school teachers, has made an interesting contribution to the movement for educational peace. On Monday it passed a resolution at its Conference at Hastings, asking the Government to call a conference with the view to a compromise before proceeding with their Bill. The special position of the teachers was stated by their President, Mr. Nicholls, who objected to the McKenna Bill because it established contracting-out and thus vetoed a national system, and to the St. Asaph Bill because it set up the right of entry in public schools. His own scheme was a general form of simple religious teaching within school hours, given by the teachers, and supplemented by special doctrinal teaching in voluntary schools. This was to be given an hour before and after the school day, when the school-house would be at the disposal of the trustees, free of charge and properly warmed, cleaned, and lighted. The same facilities were to be offered in the evenings and on Saturdays and Sundays. Personally, we prefer such a settlement either to the McKenna or the St. Asaph Bill. In any case, we hope that the conference, if it comes, will not be confined to "priests" and "presbyters," and that representatives of the teachers will be admitted to it. It will not do to admit that English public education is merely a matter for clerical arrangement.

* * *

Three Treaties were signed on Thursday. The first is the Arbitration Treaty between England and the United States, which we have already described. It is limited both as to subjects and as to an express reservation of the power of the American Senate, which has now resisted the Irish hostility that proved fatal to the Treaty negotiated by Lord Salisbury. The other two Treaties guarantee the status quo in the North Sea and the Baltic in the interest of the smaller sea-side States. All the documents, therefore, tend to peace. Under the North Sea Treaty, Denmark and Holland receive a guarantee against aggression from Great Britain, Germany, and France. Under the Baltic agreement Sweden, while losing the protective Treaty of 1855, receives, with Denmark, a guarantee from Russia and Germany, both Baltic Powers. We imagine that the Aland Islands are made safe, and that there is no question of the Baltic becoming a "closed sea." Otherwise Great Britain could never have assented to the Treaty.

* * *

The Duma has passed by an overwhelming majority the Bill for the building of the Amur railway. The new line will link Vladivostok with Transbaikalia by a northern route remote from the Japanese outposts, and running through Russian territory only. It will traverse a frozen region without a future; it will cost some £50,000,000; and it will be of no strategical value until the Transiberian line is doubled; but the reactionary Duma prefers to waste money on perilous Imperialistic ventures to tackling the thorny land question. Another indication of its temper is given by the recommendation of the Defence Committee to introduce the Russian conscription system into Finland. Negotiations are on foot to form a bloc of the Moderate Right, the Octobrists, and the Cadets against the extreme Right and extreme Left. They have failed so far, and it is not obvious what the Cadets could do in such company. The Czar has signified his passion for reform by pardoning Gurko, the Assistant Minister of the Interior, who was found guilty last year of embezzling the money voted for the starving peasants. The appearance in the "Revue des deux Mondes" and the "Preussische Jahrbücher" of inspired articles on Russia's finances, points to a new appeal to the loan market at no distant date.

* * *

The Congo debate began in the Belgian Chamber on Wednesday, when only a little preliminary skirmishing was indulged in. The Socialists proposed that the question of annexation should be referred to the nation, and the Premier replied that there was no constitutional provision for the referendum, though it is worth noting that the "Morning Post" some days ago announced that a special session would be given to the Congo after the elections. The opponents of annexation are very active. The Socialists in conference last Sunday condemned it on any conditions, and they have been driving home to the Belgian people its responsibilities certain and probable.

* * *

Some significant movements have taken place during the week in the practical politics of British Socialist parties. On the one hand, the Social Democratic Federation, which met in conference at Manchester, has rejected by 130 votes to 30 a resolution of fusion with the Independent Labour Party, moved on the ground that both bodies were now equally committed to doctrinaire Socialism. The resolution of fusion received, however, a rather notable convert in the veteran Mr. Hyndman, hitherto a resolute opponent of union. On the other hand, Mr. Irving, the Socialist candidate in North-West Manchester, lacks the support of the advanced Labour members, and Mr. Wells writes an open letter to the "Daily News," declaring that Mr. Irving merely represents "the extreme, old-fashioned, and implacable type of Socialist theory, limited, doctrinaire, and cantankerous"; while, on the other hand, Mr. Churchill's position was in harmony "with the spirit of our movement." He therefore recommended reasonable Socialists to vote for the Liberal candidate, so as to secure, among other ends, a Socialist answer to gross misrepresentations of Socialism by candidates like Mr. Joynson-Hicks.

* * *

The founding of Quebec by Champlain, its first Governor, three hundred years ago, and the beginning of modern Canadian history, are to be commemorated by a great celebration in which Great Britain, Canada, and France are happily and properly joined. The special feature of the festival is to be the purchase by the Canadian people of land on the Heights of Abraham, where Wolfe fought the battle which decided the destinies of Canada. The hero who won, the hero who lost, and both heroes who died, are united in the proposed memorial, and a French squadron will be present in the celebration, in token of one of the most brilliant and stainless passages in French colonial development. An executive committee, headed by Lord Midleton, invites subscriptions, which are to be handed to the Canadian Committee by the Prince of Wales, when he attends the ceremony next July. They should be sent to the Wolfe and Montcalm Memorial Account, at the Bank of England.

* * *

One of the greatest feats of Western statesmanship and administration in Eastern lands was terminated on Wednesday, when Sir Robert Hart, for forty-five years Inspector-General of Maritime Customs in China, left Peking. Sir Robert's organisation of the Imperial customs, which involved practically the maintenance of the foreign trade of China, had not only the qualities of ability and perfect probity, which nearly all such European services to the East possess, but it was achieved in sympathy and in co-operation with the people and the Government that it benefited. Sir Robert has for nearly half-a-century been at once the most powerful and the most trusted European in China. He opposed the thoughtless and reckless policy of exploitation which ended in the Boxer rising and the joint war. It is interesting to read the tribute to his character of the Shun-tien Shih-pao, a leading Chinese newspaper in Peking. "Never," it says, "has the employment of a foreign statesman been so fruitful of success in the world's history. Such long-maintained trust, such faith growing deeper and deeper on one side, such generous affection and sustained diligence on the other—these marvellous results may well leave one speechless." This is a rare tribute from the East to the West.

* * *

Mr. Morley has made a careful and judicious selection for the Bishopric of Bombay. The new Bishop, Mr. Palmer, is a scholar and tutor of Balliol, and as he was a Craven scholar, and obtained a first both in "Mods" and in "Greats," Mr. Morley may claim to have revived an almost dying tradition of scholarship in the episcopacy. Mr. Palmer has also Liberal tendencies in thought and in social interests. We note that the "Times," in its balanced view of the late Prime Minister's career, praises his ecclesiastical appointments, and suggests the well-known fact that they were largely influenced by the Primate's advice. We cannot, however, agree that this was a strong point in Sir Henry's dispensation of patronage. Some two or three minor appointments have been good, but no one can say that the nominations to the Bishoprics of Newcastle and Chichester added strength of mind or character to the English Episcopate.

* * *

The "Shakespeare Memorial Committee" has issued a statement in which it rejects the plan of a national theatre, and adheres to its design of an "architectural and symbolical monument," but suggests that it has under consideration, as a "subsidiary project," the idea of a "Shakespeare theatre." This may seem to be some concession to public opinion, but we would point out that the Committee itself has no right or power to speak for the nation, least of all to commit it to an artistic enterprise which is doomed to failure. The signatories of the letter to the "Times," this (Friday) morning do not include a single living British writer of the first eminence. They do not comprise one dramatic author, or critic, and only two Shakespearian writers of consequence. The presence of sculptors and architects on such a body is, at this stage, a grave disadvantage, rather than a merit; and the primary design of the Committee, as to which they have strangely committed themselves in the selection of a site, is open to every kind of objection. The Committee carries no weight, and we hope that subscriptions will be rigorously withheld from it.

* * *

The large exhibition of paintings by Mr. H. A. Olivier at the Grafton Galleries has for its principal features a series of twenty-four portraits of the Princes of Central India. As regards political importance, the most conspicuous exhibit is the portrait of H.H. Maharaja Madho Rao Sindhia, the Hindu chief of Gwalior, whose State is one of the largest in India; while another full-length picture of great interest is that of the veteran H.H. Maharaja Pratap Singh, of Orchha. Mr. Olivier works in the direct manner of Mr. Ouless and Mr. Cope, and may be congratulated both on the character he has imparted to most of his subjects' faces and on the detailed workmanship of their accoutrements

Politics and Affairs.

SIR HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.

The death of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman is an event which, though it possesses no element of tragedy, has greatly touched the people of these islands. Affection does not readily flow to public men, for most conspicuous service in the field of human action tends to harden character, and those whom we most deeply mourn have not as a rule held traffic on the greater ways of life. But now and then statesmen and national leaders, such as William of Orange, Fox, Garibaldi, Lincoln, suggest, in their leaving, a feeling more intimate than that which usually accompanies the passing of the great. One reason is that a part of their personality seems to consist of the home-spun stuff of which, happily, the social fabric is mainly composed. Of such a character was the late Prime Minister. He made no pretence to greatness, and, despising the watchful vanity that attends on and half ruins public life, disliked and distrusted those who used language of undue praise concerning his gifts and achievements. Of his limitations he was fully aware, and he probably did less than justice to the qualities of insight and wise detachment of mind which eventually secured him his surprising success as a political chieftain. He preferred to be thought a plain man among plain men, and in this preference, and in the strain of genial warmth which was inseparable from his nature, lies, we imagine, one explanation of the great popularity which he finally secured. He was liked as, for example, Gladstone was never liked, though he had to fight much the same kind of battle against an excited public opinion, basing itself on patriotic feeling and national interest, and though, during his two years of Premiership, he carried advanced legislation, and attacks on privileged bodies like the House of Lords, farther than any previous Liberal leader had done. But these things did not appear to count against him in the favour even of moderate men, any more than his deposition of the Duke of Cambridge affected his friendship with that much-aggrieved soldier. The passing storms of aversion from which his Government suffered seemed to leave him almost untouched.

Sir Henry's death will not be felt less heavily by his countrymen because he did not actually die Prime Minister of Great Britain, and his removal no longer affects the material calculations of our politics. For his career has left a deep impression on our times, and has permanently affected both the fortunes of his own party and the general aspect of British government. In resigning power when he felt himself unable to wield it, he acted in harmony with his character, and with the conception of leadership to which he firmly adhered. He came to the rescue of Liberalism when it was a mere hulk, floating captainless and rudderless on the waste of waters. When he had given it its proper force and direction, he was willing to surrender the chief post into the hands of another. He told the present writer that he had no desire to be Prime Minister, and was willing to serve under Lord Spencer. But when his captaincy involved the existence of his party, and an unstable but attractive personality was beckoning it along the way to destruction, he showed the utmost tenacity, both of political purpose and of his own position. For a considerable time he had not more than fifty men in the House of Commons on whom he could rely. Intrigue and half-heartedness had reduced the fighting power of Parliamentary Liberalism to its lowest point when he made the famous Leicester speech, which, though its immediate effect was the establishment of the Liberal League, really expunged the policy of the "clean slate," and scattered to the winds a combination based on disregard of the historic purpose of Liberalism, and an inability to divine and pursue the sources of its future strength. We know what would have happened if Lord Rosebery had even temporarily succeeded. Not a place would have been found in present-day politics for a shadowy form of Whiggery, cut off from the humanitarian traditions of the old Whig Party, and based merely on uncritical fear of a passing phase of opinion. It was in this crisis that "C. B." insisted on a formal renewal of his own mandate, and flatly declined to wipe a single measure, or ideal, or aspiration out of the Liberal programme. The issue of the quarrel was decided when the leader who had borne the heat and burden of the day called "Forward," while the leader who had kept his tent while the battle raged most fiercely cried "Back." Gladstone's genius continually enriched and renewed the moral resources of Liberalism. It was reserved for an inferior intelligence, but a character of rare strength and integrity, to save it from absolute bankruptcy.

Such resolutions test the reins of men and constitute the final qualification for leadership. Mr. Balfour, with a great majority at his back, made the clever man's mistake throughout the Parliament of 1900 of reckoning with every leader of the Liberal Party save the personage who, on account of his toughness of fibre and essential power of temperament, decreed the Tory downfall. In the following intellectual work of the Parliamentary Opposition "C. B." did not bear the supreme part. He was neither a great Parliamentary orator nor a master of intellectual fence. He was content to leave to others the detailed work of safeguarding Free Trade, just as, when Prime Minister, he took a less conspicuous part in the work of devising Bills and resolutions than his successor, Mr. Asquith. But more than any of his colleagues he discerned and elaborated the true answer to Mr. Chamberlain's policy of Protection. Many Liberals were for preaching Free Trade and Free Trade only. "C. B." saw that that was a mere form of Conservatism, fatal to Liberalism. So he insisted on linking the defence of Free Trade with social reform. He accepted Mr. Chamberlain's statements of the weak points in our social organism, and pressed them into the service of a constructive social policy. By this means he retained in being a party that could alone save the essential principles of external commerce and interior welfare. "C. B.'s" glory was to maintain a solid and eventually a disciplined force at the time when counsels of disruption were tendered so deftly and persuasively that they looked like an invitation to enter a new Land of Promise. When this thrifty forethought bore its inevitable fruit, no other uniting personality presented itself but his own. It was vain to suppose that the man who had led the party to power could not lead it in the Commons. For a moment Sir Henry wavered, and was only induced to remain in the representative House by his wife's firm persuasion. His decision proved to be the final and indispensable link in the business of cementing the party that emerged from the General Election of 1906.

For it is clear that no one but he could have established a proper and promising relationship between Liberalism and Labour. The present Prime Minister is, we believe, perfectly capable of maintaining and strengthening that association, and the confidence established between him and his predecessor is of good augury for the success of the new departure. But two years ago, it was a question even more of a personality than a policy. A new situation had arisen; it was for Liberalism to choose whether it would go forward with the democratic movement and its new representative, the Labour Party, or sink back to party conventionalism, and eventually to Conservatism, abandoning on the way Home Rule, and the case for forlorn or struggling causes in nations and classes, and abruptly disowning all association or sympathy with tentative or meliorist Socialism. The late Premier's demeanour and ways of life, the attraction which plain men felt for a "russet-coated captain," who kept in closer touch with the inner life of the House of Commons than Prime Ministers are wont to maintain, and who, middle-class as he was, shared not a few ideals and beliefs common to workmen-politicians of nearly all shades of democratic opinion, secured a half-conscious but real advance of Liberalism towards the new propaganda and the new party. "C. B." did not provide an exact and formal means of approach or contact between Liberalism and visions of a State fashioned on more or less co-operative lines. But he kept the ground open, and Mr. Asquith reaps in this respect what his predecessor has sown. Moreover, his courage and firm grasp of principle came to the rescue on important occasions, and secured him in Cabinet the dominance which he maintained through his unrivalled ascendency in the House of Commons. Without his personal intervention we doubt whether South Africa would have had self-government in a form which would have secured the great political aim of acceptance by the Dutch community. Thus, at a stroke, he wiped out the worst leavings of the war, and truly made South Africa one. Just as he stoutly defended the truth and appositeness of his phrase "methods of barbarism," so he literally fulfilled his pledges to make South Africa a free dominion under the British flag. An intellect which thus went surely to the heart of things was not contemptible; it was, indeed, a more truly serviceable gift than the sceptical and wavering intelligence, occupied always with the outworks of thought, of Mr. Balfour. The human gift of tact came in to reinforce "C. B.'s" clearness of view and directness of temperament and character. In all his successes, half social and half political, the art of the late Prime Minister was half the art which conceals art, and half the spontaneous bent of his own nature. In spite of some strong prepossessions on army matters, he was usually a Radical, and always a democrat. His dislike of privilege was, indeed, less intellectual than moral and instinctive.

However, it is not easy to fix the mind purely on the public services of a man who, though he has died within a few days of surrendering the practical government of the British Empire, was so amiable and so widely beloved as Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Humanity comes before politics, and a peculiar grace surrounds a personality that attains to great power and yet, as we have said, commends itself especially by its appeal to the hearts of his fellows. The late Prime Minister was such a man, and in this respect is distinguished from nearly all the figures who have attained to great political authority in recent times, with the exception of a popular leader whose name we have already used, Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln was, indeed, a masterful and a magical figure, and neither in intellectual greatness nor in magnitude of achievement can any comparison lie between him and the statesman whose body reposes in Downing Street. But a certain quality of homeliness and friendliness unites them. Both were of simple origin. Both served long in adversity. Both had unpopular causes to defend. Both possessed gifts of humour and shrewd judgment, joined to steadfastness of opinion and essential simplicity of character. Both were able to measure and to welcome new forces in political life, and preferred to look to the common affections of mankind rather than to rely on the favour of the rich and the powerful. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, in particular, hated the things which the poor have most reason to hate—such as war, and the business, which precedes war, of exciting nations against each other. Such statesmen represent and uphold essentially moral forces in public life, for they encourage the lowly to believe that, in spite of the formidable examples of supreme force joined to contempt of, or indifference to, the average lot, government may sometimes devolve on men who feel for them, and would fain refashion the world to suit a better time than ours.

IDEALISM IN POLITICS.

Where to find the extreme politician is a problem suggested by some recent events in the Socialist world. To the genuine country Tory, the mild Liberalism of a very average Liberal condidate breathes of revolution and nothing less. This very Liberal perhaps finds some nominal colleagues a good deal too advanced for himself, and is daily conscious of a party of reckless extremists outside his own world, who profess the creed of Labour. That there could possibly be any one more extreme than Mr. Keir Hardie is a suggestion which he would scout as inconceivable. But if he will look at the reports of the Social Democratic Congress, held at the end of last week in Manchester, he will see Mr. Keir Hardie and his friends treated as moderates, if not as backsliders, while the pure milk of the word is claimed for the Social Democratic Federation alone. We should be surprised if the Social Democrats, in their turn, are not fated to be denounced as mealy-mouthed moderates, trucklers to capital, ready to compromise and subordinate principle to expediency, by some Anarchist congress; and if we could get inside the Anarchist world we should probably find a similar schism between the opportunist, who only wants to blow people up when there is a prospect of gaining something by it, and the real puritan of the movement, who is for the bomb always and everywhere. The question between the moderate and the extremist is largely one of perspective. Anybody who is more than one degree removed from the speaker is relegated to the extremes. His left-hand man goes a little too far, and his right-hand comrade is too cautious. But both are "reasonable" people, with whom he can discuss matters. The man beyond them on either side is quite a different being. He is an immovable reactionary, or an impracticable idealist. Meanwhile, every group is lumped together by people at a still greater distance as forming a single school. The divergences which within the group are matters of such lively and sensitive consciousness, disappear entirely in the bird's eye view. To the True Blue mind the mild being may be barely distinguishable as a separate entity, but everyone beyond him is at once Socialist, Anarchist, and Atheist, bent on destroying the throne, the altar, and the home with dynamite and "marching through rapine and ruin" to the dismemberment of society.

We do not suppose that the True Blue mind is capable of noticing, still less of being affected, by the attitude of any such body as the Social Democratic Federation. But the more reflective moderate man may see in it something of a counterpoise to the Hull resolution which alarmed him some time ago. That resolution seemed to identify the Labour Party with Socialism, and indeed, on the strength of that resolution, the wiser heads among the Social Democrats inclined to an affiliation with the Labour Party, which might have restored their Federation to a real niche, if a small one, in the political structure. But the Federation as a whole would have nothing of it. The Labour Party is tainted with Parliamentarism. It is even accused of desiring social reform. Its remedies for unemployment, which made some of us open our eyes the other day, are altogether too namby pamby. It is suspected of compromise and practicality. Shall the Free Socialist of the pure blood be accused of such things? Shall we deal with the accursed thing, existing society? Shall we be suspected of desiring to reform that which must be destroyed root and branch? Perish the thought! Pure Socialism wraps itself up in its virtue, and keeps itself unspotted from the world.

The little incident is the more interesting because Mr. Wells, Mr. "Brougham Villiers," and others, have been explaining to us recently that the distinguishing feature of modern Socialism is the abandonment of the impracticable attitude. Socialism, we have learnt, was in the hands of Marx a rigid mechanical system very logical and coherent within, but incapable of adapting itself to the actual world. Partly through the action of the Fabians, but mainly through the actual rise of a Labour Party as a political force, a great change has gradually come about. Socialism remains an ideal, perhaps not so clear and concise an ideal as it was, but still an intelligible ideal, but it is quite clearly and explicitly recognised that it is an ideal into which modern society has to grow. There is to be no catastrophic change. There is to be evolution proceeding through rational persuasion, and the appeal to the social instincts and intellectual honesty of men and women. Now, many things may happen to a movement which thus descends, as it were, from the heights to the plain. But one thing is pretty sure to be among them. It will leave some of its old adherents in occupation of the peaks, where in their solitary grandeur they will stand denouncing their former associates for desertion of principle. The severance of the Social Democrats from the working body of the Labour Party seems to us to illustrate aptly enough this phase in the movement, and in reality to confirm the account of the main trend of Socialist thought which Mr. Wells has given.

While the Socialist, in descending to the plain, has brought his ideals into closer contact with the actual world, the world itself, it is fair to say, has made an almost equal movement in the direction of the Socialist. It is in vain that newspapers seek to frighten us with names. No one can deny that the old assumptions which stood as a clear and hard barrier against Socialistic legislation have been deserted by both parties. Free competition as a remedy for all ills, once the device of the most advanced party, is now abandoned by the most retrograde. The course of events has of itself compelled the adoption of many measures which would once have been denounced as Socialistic, and the growing sense of social compunction, and the spreading knowledge of the extent and the causes of poverty have done much to incline people to listen to anyone, whatever his creed, who had a remedy for economic misery to propose. As regards Socialism, indeed these considerations cut both ways. If they show that the Socialist is no longer a political pariah, they go also to prove that we can have Socialistic measures without becoming Socialists. We can accept much of the Socialist spirit, of the ideal of industrial co-operation, of the deepening sense of collective responsibility, and embody the new teaching usefully in our legislation without committing themselves, body and soul, to a brand new order of society with cast-iron arrangements complete. It may be doubted whether we are an inch nearer the "Socialist State" of the idealist, because we have done many things and shall do many more which embody what is good in Socialist teaching. It is impossible even to say how far the present trend will convey us. Seventy years ago emancipation from political and even religious monopoly was the need most urgently felt. The movement was still highly incomplete when new needs arose, and it was recognised that the positive intervention of the State to redress economic inequality and much resulting social misery was necessitated by the very forces which the work of emancipation was setting free. For twenty years these needs have been making themselves felt. They have influenced all parties and borne fruit in a long course of legislation. To-day probably they are felt more keenly than ever. Their influence is still on the upward swell of the wave. But whether they will fling us safe and stationary on the shores of that Socialist Utopia in which they were to be for ever satisfied is quite another question. The chances are that long before this consummation is reached new problems will arise.

The conditions we are now producing will bring fresh and unsuspected difficulties in their train, and the advanced thinkers of the next generation may be again deprecating excessive legislation. But these, like all questions of the ultimate destiny of society, are matters of speculation. For practical men and for thinkers who would grapple with reality, the problem is to deal with the evils of our own time, not so much in the light of remote ideals that may never become actual, as under the guidance of permanent principles of social justice which, however much they change in the force of their application, never lose their validity and vital truth.

A VISION OF NEW TORYISM.

It is in the melting-pot, as all parties are in the melting-pot under the impact of two novel and tremendous forces; the shrinkage of the world, which has thrown black and white and yellow peoples into sudden collision, the demand for social betterment which arises, with ever more insistent cry, from the Social Abyss. From that melting-pot it is impossible at the present to foresee what will emerge as the completed product. The Tory Party, then the party in power, and hence a party with a settled instead of a fluid policy, first felt the impulse of that impact. Its rash and premature advocacy of an Imperial unity, based on a Tariff whose nature and effects had in no degree been carefully estimated, alienated one section of impartial electors. Its total and contemptuous neglect of the new hunger for Social Reform alienated another. In such dolorous condition, in the early years of the twentieth century, it staggered helplessly to inevitable ruin. The causes of that ruin, its effects, the possibilities of its reparation, are diagnosed only by the few. In that remarkable anonymous work, "A Lodge in the Wilderness," issued last year, there appeared a really serious attempt at discussion of the actual situation in the light of the play of forces outside of, but profoundly influencing, the normal arena of the party strife. What could be saved of a vision of Empire in an effort to consolidate the British race and its dependent people, set in a world which had grown so dangerous and so small? What could be given in satisfaction of the determination towards a freer, fuller life amongst the "rude mechanicals" compatible with the maintenance of the ancient Tory traditions of "Constitution, Church, and Property"?

The author of the book asked such questions rather than provided answers to them. He recognised, at least, the difficulties of the situation, in a challenge of a time, new and untempered and hazardous in its possibilities. If he could not completely reveal the solution, he could at least appreciate the problem for which a solution is desired. No such modesty of purpose characterises the young Protectionist politicians who have united to plead for the advanced Tory policy. "The New Order: Studies in Unionist Policy" (Francis Griffiths) does not penetrate very deep below the surface view of political controversy. The contributors to its pages are very content to plunge around amid the conventional phrases: slapping out cheerily at their opponents, manufacturing clever party "scores," offering the raw material of platform speeches to an audience which should be desirous of something more satisfying. "The chief need," says Lord Malmesbury, in the introduction to this volume, "of both the old historic parties in England at the present moment is a logical and intelligible system of political philosophy, in the absence of which practical politics must necessarily drift hither and thither among the shallows of opportunism." But the "logical and intelligible system of political philosophy" is still to seek amongst these vivacious advocates of the new order.

Instead we find attacks upon the House of Commons, which, in the valuable verdict of Lord Winterton, "was never weaker or more incompetent than it is to-day" and "is quite incapable of carrying into effect its own will, the will of the people, or anyone else's will," except that of those who control the Cabinet; or astonishing statements concerning Germany—"in spite of the fact that Germany's emigration is more than equalled by her immigration, unemployment is practically unknown"; pleas for the good old system of resolute government in Ireland, with laments over "the temporary lapse under Mr. Wyndham, the importance of which cannot be overestimated," or grotesque allusions to Free Trade such as those of Mr. Spencer-Churchill. "There was in Pandora's box an unmentioned imp, destined to destroy aggregations of selfish and unpatriotic individuals. We now recognise him as the bacillus of Free Trade." Not all, it may be acknowledged, is down to this level. Mr. M. H. Temple's essay on "Religious Education" is a serious, fair, and suggestive contribution to an exceedingly difficult subject: and Mr. Steel-Maitland on "Labour" presents a closely reasoned plea for the decasualisation of industry, and for the elimination of sweating and its attendant evils by the Wages Boards system. From such a deliberate piece of social pleading, however, the reader passes into a devastating diagnosis by Sir John Rolleston of the "Financial Results of Free Trade," in which such fervid appeals as "Think of that, you working men of England, and, above all, you working men of England who are out of employment," garnish an account of the motor-car industry as a typical example of the collapse of Free Trade England; an assertion that "Capital has not materially benefited by the recent trade boom"; and an ascribing of the recent enormous shrinkage of "our finest investments, beginning with Consols," to the direct responsibility of our fiscal system.

From such a quaint jumble of sanity and its opposite there is some difficulty in disentangling any coherent and lucid body of doctrine. But—in brief—these politicians may be discovered as advocating the driving of the Tory Party along certain definite lines. The Constitutional policy demands the maintenance of the House of Lords, with suggestions of the possibility of minor reforms: the maintenance of strong Government in Ireland, congenial to the "loyalists," stimulated by a vague hope that its continuance will break the power of the priest and the League; in home defence "a Citizen Army" (blessed paraphrase for Conscription) from which "no one would be allowed to buy himself off," and for which, "on the contrary, a proportional poll tax would be levied on the medically unfit, according to their means." In Imperial matters, Mr. Bernhard Wise makes a somewhat unexpected rally in favour of democracy. "Imperialism, in short, must march with democracy, after the pattern of the over-sea dominions, where democracy rules untrammelled by privilege or tradition, and Imperialism is a living faith." And in social affairs this newest political philosophy is revealed as somewhat dolorously groping after a creed which will win back to Toryism the lost allegiance of the working-classes, terrified by Socialism, and repudiating it in fierce language, but in any specific advocacy of remedies for specific disease, finding no line of advance but along that similar pathway of Socialistic development, which has been pursued by both political parties, almost unknowingly, for more than half a century. The arguments are honest, and the men are in earnest; but the ultimate results are far from inspiring. If this is the best that "young England" of the twentieth century can effect in reconstruction, the outlook is bleak and mournful.

The fact is, that few, if any, of these contributors rightly understand the nature of the changes—the profound and amazing changes—which have come upon the world. Democracy is awake—in all the cities of Europe—with a new life and new desires, which will by no means be satisfied with a few kindly doles of restrictive social legislation. The awakening has passed from the demand for political equality to the demand for a greater social equality. On one side the free citizen, said M. Viviani to the French Chamber, is a brute—in the law in which he often lives, the impossible hours of his labour, the shortness and precariousness of his working days. On the other he is a god, an individual member of the sovereign people, possessed of all the political rights which are possessed by the millionaire. That is not a condition of stable equilibrium. Socialism is preaching crude political doctrines of reconstruction, which might effect a similar ruin to the ruin first effected when Rousseau's theories of disease and remedy commenced to work themselves out in practical affairs. But Socialism is a result, not a cause; a theory and a gospel inevitably bred of a hazardous condition of social organisation; an educated proletariat confronting unparalleled accumulation, of which their share is scanty and uncertain. "Socialism," said Professor Wallace in wise verdict, "whatever its aberrations, has the credit of keeping people alive to the fact that the social compact is always making, and never made, and that it has now become like an ill-fitting dress, which is displacing the assimilative system of society, causing irregular excitation of the heart, and clogging the organs of breathing."

And the same is true of the large problem outside. Again, it is a problem of awakening. The East is arousing from its long sleep. There is "unrest" in India. Japan has suddenly leapt into a position of equality in strength and determination, with the great military Powers of the West. South Africa reveals an insoluble problem of black and white, and the future relations of the one to the other. And if the old peoples are attaining consciousness, the newer nations which still maintain the British flag and the real, if vague, allegiance to a British Dominion, are attaining self-consciousness Canada, a nation; Australia, a nation, are visions which count for as much at least as the vision of Canada and Australia as integral parts in a world confederation. Once again the mysterious and unanalysable force of Nationality is proving itself stronger than the appeal of Empire, and once again, therefore, a right apprehension of the meaning and terrible power of national aspirations is necessary for satisfactory direction of the courses of coming change. But the men who are heralding the "New Order" seem blind to the meaning of national devotion. To the most determined and persistent assertion of national claims and sacrifices that the modern world has ever seen, they turn blind eyes of misunderstanding and contempt. "Workmen who wish for the true welfare of their country," says Mr. Hugh O'Neill, "are convinced that the cry of 'Ireland a nation' is impossible of realisation, and, were it attempted, would lead to untold misfortune." Yet nothing is more certain than that the other nations of the British dominion, so rapidly destined to acquire a dominant position in any united counsels of policy, would immediately grant Home Rule to Ireland. Nor can it be denied that the Colonial and, to a lesser degree, the Imperial instinct, is at open warfare with much that these men hold to be established and secure. The House of Lords as an hereditary chamber, with an absolute power of veto; the establishment of one particular church; the dominance of the Land Monopoly and the Drink Monopoly; these and other abuses are confronted by the free democratic communities over the sea with a mixture of astonishment and disdain. The attempt to fuse this new democratic spirit with the feudal régime is inevitably destined to failure.

THE PERIL IN THE BALKANS.

Turkish statesmen have, in recent years, learned one lesson. They show the old blind facility for blundering into a quarrel. They lack the art of evading a public humiliation, and concealing a retreat with a brave show of geniality. But this, at last, they have learned—that it is wise to surrender before the ships of an indignant Power have actually reached their coasts. The affair of the Italian post-offices was settled this week, while the Italian ships were within telegraphic range of their port. The Turks appear to be realising, at last, something of the meaning of sea-power. No other State is so vulnerable from the sea. Here, indeed, lies the weakness of the one alliance which the Sultan has known how to retain. His only friend in Europe is a land-Power. Italy had a real grievance. No other European State has quite so many subjects resident in the Ottoman Empire; none has a better claim to the indispensable facility of an honest and reliable postal service. But Signor Tittoni, we may feel sure, was thinking of some larger stake than his post-offices. The economic rivalry of the European Powers in Turkey has resolved itself of recent years into a diplomatic scramble for concessions in the ante-rooms of Yildiz Palace. A Power which disdains to pose, as Germany does, as the only friend of the Islamic reaction, must rely upon the mailed fist for success. Crispi assembled an army in Sicily to second the British intervention in Armenia which never took place. To-day Italian policy is in the hands of men who pursue more realistic aims. They have asserted, by their rough emphasis of a purely commercial demand, the sort of prestige which depends on the ability to use force to back interests. Italy is one of the Great Powers; she can coerce.

This Turco-Italian episode is, indeed, only one of many evidences that the centre of European unrest has shifted from Morocco to the Balkans. To find the clue to this quickening of interest in a weary and derelict problem, it is necessary to travel somewhat further backwards than the Austrian railway scheme which first set Europe talking. The real impetus, in all probability came from the prolonged and theatrical visit of the Grand Duke Nicholas to Bulgaria last autumn. There is hardly a doubt that it resulted in something more definite than speeches and demonstrations. The "Temps," which is hardly likely to be misinformed, admitted that the rumours of the signature of a military convention were a happy anticipation of events. In one form or another, and under every sort of correct reserve, Prince Ferdinand has probably pledged himself to use his rather formidable army as a Russian advance guard, in the event of a Turkish war. The idea apparently is that with some aid from the Black Sea Fleet and the Russian cavalry, a Bulgarian army would be able to deal with the Turks in Europe, while the Russians themselves advanced into the Armenian provinces.

Here was the first capital fact of the new situation. The second was the Austrian reply. She withdrew from her accord with Russia, renounced her mandate as a reforming Power, and suddenly embarked on a railway scheme for which there was no apparent urgency. The new Novi-Bazar line will be longer than the existing route to Salonica viâ Belgrade and Nish. The presumption is, therefore, that the motives for its construction are political and strategical, rather than economic. But if the new line is strategical, why was it that the Porte assented so promptly to its construction? It is plausible to suggest that the Porte, like the "Temps," believed in the success of the Grand Duke Vladimir's mission, and wished to check an eventual Russo-Bulgarian advance by calling in Austrian aid. Then came the third phase in the evolution of this crisis—the launching of Sir Edward Grey's reform scheme for Macedonia, with its almost prophetic appeal for concerted European action. Why was it that, after two years of a too modest inaction, he suddenly assumed the part of a leader in the Concert? Pursuing the same line of conjecture, he may have realised that without drastic reform the chaos in Macedonia must speedily result in war. The last phase is the most disquieting of all. Russia has welcomed the English initiative, while declining its operative proposals. Her attitude is friendly, considerate, and even cordial, but her counter scheme is hardly likely to remove the causes of unrest. If, to pursue our theory, she did look to war as the ultimate solution, it is thus that she would behave. She would endeavour to retain the friendship of the liberal Powers, and the sympathies of Bulgaria, while rejecting a remedy which might render war unnecessary.

A mind which allows itself to dwell on this plausible structure of conjecture may find some facts to confirm it. Even before the close of the Japanese War, certain agents of Grand Ducal intrigue connected with the notorious Agence Latine had begun to revive the moribund Panslavist propaganda, both in Russia and abroad. No sooner was peace concluded than reactionary circles began to talk of a Balkan campaign as the surest means of restoring the tone of the army and the prestige of the autocracy. The Press, with hardly a distinction of party, turned its attention to Macedonia. The Grand Duke Vladimir belongs emphatically to this school of thought. Finally, it is apparently a fact that some unusual military preparations are going on in the Caucasus. The unrest in Persia would hardly justify any considerable military activity, but the continual Turkish violations of the Persian frontier might supply a clue. The only apparently decisive fact which suggests that Russian ambitions are really turned in another direction is the adoption this week by the Duma of M. Stolypin's grandiose scheme for the construction of over one thousand miles of railway, at a cost of over twenty millions sterling, down the Amur Valley to Vladivstock. That a Power, just emerging from defeat and revolution, and still wrestling with the spectre of bankruptcy, should contemplate such a scheme as this seems sufficiently insane. But is hardly credible that she should even dream of such commitments in the Far East if she regarded a war with Turkey as a possibility.

It is, however, of little use to apply the test of sanity to any detail in Russian policy. The Japanese war was a wanton folly. The present policy of internal repression seems to us mere madness. The decision to re-build the fleet, and, at the same time, to continue the exploitation of Siberia, strikes the Western mind as an inexplicable error. Yet all these things are facts. If we were asked what the probable results to Russia of a second Turkish war would be, we should say (1) certain bankruptcy, since Turkey could pay no indemnity; (2) a renewal of such incidents as the mutiny of the "Potemkin," and (3) a recrudescence of revolution comparable to that which occurred at the close of the Japanese war. But it by no means follows that the reactionaries who control the policy of the Court are likely to reason in this fashion. What seems to us a national insanity, may be, from some private standpoint, a very shrewd piece of business indeed. The mad quarrel with Japan was due to the fact that the courtier Bezobrazoff and certain of the Grand Dukes had acquired valuable forests across the Yalu in Korean territory. It is an interesting, and possibly significant, fact that the Amur railway will also pass through valuable forests. War is usually profitable to some one, and there were sinister tales of the profits which certain of the Grand Dukes made in the Japanese campaign. Russian policy is always apt to be deflected by such undisciplined personal factors as these.

There may be a Siberian faction at Court, and a Balkan faction. Incompatible as their aims would appear to be, it does not follow that the momentary triumph of one interest precludes the success of the other.

It is one thing to realise that this country must never again oppose Russia in a war of liberation in the Near East; it is quite another to desire such a solution. The expansion of Bulgaria down to the San Stefano line would be a tolerable solution of the European difficulty. But the Armenians have nothing to gain from a Russian conquest until Russia adopts a new policy towards her subject-races. A war, moreover, would unchain abominable possibilities of conflict and suffering—famine and massacre at the best, Armageddon at the worst. The moral of such a possibility—and it is at least a possibility—is that public opinion must lose no opportunity of seconding the efforts of Sir Edward Grey to secure reform without a resort to war. His revised proposals represent in our opinion a minimum. If compromise were to go further, war would offer almost the only hope of release from an intolerable chaos which is only nominally a state of peace.

SOME ABUSES OF CLUB LIFE.

We very much hope that whatever view the Government will take of the machinery of the Licensing Bill—and criticism has not seriously affected it—they will not be tempted to weaken greatly their plan of dealing with clubs. As it stands, the Bill is not too strong in this direction. If it were cut down still further—if, for example, Mr. Asquith accepted many such proposals as the suggestion to take the registration of these institutions from an administrative body and place it in the hands of a county-court judge—its entire fabric might be endangered. It would never do—it would be an act of high impolicy—to stop one form of the retail sale of alcohol and encourage the trade to flow into channels in which the public interest is less carefully guarded. As it is, there have been signs of a tendency to substitute clubs for public-houses whose licenses have been withdrawn under the Act of 1902. The brewers have facilities for this kind of transfer. Not a few clubs are in their debt; others have been financed by them. There is an obvious advantage in exchanging the direct oversight of the law for the virtual privacy and semi-inviolability of club premises. The financial inducement is also considerable. Public-houses are subject to license-duties, and are dear objects in the open market. A club is only liable to a trifling registration fee, and no special monopoly value attaches to its home. The Government must walk with wary feet, or it may find itself trapped.

At the same time, the attempt to deal with clubs is a matter of great delicacy. There is the danger of interfering with the association of men for more or less harmless pleasure, the peril attending a peculiarly irksome form of sumptuary law. There is a risk of bearing less hardly on the rich than on the poor. It is, of course, right to establish a general power of inspection, but few who realise how methods of police work out will be brought to believe that precisely the same kind of interference will prevail in Pall Mall and in the Whitechapel Road. Club-life is of the essence of modern society. Though it has its elements of idleness and wastefulness, it is part of the quick interchange of thought and human relationship which is indispensable both to modern industrialism and to modern democracy. It must therefore be touched with a wary hand, and, in particular, must be touched on the side of abuse. The question is: Has not such an abuse arisen? We cannot imagine how any friend of rational club-life can deny that this is the case. The circulars and appeals of the Club and Institute Union—the society binds together some 1,200 or more workmen's clubs—suggest such an abuse. Issues of "Club Life," which we have read, are full of warnings against it. Certain investigations that we have made into the conduct of some of these institutions point to the same conclusion.

Abuse is indeed separable from some features of popular club life in England. The hours of opening are very long, often extending till past one in the morning. The system under which a transfer ticket entitles a member of a single institution to enter the premises of 1,200 clubs, also affiliated to the Club and Institute Union, is open to grave objection, and must qualify their political character and value. Is there indeed any large intellectual or political interest attaching to the average Radical or Conservative club, at least in London? We wish we could answer the question in the affirmative. But as we run our eyes over some of the balance-sheets of these institutions, we find few or no signs of any strong interest in politics or social affairs. Clubs, whose receipts from the bar run quarterly into thousands of pounds, record an expenditure of a few shillings on their library or their store of newspapers. The book readers appear to be very few, and even among the journals taken in we are informed that the sporting papers and the sporting news are more generally read. The lectures are thinly attended. Indeed, so far as we can see, the only serious item of revenue or expenditure which compares with the dominating interest of drink, is that which deals with games and entertainments. The latter are of the music-hall type, and centre round the Sunday night gathering, to which women and children are admitted. We do not gather, from the description of these amusements, that they rise to any serious level of artistry. But that may be a matter of taste.

The main source of danger to workmen's club-life seems to us to be the preponderating, the overwhelming, interest of the bar. It is clear that out of the bar the club lives. It may have other sides, but this element must settle its general conduct and character. We take at random from a pile of balance sheets before us that of an East End Radical Club for a single quarter, and we find that out of a total income of less tnan £1,000, over £700 accrued from "bar takings." The same account shows an expenditure on the library of £2 7s. 3d. Another balance sheet of the Central Society shows a quarterly receipt of over £1,600 from the bar, out of a total of over £2,500. Similar results appear on many, indeed on all, the documents of clubs which sell alcoholic liquor, and they are the great majority. The profits are clearly enormous, for the accounts often specify that they range from 40 to 50 per cent., and we gather that the retail prices are lower than those which prevail in the public-house. All this suggests a close association between the brewery interest and a large number of workmen's clubs, an association which the friends of the Licensing Bill are bound to watch in the interests of the people, no less than in common justice to the publicans. It is clear that an indefinite multiplication of new clubs must be firmly checked if we do not want the vital machinery of the measure to run to waste, and worse than waste. With regard to the existing institutions, we hope that their conductors will see that there is a case for setting their house in order, and that no self-respecting Government could shut the door to the extension of the retail trade in liquor on one side and open it wide on another.

Life and Letters.

THE ECONOMICS OF TIPPING.

Among the minor irritants of holiday-making, tipping occupies a considerable place. At such seasons we are thrown upon the mercy of a continuous series of strangers for those incidental personal services which are essential to make travel comfortable, or even tolerable. The whole nature of the proceeding throws out of gear the ordinary business mechanism. The traveller, the visitor, the pleasure-seeker, is presumed to have put on his "lighter self," which scorns the "higgling of the market," is out to enjoy himself, and in vulgar language "to blow it." The sorts of service rendered to him on the railway, or the steamship, in hotels and restaurants, or in the home of friends, lie outside the routine of a price-tariff, and do not admit of bargaining. And yet, involving as they do labour and the livelihood of many persons, they must be paid for. But who shall pay, in what manner and upon what scale? There is the rub. Most of these services are rendered by persons who are the employees of some business, hotel, restaurant, railway, livery stable, which is supposed to pay their wages out of the ordinary takings of the trade. But there is a general tendency to shift the payment of as much as possible on to an extra fund, coined out of the goodwill or careless generosity of casual customers. In order that this may be done, there needs to be some direct personal relation between the employee and the customer. The service of the cook is as important as that of the waiter, that of the stoker as that of the porter, but the personal contact is not there.

This brings us close to the rationale of tipping. It is a supplement to the ordinary cash mechanism of our social system, growing out of special personal relations that evade a set tariff. It has two supports. Why must one tip a railway porter, who is the servant of the company, and presumably is paid by them "what he is worth"? Well, in the first place, because it is not practicable for the company so closely to supervise a porter's work as to prevent him from shirking it, or to ensure that he does his best and quickest. In the second place, the value of his service to the traveller depends a good deal not upon what he does, but upon the way he does it. What holds of the porter holds also of the waiter, the cabman, the hair-cutter, the bathing-man, and in general of domestic service. Beyond the routine factor in such service, which can be, and in most instances is, regularly paid for by the employer, there lies an elusive factor, springing directly from personal skill, which can be given or withheld according to the good or ill-will or indifference of the servant. It is this that becomes the instrument of tipping. And it is this fact that causes all the trouble, the discontent, the irritation and uncertainty. There is no "economic" method of fixing a price for an article which is never twice the same, which lies outside the regulation of the market.

Nor does this exhaust the subtlety of the habit. For there belongs to it the pretence, not wholly false, that the tip is not a price at all, not a payment for any specific service, but a general sign of goodwill, which reflects some sort of credit for generosity upon the payer, and is a bounty and a recognition of extra skill or zeal in the recipient. On the part of recipients there is a strong desire to keep gratuities outside the recognised wage system, and there is a good deal to suggest that this struggle has been successful. For even in the case of hotels and restaurants, where tips are certainly taken into account in a reduction of wages, it is tolerably clear that the net takings of waiters who are allowed to take tips are a good deal higher than the wages where tips are successfully forbidden.

Thus regarded, there is something not wholly unreasonable and very human in the practice. Among the phrases which cover it, gratuities, douceurs, vails, pour-boires, "something for yourself," there is one which throws real light upon its nature. A douceur does suggest that there are departments of industry which need sweetening and softening by payments which recognise a semi-friendly relation between the two parties. Unfortunately this humane side lends itself to very grave abuses, and it may be doubted whether the normal tendency of a douceur is not to harden and irritate rather than to soften and assuage. To the traveller or the visitor who is timid, sensitive, limited in means, or unaccustomed to moving among strangers, the habit involves more worry and annoyance than is easily admitted. An exaggerated scale of expectations is purposely maintained for the encouragement of the well-to-do or generous donors, and real or feigned disappointment in the demeanour of servants wounds the self-esteem of the departing guest. Few people like to be thought mean, and tipping trades upon this fear. Only two sorts of person do not suffer, the profusely rich, who may even delight in the "largess" of conspicuous waste, and the curmudgeon who is indifferent to what other people think of him provided that he gets off cheap. It is doubtless to the former class that much of the suffering of ordinary persons must be attributed. The imitation of the rich by the lower classes has caused the practice to filter down until we reach the pathetic sight of the ill-paid work-woman pinching twopence out of her penurious wage to fee the well-to-do railway porter who carries her box. With some of the complaints which have lately found ventilation in the "Times" we cannot profess deep concern. Whether fifteen or twenty per cent. upon the bill is a proper waiters' fee for a two guinea dinner party at Prince's, or the Savoy, does not arouse much personal feeling among ordinary men and women who are more disposed to question the extravagance of the dinner than to scrutinise the waiters' share. But one really striking and instructive feature emerges from the correspondence, namely, the extraordinary divergence in the estimates of proper and sufficient tipping. It seems that there are persons who are fools enough to pay, or, at least, to boast of having paid, five pounds in tips to servants for a week-end in a country house, though one writer, whose social authority is highly recommended by himself, avers that such a visit can be done handsomely upon a sovereign, including adequate fees to the butler and the chauffeur. Though there is something a little humorous in the endeavour to fight the extravagance of millionaires and plungers under the name of "good form," the protest is a meritorious one, if it leads to tempering the social dominion of mere riches.

There is, however, a worse aspect of tipping than any we have yet named, which links it to a whole large economic under-world of bribery, corruption, blackmail, and illicit commissions that more or less permeate our social system. If it is true that the London, Chatham and South-Eastern Railway knowingly allows its servants to place mendacious notices "Reserved" upon their carriages at Dover in order to blackmail tired, struggling, and anxious passengers just landed from the Calais steamers, the directors and the management of that railroad deserve all the punishment meted out to them by indignant correspondents and something more. The prevalence of this mal-practice is not, however, as is sometimes suggested, peculiarly English, or confined to railways. Everywhere along the beaten road of pleasure on the Continental routes elaborate conspiracies of blackmail fasten themselves upon the ordinary business arrangements; every service at railway station or hotel spreads itself among the largest number of attendants so as to extort the maximum of backsheesh. The demoralisation of such a system is everywhere evident; it generates deceit, insolence, contempt, extravagance among its practitioners, ill-will, anxiety, and alternately a sense of meanness and of resentment against extortion, among the patients.

But while the grievance is evident there seems no available remedy. The truth is, of course, that it is one of the minor organic ailments of our defective social system. So long as there exists a lot of unearned or easily gotten wealth, some of it will spill over into these side-streams of personal extravagance, boring channels of habit for the imitation of those who cannot afford such payments. So long as competition for work and wages remains so keen that every regular business payment is cut down to a minimum, the tendency to eke out a more comfortable livelihood by forced gratuities, half dole, half blackmail, will remain irresistible. Only when the worker gains self-respect enough to deter him from seeking these gratuities will tipping disappear, or resume its legitimate rôle of an occasional token of goodwill and friendship, which he who gives is glad to give, and he who receives can do so without any sense of inferiority.

THE CHILD'S FETISH.

We know that the Toy Exhibition in Southampton Row this week had a very instructive and educational side. The mere use of the German word "Foreword" on the programme was enough to warn everyone that "Pädagogik" was lurking somewhere. And, sure enough, ten lines down the "Foreword," we came to the Toy as a "profound educational agency," and were further told that "educational possibilities in the way of informing and developing the minds of children by means of toys are practically unlimited." Writing evidently with authority, the "Westminster Gazette" also stated that the exhibition was "organised by the Sociological Association principally for the purpose of teaching parents how to select their children's toys, so that they may unconsciously instruct them as well as merely amuse them."

It is all quite true, of course. We have not the slightest doubt that, taken by the hundred thousand, the minds of little boys and girls do follow those queer curves meandering through rigid squares on the scientific charts of pleasure that hung on the walls. It is not very informing to be told that the human young first take delight in "biting and tasting plays." No one who has watched a baby with its coral, or a child of three with a pot of jam ever thought of doubting it. But when the curves proceed to show that the young regularly pass on from the biting and tasting stage through the stages of hunting, pasture, and agriculture, to the final stage of "shop and commerce," which is continued till the age of forty, then we feel we are on the edge of a peculiar scientific theory. Darwin used to insist, perhaps too confidently, that from the first conception of life a being passed rapidly through all the stages of incalculable evolution that had produced its parents, so that every creature at maturity was not merely the heir of all the ages, like Tennyson's "trampled orphan," but their living summary, their abstract in little, their hurried addition. Similarly, these sociological curves in terms of toys tend to establish the hypothesis that the human being's mind skims precipitately through the untold cycles of its ancestral history, from the biting and tasting stage that may be studied with the help of nuts or a mustard sandwich in a certain House at the Zoo, through the slow millenniums of Nimrod, Abraham, and Ruth, up to the highest development of man in a haberdasher's back-parlour or some living-in establishment on the Commercial Road.

It is kind of the curves to continue childhood's delight in the toys of shop—true "idols of the market-place"—up to the age of forty. But after that age they hold out no further hope of play, and childhood would seem to be over, did we not recall the many maturer citizens who may still be seen trafficking useless goods with zest, cultivating their suburban gardens in the agricultural stage, shepherding their children or their dogs, sitting in punts or missing rabbits with the hunter's lust for blood, and even condescending to the "biting and tasting plays" of the first stage of all, with an occasional drink. The oldest need not despair. As long as there is life, there are toys, and the mind in maturity, like the fully-developed body, is but the summary of its past, capable of renewing its old delights, not in successive stages, but haphazard as they come. Look at any decent man and woman among children—do you suppose they are meditating the Sociological Association's precepts and choosing out games and toys that may instruct and not merely amuse, remembering that from one to four is "the age of social play," from four to six "the age of individual play," and so on through the ages of "intelligent play," "competitive group games," and "co-operative group games"? Not a bit of it. They are full of the game themselves. They are enjoying part of their own summary. The man who does not take as much delight in making the boat, and the woman in dressing the doll, as the child for whom they are supposed to be working, must be poor, bloodless creatures, born decrepit in soul—

> "Hated as their age increases,
> By their nephews and their nieces."

Every age of life has its natural and appropriate toys, if we may include among toys such things as art collections, walking-sticks, books, and magnificent funerals. But it is more comforting as a sign of human brotherhood that certain forms of toy are universally beloved from pole to pole, and from the anthropoid up to Queen Victoria. That girls from world-without-end should have taken the doll to their hearts, was but an expectation of providence, for the usage of motherhood has been the one thing essential to mankind. Here in this Exhibition of delights, or in the Museum cases still gazed upon by their mummies, are to be seen the crude and rigid dolls of Egypt, fashioned before Bishop Usher's creation of the world; the dolls of Greece, jointed limb for limb like the dolls of Holland now; the Roman doll swaddled in grave-clothes to comfort the buried child. Here is the Kaffir doll of gourd and beads, the Nigerian doll of lizard skin, the Congo doll of solid iron, the Khartoum doll of clay with savage eyes, the hairy doll from Greenland's icy mountains. Some Gascon of the Gironde has imagined the startling doll of a ghost; and last comes silly Suffolk with two of the best dolls of all—one a flowered skirt of rag, a shawl, a cap, with all the obdurate, unyielding Suffolk nature painted on its velveteen face; the other, mere jointed slivers of flint, such as once were used for implements of war.

Give man or woman the first glimmer of art, and dolls are as inevitable as hairpins. But what about knuckle-bones? What practice necessary for the preservation of the race, what indispensable pleasure, lies in throwing the joints of pigs or sheep into the air and catching them on the back of your hand? We could have imagined many forms of delight equal to that, and some superior. Yet knuckle-bones are almost conterminous with humanity; for Pompeian ladies they were modelled of crystal, for our country labourers "dibs" must serve; but immortal souls of nearly every colour have spent much of their brief portion here below in tossing them up. Dice and draughts are widely common to mankind, and hardly more exhilarating than knuckle-bones, before coinage was current. The top, the whistle, the rattle, and the drum seem almost universal, and they more deeply stir the spirit. But, indeed, the instruments of sound, including the comb, the bull-roarer, the slate pencil, and the squib, are scarcely to be reckoned as toys in the proper sense, being in their perfection little else than miniature anticipations of the orchestra.

Imperfection is in the essence of a toy, as of all great art. Those exact imitations of grocers' shops and milk-carts, steamers, gigs, and good little children having tea may be all very well for princes and the young of millionaires. Princes and millionaires are abnormal ex officio. But the genuine child turns wearily from them to the obvious impossibility of that Canton dragon, that Burmese tiger, or to the crocodile that cocks its tail like a wren, or just to a string of bobbins and a rag-doll with no legs and a patch of velveteen for a face. In the Exhibition there was a castle (made by Bermondsey children, we think) that was noble in its powerful imperfection—as noble as the Bayeux tapestry, which it strangely recalled. There was also a yellow 'bus, running from Hornsey to Victoria, that could hardly be beaten for the unconscious excellence of its horseflesh—straight barrel body, straight legs of stick, neck and head flat and clear as from Caran d'Ache's own stables.

But we dare not praise for fear of self-consciousness, and the moment such art becomes conscious, it is dead.

Here and there a genuine idol had got mixed up in the merry show, like a parson at a ball, and it is never very easy to draw the line. With what kind of life and power does the heathen invest the queer shape he has made and worships? In reason he knows that it is not alive, he knows that at any moment he could break it in pieces, throw it on the fire with the rest of the log, and say, "Ah, ha! I am warm!" Yet he is afraid of it, he cherishes it, beats it, feeds and washes it, sometimes he even keeps a doctor for its complaints. We think a girl is very seldom afraid of her own doll's powers, though a mask or ugly form which he has himself made will terrify even a boy to distraction. But otherwise a child will cherish a doll, beat, feed, wash it, and constantly believe it is ill enough for bed and singularly unpleasant medicines. Undoubtedly, the doll is endowed with a kind of living personality not far removed from the idol's, and we do not wonder that in Japan, where certain ancestral dolls may be played with only once a year, they have become household gods, as sacred as the Penates were. To the enlightened, it must appear very foolish and superstitious; but, after all, let us take the enlightened themselves. Does not the great poet, the great novelist, invest with some kind of life the creature whom he produces just as truly as a girl makes a rag doll? If he does not, we would not give a doll's hair for all his characters together, and did not Thackeray himself, at the end of his greatest novel, talk of putting away his toys into their box?

SHARING.

In the spiritual and mental world, as well as in economics, there is a rough division of society into two classes —productive and non-productive. There are creators and distributors of immaterial wealth, and there are people who apparently have nothing to do but consume it. Compare the hard-handed son of toil with the tramp, the merchant prince with the idle exquisite. You will find all these distinctions repeated in the realm of mind and soul.

And there are sins, or limitations, characteristic of the two types. There is a sin of dependence, and a sin of independence—a temper that cannot or will not give, and a temper that cannot or will not take. Between the two is the life of co-operation—interdependence, or sharing.

Some people can do nothing for themselves, not even burn their own smoke, although they seem to find a pathetic satisfaction in seeing it darken the general horizon. Others burn smokeless fuel. Some, all their days, exploit the resources of other men and women. They seem to live by a kind of vacuum suction, and they are always renewing the vacuum. They hold an Irish wake over every dead joy. A headache or a heartache brings them nearly to death's door, attended by a crowd of sympathetic well-wishers. And there are others, who indulge in none of the privileges of dying—save death.

The former people are anxious to show even a stranger over their house of life. They give you the records of their spiritual conflicts—there is every record, except the scars. Or they bring you to the oratory, with shrines, and tapers burning, and possibly ask your counsel about the number of tapers before a particular shrine. While others never really let you enter their house of life at all. You are shown into an outer court, a garden, or an office—at best, a stately reception room, shut off by long corridors from the interior of the building—its weeping or laughter, birth or death.

Briefly, there are the people who, morally and emotionally, are supported by others. And there are others, who support them—the strong, uncomplaining people who seem, like Atlas, to bear the world on their shoulders—a whole world of human responsibilities and cares. We value, revere, confide in them; we know that they will never repudiate or fail us. They mediate between us and God, and, very frequently, we neither love God nor them. We cannot say to them:—

> "The weakness you reveal endears you more,
> Like the far traces of decay in suns."

For they reveal no weakness, and we stupidly conclude that there is none to reveal. There seems to be no element in their lives of peril and uncertainty. They will always be worthy of themselves, always essential to us; but we have no conviction of being essential to them. Rather, we look upon them as we might upon a great rock in a weary land. We rest under its shadow, but we know that it can neither miss nor welcome us. Is it not so with God, and with these strong and steadfast souls whose shelter we accept, but which we cannot shelter? We are convinced that all exceptional power constitutes a subtle barrier, whether it be material power, or wealth of mind or of soul. It often gives without sharing. It relieves from external pressure, rather than imparts an inward vitality, and protects, rather than fortifies. It misses the note of appeal which calls out the latent resources of others. Judged as a force for the regeneration of the world, it has every element of strength save weakness.

Two watchwords must be learned before we can enter into life's comradeship—one is weakness, the other is strength. Some never learn the word of strength, and they are beggars, not comrades. They are mere camp-followers, or pensioners who have not earned their pensions, who, if they ever saw active service, took the first opportunity of being invalided home. But there are others who have not learned, or who repress, the word of weakness, who do not fall out of rank, but who unconsciously advance out of it, who will rescue a fellow-soldier under fire, but will not submit to be rescued, who never really look upon themselves not as themselves at all, but as an integral part of the regiment, and who, at the heart of comradeship, miss its secret and its joy.

The world does not understand how this barrier of exceptional strength tends to disappear when steadily regarded. For the strongest are weak, and weak enough, and all human strength is potential failure. We should be astonished if we knew how many apparently adequate people are conscious in their inmost souls of the watchword of weakness. Some of them, indeed, are so conscious of it that they fear to utter it, lest they should forget the watchword of strength, lest the desire for the relief of human companionship should grow by what it feeds on, and become an imperious craving, vitiating nerve and will. Others, again, are afraid of the venture of trust, and they endure isolation, because they see the shadow of misunderstanding, the darker shadow of a possible betrayal dogging the steps of confident affection.

There are some who value the inner side of life, and its sincerity of emotion, so highly that they refuse to subject it to the daily strain of intimacy—the wear and tear of words and actions. They fear to cheapen their spiritual experience, or make it meretricious, and they forget that silence may become an actual lie, that starves and kills the soul whose purity it was only meant to guard.

Others regard emotion almost in the light of an enemy, and self as a mere opportunity for self-renunciation. This spirit appears even in their prayers. They pray that God's will may be done, that no concession may be made to their human frailty, that they may not be considered. They almost find it illogical to pray simply and whole-heartedly for the welfare of those they love. Here, as elsewhere, they strive to do all things decently and in order; they have a reception room, even for God. The passion, the wild, inarticulate longing, the desires with which the heart is breaking, are sternly repressed, and they meet Him with fortitude, less like children than soldiers. Such prayer is wonderfully different from that of the exacting and selfish, and yet, perhaps, it is the prayer of those who have never loved to the uttermost, and hence have failed to realise all love, Divine and human, as a supreme inadequacy. For faith anchors, as upon a rock, not only on God's sufficiency, but on His insufficiency, and in His Fatherhood the two are one.

Some bear their own burdens to the last fraction, in a certain blindness of spiritual pride, and many, through sheer unwillingness to add to the burden of others—a mistaken generosity. They do not understand that perfect generosity is manifested quite as frequently in taking as in giving. There is, again, a class of people who stand aloof in a fierce reticence, maintaining that a man's soul is his castle. There is some truth in this view, inasmuch as the soul is not a pageant or a theatre. But perhaps there is more falsehood. In the first place, there are outward manifestations of the spiritual life which no one can keep to himself. There are spiritual results which he records day by day, in the strange palimpsests of voice and face, which he who runs may read more or less correctly, and which, by higher critics, are readily decipherable. It is not easy to impose either a positive or a negative falsehood on the world; we are surrounded by too many higher critics in respect of character. They know whether this castle, whose keys we guard so jealously, is a home, or a place of tears and exile. They have a very shrewd idea what guests have sojourned there, what pictures hang on the walls, or whether all the pictures are of self in a hundred rôles. They can tell if the rooms are furnished royally, or are squalid and mean and bare—if there are any dungeons, and what prisoners inhabit them, what ghosts of dead ideals haunt the castle night and day. And they discern at a glance, which is often more than the occupant himself does, whether his account of his soul is or is not authentic. Fortunately, higher critics—being like old tried soldiers, who know the look of a veteran and of a recruit, of a deserter and of a V.C.—are for the most part kindly people, who see much and say little.

That is merely by way of illustrating that the theory of the castle, or even the outer court, fails in real life. We cannot if we would, keep spiritual results to ourselves. But what is more, they are not intended to be kept to ourselves.

Whether we will or not, we must add to the common store. Every personal experience is a fund upon which the universal experience can draw, whether we regard it in its aspect of integration, or of differentiation—whether, that is, we are thinking of other human beings, or of the absolute consciousness. The fact is that a man's soul resembles not so much a castle as a workshop or a laboratory, in which service and love are perfected, with doors that are shut indeed against mere curiosity, interference or distraction, but open to co-operation, to suggestions from without, ready both to admit and to impart all knowledge that can really further human welfare.

It does not follow that the details of a man's psychology should be put upon the market. They cannot be. The winepress must be trodden alone, although the wine be for the healing of the nations. Only the artist or inventor knows the history of some long travail of creation: it is not even divined save by one who has passed through a similar experience. And that rule holds good in the making of saints. To be sure, there are maladies of the soul that can only be reached by the light cure, and by skilled operators who know all about the disease. Here, as in physical life, the dissecting room is a necessity, but it is an exception. We do not live there, any more than plants live with their roots above ground. They are represented by their leaves and flowers, and though it may be necessary to dig them up occasionally, if they were dug up constantly the leaves and flowers would die.

And yet, it must always be remembered that neither life nor death to one's own self is possible, that the whole being, body, soul, and spirit, and even our besetting sins, are a stewardship for the common weal.

There is a great fellowship of imperfect men and women who hunger after perfection, who give and take help thankfully, who blunder and hope and toil, and believe in God and one another. And there is a great sharing among them, a sharing that resolves itself now into giving, now receiving, but that in its supreme form is both, that has done with shame and pride, with extortion and self-sufficiency, that is the Divine forgiveness of our human sin of separateness.

K.

THE TYRANNY OF THE CLOCK.

The other morning, sleep fell from us in one piece and discovered us wide awake. The sun shone thinly and brightly through the window, a blackbird distilled his mellowest notes from the pear tree beneath the window, and the cheerful song of "Cuckoo, cuckoo," went swinging round the half-circle from north to south, as though some human caller-up was striding round and swinging a hand-bell in time to his march. Without stopping to guess what the time might be, we dressed without shaving and came down. The blackbird had ceased to sing and had gone to fetch worms; a hedge-sparrow flew across the lawn with loudly flirting wings; the bees were issuing from the hive, for it was known that the flowers were awake; a bluebottle already found it pleasant to bask on the coping of the wall at the end of the terrace. The cowslips in the field below seemed mightily refreshed with their night's sleep. Their spangles of dew were just damped off and no more, and their stalks were full to the last cell with distilled water tinged with the distinctive flavour of this sweet flower. High in the maiden sky a wood-pigeon winged across, touched to a rosy bronze by the not too ardent sun, and the colour of bursting sycamore, hawthorn, and tall elm were such as only the top of the morning can give.

It was some primeval instinct made imperative on that one occasion that took us out of bed without even a glance at the artificial monitor that, ticking complacently on the mantelpiece, would have told us that there were two hours yet to be slept, and that the sun, the blackbird, and the cuckoo were inconveniences that the world has agreed to ignore. That morning stroll by the stream where the sea-blue kingfisher and the dipper divided the sovereignty of air, and even disputed the water-lordship of the trout, was an illicit pleasure, for we had done our duty to Society by playing bridge till past midnight and ought, therefore, to have slept till nine. Yet in spite of all our artificialities, the natural man in us will respond to the morning call of spring which about the first of May becomes so insistent as not to be shut out by the thickest of window curtains. It is then that we become troubled about ourselves, saying that we are attacked by insomnia, and must take drugs appropriate to the disease. It seldom strikes us that the sun, though a less regular time-keeper than the clock, is worthier of obedience. The fear against becoming sun-worshippers is the greatest fear that afflicts us. We dodge it on the one hand by making Easter and Whitsuntide movable feasts, and on the other by ignoring the fact that the natural day begins some four hours earlier in summer than in winter.

In some other countries the sway of the sun is more undeniable, and the ignoble clock succumbs to him. In Spain and in India, for example, the mid-day siesta or more or less prolonged rest from work is imperative, and the very early morning and late evening are the best used parts of the twenty-four hours. In our latitude we have striven to harness the sun to our own nocturnal purposes rather than to obey his ruling. Dismal was the disappointment when we found that we could not store up his light in cucumbers and let it out during the night. We get along fairly well by using a far older and more extensive battery, the coal measures, and the little suns that we make by means of passing a strong electric current through a carbon pencil are, in their way, not bad. We hope to treat him still more shamefully later on by getting electricity from his pale rival, the moon, through the tides ever rising and falling with infinite power at every part of our coast. The time may come when we shall be able to sit up all night under a brilliantly-lighted sky and sleep all day without the necessity of knowing whether there be a sun or no.

Instead of grieving at the waste of the tides that might be turned into electric light, we shall do much better to give attention to the floods of daylight that are wasted while we are in bed. That is what has been courageously done by the promoters of the Daylight Saving Bill, Mr. Robert Pearce, Sir William Bull, and Mr. Horniman. Many notable men, especially scientists, have honoured themselves by giving the Bill their support. It attacks the tyranny of the clock in a tentative fashion. Instead of making the hour of breakfast or the first hour of work move back towards midnight as the rising of the sun moves, it is content to gain and give back just eighty minutes of daylight by means of four weekly jumps in the months of April and September. The revolution occurs while the great majority of us are asleep. The small hour between two and three a.m. is made twenty minutes shorter four times in April and twenty minutes longer four times in September, and Sunday is the one day on which this indignity to the clock is perpetrated. Even the bridge player will be asleep on Sunday morning when the clocks chime two. He will not notice that it is forty minutes later instead of sixty when three strikes. When it strikes eight he will get up. His own watch he will have forwarded the night before, and will by this time have forgotten all about it. The morning will seem a little brighter and fresher than clock users have a right to expect, but every brazen dial in the house will bear him out that all is well. On Monday his egg will boil at the same time, his train will run at the same apparent minute, and all the difference he will find will be that the daylight will serve him better at the desk by day and last better on the tennis court in the evening.

It is a simple and delightfully hypocritical way of gaining eighty minutes per diem more sunshine through the four summer months. The more we think of it as we walk rather early in the morning by the trout steam, the better does it please us. Some fourth-dimensional genius might have discovered a way of giving us an extra hour between noon and one p.m. We would not have given him a thank you for it. It would have been one more weltering hour at the desk, a longer time between uprising and down-lying, with no more time for the best purposes of life. But here we have (imprimis) nearly an hour and a-half added to that best part of the day, the summer morning. The walk before breakfast still begins at six and still occupies an hour. But it is cut from a far finer portion of the day. It is notorious that even those mornings that are grey by the time the ordinary mortal gets up, are often full of sunshine. Not less superior to noon is the early morning of those days that we find at present uniformly too hot. The earlier up, the better, is a maxim that applies also to those days. We have only to see how the wild animals enjoy the morning and the evening of the summer days to be sure that we have not made a mistake by imitating them. On the first Monday in April, being, in spite of the clock, twenty minutes earlier than usual, we surprise the crow at some new game, catching him at an earlier point on his morning round. On the next Monday, we find among the foot-prints of the deer, long scratches that they made in their hurry to get out of our way. A week later, or, perhaps, the week after that, we may catch sight of the badger as he melts away towards his sett, and find what he has been so busy about among the dead bracken.

Therefore let us first rejoice that our new eighty minutes are to be taken from the best end of the day. Next important is the fact that, the day's work done, our evenings will contain eighty minutes more daylight. In summer, everyone, whether he has energy or not to get up early, makes the best of the very last lingering ray of the setting sun. We feel as though we had come into a handsome legacy on the first evening when we take dinner without having the lamp lighted. When the two hours available for tennis or cricket lengthen into two more we feel rich indeed. The amount of betterment of this kind that the sun gives us in the month of April is about forty-three minutes. To this, Mr. Pearce's Bill adds in four easy payments of twenty minutes each a solid eighty minutes. The six o'clock at which we arrive home and don our flannels, when the new Act comes into force, comes at what we now call twenty minutes to five, and on the twenty-fifth of June the sun does not set till twenty past eight. If we feel ready for bed by that time (nine-forty by the clock), so much the better. We are saving candle-light as well as daylight, and the light of body and soul. And if we want more daylight still, there is plenty to be had by cutting a little deeper towards the dawn.

Short Story.

THE DEATH OF THE RICH MAN.

It was a road as shelterless and bare as any road in Connacht. On one side there was a far-stretching bog, on the other side little fields, cold with tracts of water. You faced the Connacht hills, bleak and treeless, with little streams across them like threads of steel. There was a solitary figure on the road—a woman with bare feet and ragged clothes. She was bent, and used a stick; but she carried herself swiftly, and had something of a challenge in her face. Her toothless mouth was tightly closed, her chin protruded, wisps of hair fell about her distrustful eyes. She was an isolated individual, and it would be hard to communicate the sensations and facts that made up her life. Irish speakers would call the woman a "shuler." The word is literally the same as "tramp," but it carries no anti-social suggestion. None of the lonely cabins about would refuse her hospitality; she would get shelter for the night in any one of them, the sack of chaff beside the smouldering fire, the share in the household bit. But though she slept by their fires and ate their potatoes and salt, this woman was apart from them, and apart from all those who lived in houses, who tilled their fields, and reared up sons and daughters; she had been moulded by unkind forces, the silence of the roads, the bitterness of the winds, the long hours of hunger. She moved swiftly along the shelterless road, muttering to herself, for the appetite was planning within her. There on her way was a certain village, but before going through it she would give herself a while of contentment. She took a short pipe out of her pocket and sought the sheltered side of a bush. Then she drew her feet under her clothes and sucked in the satisfaction of tobacco.

You may be sure the shuler saw through the village, though her gaze was across the road. Midway on the village street there was a great house; it was two stories above the cottages, and a storey higher than the other shops. It was set high above its neighbours, but to many its height represented effort, ability, discipline. It was the house of Michael Gilsenin, farmer, shopkeeper, local councillor. "Gilsenin, the Gombeen man," the shuler muttered, and she spat out. Now the phrase "Gombeen man" would signify a grasping peasant dealer, who squeezed riches out of the poverty of his class, and few people spoke of Michael Gilsenin as a Gombeen man; but his townsmen and the peasants around would tell you that Michael Gilsenin had the open hand for the poor, and that he never denied them the bag of meal, nor the sack of seed-potatoes; no, nor the few pounds that would bring a boy or youth the prosperity of America. To the woman on the ditch Michael Gilsenin was the very embodiment of worldly prosperity. It was said—and the shuler exclaimed on Heaven at the thought—that Michael's two daughters would receive dowries of a thousand pounds each. Michael had furnished the new chapel at a cost of five hundred pounds; he had bought recently a great stock of horses and cattle; he had built sheds and stables behind his shop. And Michael Gilsenin had created all his good fortune by his own effort. The shuler wondered what bad luck eternal Justice would send on his household to balance this prosperity. And in her backward-reaching mind, the shuler could rake out only one thing to Michael's discredit. This was his treatment of Thady, his elder brother. It was Thady who owned the cabin and the farm on which the Gilsenin had begun their lives. Michael had reduced his grasping and slow-witted brother to subordination, and he had used his brother's inheritance to forward himself. In forwarding himself Michael had forwarded the family, Thady included, and now, instead of life in a cabin, Thady had a place in a great house. Michael was old now, the shuler mused, he was nearly as old as herself. It was well for those who would come after him. His daughters had dowries that made them the talk of Connacht, and his son would succeed to stock, farms, and shop. The shuler stretched out her neck and looked down the road and in to the village street. She saw the tall grey building, the house of stone with the slated roof and the many windows. And she saw a man hobbling out of the village. He had two sticks under him for he was bent with the pains. The man was Thady Gilsenin, Michael's brother.

Thady Gilsenin was grudging and hard-fisted to the beggars, but he always stayed to have speech with them. His affinities were with these people of the roads. By his hardness and meanness, by his isolation and his ailments, he was kin to the shuler and her like. She quenched the pipe, hid it under her clothes, and waited for Thady Gilsenin.

* * *

He stood before her, a grey figure leaning on two sticks. His hands were swollen with the pains, their joints were raised and shining.

"Well, ma'am," said Thady, "you're round this way again, I see."

"My coming won't be any loss to you, Thady Gilsenin," the shuler returned.

Thady turned round and looked back at the big house.

"And how is the decent man, your brother?" asked the shuler, "and how are his daughters, the fine growing girls?"

"His fine daughters are well enough," said Thady, turning round.

"There will be a grand marriage here some day," said the shuler, "I'm living on the thought of that marriage."

"It's not marriage that's on our minds," Thady said, in a resigned way.

The shuler was quick to detect something in his tone.

"Is it death?" she asked.

"Ay, ma'am, Death," said Thady; "Death comes to us all."

"And it is Michael that is likely to die?"

"Michael himself," said Thady.

This to the tramp was as the news of revolution to men of desperate fortune. The death of Michael Gilsenin would be a revolution with spoils and without dangers. She was thrilled with expectancy, and she said aloud: "O God, receive the prayers of the poor, and be merciful to Michael Gilsenin this day and this night. May angels watch over him. May he receive a portion of the bed of heaven through the gracious intercession of the blessed Mother of God. May he reign in splendour thro' eternity. Amen, amen, amen." And crying out this she rose to her feet. "I'm going to his house," she said. "I'll go down on my two knees and I'll pray for the soul of Michael Gilsenin, the man who was good to the poor." She went towards the village striking her breast and muttering cries. Thady stood for a moment, looking after her; then he began to hobble forward on his two sticks. They were like a pair of old crows, hopping down the village, towards the house of Michael Gilsenin.

* * *

She could never have imagined such comforts and conveniences as she saw now in the chamber of the dying man. There was the bed, large enough to hold three people, with its stiff hanging and its stiff counterpane, its fine sheets, its blankets and quilt, its heap of soft pillows. There was the carpet warm under her own feet, and then the curtains to the window that shut out the noise and the glare. A small table with fruit and wine was by the bed, and a red lamp burnt perpetually before the image of the Sacred Heart, and so the wasting body and the awakening soul had their comforts and their convenience. Michael's two daughters were in the room. They stood there broken and listless; they had just come out of the convent and this was their noviciate in grief. The shuler noted how rich was the stuff in their black dresses, and noted, too, their white hands, and the clever shape of their dresses. As for the dying man, she gave no heed to him after the first encounter. He was near his hour, and she had looked too often upon the coming of death.

They gave her a bed in the loft, and she lay that night above the stable that was back of the great house. She had warmed herself by the kitchen fire, and had taken her fill of tea, and now she smoked and mused, well satisfied with herself. "This night I'm better off than the man in the wide bed," she said to herself. "I'm better off than you this night, Michael Gilsenin, for all your lands and shops and well-dressed daughters. I'm better off than you this night, Michael Gilsenin, for all your stock and riches. Faith, I can hear your cattle stir in the sheds, and in a while you won't even hear the rain upon the grass. You have children to come after you, Michael Gilsenin, but that's not much after all, for they'll forget you when they've come from the burial. Ay, they will in truth! I've forgotten the man that lay beside me, and the child that I carried in my arms." She pulled a sack over her feet and knees and up to the waist, and sleep came to her on the straw. But she was awake and felt the tremor through the house, when Death came and took his dues. From that onward her sleep was broken, for people had come and horses were being brought out of the stable. Once old Thady came out, and the shuler heard him mutter about the loss in hay and oats.

When she came down to the yard she saw a well-dressed young man tending his horse. One of Michael's daughters came and stood with the young man, and the two talked earnestly together. The shuler knelt down on a flag and began sobbing and clapping her hands, she was working up to a paroxysm, but gradually, for she wanted to attract the attention of the pair without distressing them overmuch. The girl went indoors, and the young man followed her. The shuler saw two empty bottles; they were worth a penny. She hid them under her dress and went into the house. She made her way to the front door, passing by many people. People of importance were coming, and in such an assembly something surely would be gained. She stood by the street door and watched the great people come, priests, doctors, lawyers, shopkeepers and councillors. She stood there like an old carrion bird, her eyes were keen with greed, and her outstretched hand was shaking. She heard old Thady saying, "Now, thank God, we can be clear for the day of the fair. I was thinking that he would still be with us on the fair day, and we would have to close the shop, and that would be a great loss to us. Now we can have everything cleared off in time. God be good to Michael's soul."

PADRAIC COLUM.

Art.

PICTURES AT THE PARIS SALON.

THOSE who have followed the exhibitions of the Société Nationale des Beaux Arts, and are in sympathy with its aims, cannot but feel disappointed in the present collection of pictures, and a little anxious as to the future of this body of artists, whose secession from the older society caused such a sensation in the art world of Paris nearly twenty years ago. For the last five years and more there have been signs of growing dissatisfaction and even reports of the dissolution of this Salon. Men began to question the raison d'être of the Society, and to doubt if the ambitions of its members had been realised, and if modern art movements were welcome within its walls. Since then many of the original founders and several of its most celebrated members have for ever gone. Puvis de Chavanne, Whistler, Burne Jones, and Carrière, to name but a few, have no rivals among the present exhibitors. What has been said before must be restated here, and it is singularly apposite to this year's Salon. There are no signs of really promising work by the younger painters, and for many of the associates it is obvious that they seem bent on showing the validity of the aphorism that facility and decadence are perilously akin. Some, having found a formula, are intent upon repeating it ad nauseam. Their want of emotion is betrayed, as they yearly insist upon the same effect with a heavier hand. After all is said, there can be no art without emotion. Happily a Cottet and a Zuloaga exist to testify that their work is deeply penetrated by the finest feeling.

Lovers of historical and allegorical painting will rejoice in M. Maurice Denis' three decorative panels of Spring. A primitive of the twentieth century, M. Denis has attracted much attention by his daringly original simplicity of colour and outline. Fra Angelico never sang a gayer song than do these pictures, and the pure joie de vivre and brilliancy of the white and blue colouring are as delightful as an Oriental vase. M. Besuard unfortunately shows nothing here, and his abstention is always regretted.

M. Roll and M. Courtois represent official art. Both very unlike, it is true, the former at least shows some idea of an imaginative composition if rather leaden in colour. The latter's "Adam and Eve" is bad in colour and savours of the confectioner. Mr. Abbey's two Shakespearian subjects have both been seen at Burlington House; of the two, "Anne of Gloster" is the more successful and shows a really decorative treatment. M. Willette displays all his gifts of fancy in his "La vie n'est peut-être qu'un rêve."

Mr. Sargent is another absentee this year, but there are several remarkable examples of portraiture. In the dancing figure of Mlle. Brival in the part of "Carmen," M. Ignacio Zuloaga is at his very best. The dancer is wrapt in a vivid red shawl of Chinese design, and, lit up by the footlights, her figure casts dark shadows on the background, while two seated gypsies strum their guitars. The depth and richness of the colour, the sense of movement, and the powerful temperament of the artist make this one of the most striking works of the Salon. The same dexterity, the same brilliant gifts, are to be found in his two other canvasses, "The Dwarf" and the "Witches of Segovia," the latter a Spanish conception of the first scene of "Macbeth." They all witness to the same uncompromising fidelity, and to the true artist's power of visualising, and are an answer to those people who imagine that tradition is incompatible with evolution. The veriest tyro would know that these were by a Spaniard, the grey-green skies recall Goya, and Velasquez has been absorbed in all the essentials.

M. Boldini's two portraits are both worthy examples of his brush, and full of esprit and grace, whilst M. Jacques Blanche seems to take a malicious pleasure in baffling his public. His group of portraits is singularly impersonal, now reminiscent of M. Simon, now of Mr. Wilson Steer. M. Prinet has never appeared to greater advantage than in his large portrait group, which has something of the old Flemish spirit in its conception. Not attractive in subject, it nevertheless arrests the eye by the sheer truth and intense conviction with which it is painted. M. Carolus Duran's "Chamberlain of the Pope" is vigorous, and yet painted with greater restraint than his recent contributions. There are good portraits by Mr. von Glehn and Mr. Rolshoren, and in M. Baugniès' "Chasseresse" are qualities of no mean order. The three full-length portraits by M. de la Gaudara are, as usual, full of the subtle distinction that characterises all his work. Of the three, the centre figure is the most successful, both in hue and colour; but the general impression is one of lifelessness, and the tones are apt to be a little sickly. Mr. Lambert's portrait group near by is full of charm, and is moreover personal. Mr. Lavery's portrait of Miss Elsie will hardly contribute to his reputation. Mr. Melchers, Mlle. Breslau and Mlle. Bosnanka have notable qualities in their work, and add greatly to the high level of excellence attained in portrait painting. M. L. Simon's large interior of a church at Assisi, in spite of the masterly handling, the skill displayed in the broad masses of light and shade, and the style so much in evidence, is not very moving, and the scene might be equally well laid in Brittany. Precisely opposite is the dominant note of M. Cottet's Douleur. On the quay of a Breton sea-port, a corpse of a sailor has been washed ashore. Round the nude body stand sorrowing friends. All the attention is riveted upon the central figure of the sailor's mother, a Mater Dolorosa, swooning in grief; at the feet and head stand old, weather-beaten fishermen. All these figures are in shadow, and are silhouetted against a leaden grey sky. The only note of colour is the deep red of the sails, sharply defined by the last rays of the setting sun. In spite of certain minor defects this modern Pieta holds you spellbound by its sincerity of feeling.

Landscape is well represented by M. N. Sidaner's poetic rendering of Hampton Court, seen at the fascinating hour of twilight, when nature takes on an opal tint, and by M. Ménard's studies of the Matterhorn, full of the distinguished style that is his own. Mr. J. Morrice has four small pictures, all permeated by his unusually refined colour sense. M. Roger sees Venice in pearly grey, M. A. Smith very obviously, and M. Twill through picture postcards.

M. C. Delvaille's panel is rather summary, and is less satisfactory than his nude study, one of the few examples here. In his "Guinguette," M. S. Veber should feel gratified at the laughter his picture raises. He is a Parisian Breughel, and has an original scheme of colour and design. Before leaving, M. Bernard Boutet de Monvel's five portraits deserve mention, for the merit of the drawing and originality of idea; also M. Dauchez' plains of Brittany, full of atmosphere and character.

Communications.

MR. McKENNA'S OPPORTUNITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—From more than one point of view Mr. McKenna's appointment as Sir John Fisher's chief is more important than that of any previous First Lord of the Admiralty for a whole generation. We have heard the usual banalities about the round man in the square hole, and ignorance of the technical details of his high office. There is much to be said for our English system of placing a statesman of distinction over the permanent staff of State Departments, but this is not the place to say it. When Mr. McKenna takes his seat at the head of the table in the oak-wainscotted Board-room at the Admiralty, he will already have discovered that one of the difficulties confronting him will be the overdue demarkation of the boundary between policy and administration. Mr. Balfour's Ministry in some measure, and Lord Tweedmouth to a greater extent, sought to thrust upon the Sea Lords responsibility which belongs to the Cabinet. There is reason to believe that on more than one occasion the Board of Admiralty have refused to relieve the Cabinet of responsibility for naval policy, which can only be determined after national policy is declared.

Whatever his defects or advantages, Mr. McKenna goes to the Admiralty better equipped for the performance of the duties of the First Lord than the majority of his predecessors, owing to his financial training at the Treasury. No statesman can properly discharge the duties of the head of the Admiralty who has not mastered the strategical value of national credit, which is determined mainly by national expenditure. In the formula "instant readiness for war" the average naval "expert" is inclined to lay stress upon material and personnel, and too often ignores the fact that peace strategy in finance is as essential to success in war as war strategy or tactics after hostilities have broken out. Mr. McKenna's appointment as First Lord is accompanied by a rumbling volume of menace lest he should reduce expenditure. None of the critics, so far as I know, have any misgiving as to whether the existing expenditure at the Admiralty is capable of division into

(1) That which is essential to national safety, and

(2) That which is not.

Mr. McKenna needs to be a strong man with a cool head if he intends to enforce more economical methods of carrying on the Service of the Fleet, not because of Sea Lords who know, but of "patriots" who don't. Still, he will be encouraged in his quest for increasing efficiency at lower cost by recalling the history of some of the money squandered at the Admiralty during the last decade. In all cases they have been the result of patriotic pressure from those who thought they knew what wise naval policy should be. Let Mr. McKenna, for instance, call for a return of the real cost of the bricks and mortar at Dover, Gibraltar, and Malta during the last eight years. If the money wasted on masonry protection for men-of-war were in the Treasury to-day, or if a quarter of it had been spent on organising a systematic patrol by additional destroyers and submarines in home waters, it is undeniable that the country would be in a far stronger position to face the next war than she is to-day.

I will take yet another example of money wasted because the First Lord of the Admiralty of the day had neither the insight nor the force of character needed to resist the demands of extravagant and short-sighted technical advisers. Twelve millions sterling were spent on building the "County" class of cruiser; but if Mr. McKenna were to summon the eighteen captains of those ships one by one to his room at Whitehall, he would learn that, in the opinion of those who command them in battle, under existing conditions of naval warfare, the "County" ships belong to a class to which peace is a necessity.

I have now cited two examples of money wasted under the strong impulse of public opinion to spend money somehow on the Navy, even when spent uselessly. The present Sea Lords have effected greater economies afloat and ashore than any previous Board, and they deserve all praise for their exertions. The economies that they have effected, however, have been more or less the result of sporadic efforts by amateurs. The saving made, for example, by insisting on small repairs being done at sea is, in part at all events, annulled by the increase in the pay and numbers of retired Admirals. Every penny that we spend on the Navy, whether on buttons or on guns, on second-class boys or on Admirals, should be directed towards the creation of fighting efficiency. That is the test which Sir John Fisher has accepted as the touchstone of naval administration. Nevertheless, the naval service afloat has no incentive to economy, provided the hard-and-fast regulations of the department are complied with. Nobody gets kudos or promotion for saving the nation's shillings. In a large establishment, good housekeeping produces the best results to host and guests at the lowest cost. There is room for the introduction of the spirit of the thrifty housekeeper into the Navy. That the waste of food is enormous anyone can see for himself who has watched a big fleet at anchor. To present the argument for economy in one sentence, it is merely necessary to say that naval expenditure now, as ever, is divided into that which is productive of fighting efficiency and that which is not. I have no sympathy with the unintelligent cry for reduction which ignores the paramount necessity of maintaining a proper standard of naval strength. For discriminate economy there is still an ample field, even though more money is spent on coal and other things indispensable for fitness in war.

As Mr. McKenna has surveyed Britain's defences from the Treasury standpoint, he is familiar with the bearing of the recent military changes on the naval position. He knows that Mr. Haldane's new Territorial soldiers are not trained to encounter picked foreign troops, and that since the Militia has disappeared the responsibility attaching to the Navy of maintaining the virginity of these shores has increased since the passing of the Territorial Act. At the same time, every man in the Territorial Force is a missionary of the idea that money should be spent on the "Home Guards." Every penny laid out on non-essentials on the Army is taken either from the Navy, or social reform, or, without necessity, from the pockets of the people; but the curtailment of superfluous outlay, however well justified, will be met by a storm of ignorant and interested declamation from those who confuse cost and results. It cannot be too frequently explained that the principal danger ahead of this country is not the lack of ships or seamen, but of credit maimed by extravagance in time of peace and, perhaps, unintelligent patriotism. Mr. McKenna can do much to support the Chancellor of the Exchequer to enhance the strength of this country in time of peril, and, with some intimate knowledge of the facts, I venture to express a hope that the new First Lord will take his courage in both hands and face the inevitable storm of obloquy that will break upon him when he co-operates with the Treasury to place the credit of this country in a stronger position, and to shame the War Office into a wiser mood.

Lastly, there is a way by which the new First Lord can strengthen our naval power without the outlay of a penny. The state of the Channel Fleet is unsatisfactory. Two of the Admirals are not on speaking terms. The Beresford-Scott signal incident was merely a symptom of unrest and indiscipline that should be removed forthwith at any cost to individuals. Not more "Dreadnoughts," but more discipline, is required. Defective gunnery and the low place of the Channel Fleet on the gunnery returns speak for themselves. Both sides have appealed to the public Press. Open bids for popularity have been made at the cost of war efficiency. The system of granting week-end leave in the Channel Fleet has reached danger point. Leave, of course, is enormously popular with the men, but unless the enemy are kind enough to attack us on a Wednesday or Thursday the Fleet stands a good chance of being unprepared. Absentees on Saturday, Sunday, and part of Monday think of something else than their duty on Friday and Tuesday. The expenditure of thirty millions sterling on the Navy would not strengthen the Fleet to such an extent as the restoration of order in the squadron upon which the first brunt of battle would fall. And the increase of national credit by rigid economy, if obtained, will do more to strengthen our Sea Power than lavishness in speculative outlay.—Yours, &c.,

ONE WHO KNOWS.

April 22nd, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

MARTIAL LAW IN NATAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Every lover of justice, freedom, and legality must have been grateful for the article on "The Rebellion of Natal" in your issue of March 28th. The action of Mr. Moor and his colleagues forces us to ask how long is the Home Government to persist in a policy of non-interference while a handful of men claiming to represent, but, in fact (as we have good reason to believe) misrepresenting the small white population of the Colony, are bringing discredit upon our Colonial system and dishonour upon the British flag?

What are the facts? Early in December last martial law was proclaimed in Zululand (unhappily annexed to the Colony in 1897) and in the Northern districts of Natal. This proclamation, as abundantly appears from the Blue-book of January last, and as has been expressly admitted by Ministers in answer to questions in the House of Commons, was issued contrary to the advice of the Governor, and has been maintained in force against the expressed wishes of the Colonial Secretary. So strongly, indeed, did Sir M. Nathan feel on this matter that he pointed out to Mr. Moor that "the continued maintenance of martial law tended to bring the civil law into contempt, and to prove the Government devoid of moral power" (Cd. 3,888, p. 218). And what, Sir, is "martial law"? I know no better statement of it than that contained in the joint opinion of the law officers of the Crown in 1838, Sir John Campbell and Sir R. M. Rolfe (each of whom subsequently became Lord Chancellor) addressed to the Governor of Canada, and quoted in Forsyth's cases and opinions on Constitutional law, at p. 198. There we read: "Martial law is stated by Lord Hale to be in truth no law, but something rather indulged than allowed as a law, and it can only be tolerated because, by reason of open rebellion, the enforcing of any other law has become impossible. It cannot be said in strictness to supersede the ordinary tribunals, inasmuch as it only exists by reason of those tribunals having been already practically superseded. . . . The right of resorting to such an extremity is a right arising from and limited by the necessity of the case—quod necessitas cogit, defendit." Lord Alverstone had, I imagine, this opinion in his mind when, speaking in the House of Lords in April, 1902, he said, "The foundation of martial law is necessity." (See "Hansard," vol. 105, p. 123., vol. 106, p. 1,155.) In January, 1867,

Lord Carnarvon issued a celebrated Circular Despatch to Colonial Governors, which the present Government caused to be reprinted in the Natal Blue-book of May, 1906 (Cd. 2,905). Here we read that martial law "is a measure which can only be justified by overruling considerations of public safety, and must be accepted as a lamentable alternative to the anarchy and social confusion which would otherwise ensue." In particular, it is laid down that to justify martial law there must be "men in armed resistance" to the authority of the Crown. Agreeably with this, Lord Elgin telegraphed to Sir M. Nathan, on December 27th last: "Martial law ought never to be extended to any district where there is not armed resistance to the authority of the Crown which cannot be dealt with by the military acting merely in aid of the civil power in the ordinary manner." (Cd. 3,888, p. 194.)

Now, Sir, there is no pretence for saying that any of the conditions which justify the proclamation of martial law existed in Zululand or the Northern Districts of Natal in December last, or have come into existence since that date. Mr. Moor's Government coolly decided "to maintain martial law pending the arrest of criminals and further search for arms," purposes for which, as Lord Elgin promptly pointed out, the maintenance of martial law is entirely unjustifiable (Cd. 3,888, Nos. 99 and 100). Nevertheless, as Mr. Churchill stated in answer to a question put by me in the House of Commons on February 12th last, "Martial law remains in force in Zululand, despite the view of the Governor and the Secretary of State that it is not required"; and Mr. Moor has publicly expressed his determination to continue it until the Natal Parliament has met and passed an Act of Indemnity.

It comes to this, therefore: that the Ministers of a Colony which has been granted a Constitution by the Imperial Parliament can at any time, by a stroke of the pen, set aside that Constitution for an indefinite period, suspend all civil rights, and govern by martial law, which, as Lord Hale said, is not law at all, but only the will of the military authorities; and then, at their own good time, they will come to the Imperial Government, as they did in 1906, and demand, as of right, that Government's assent to an Act of Indemnity to cover all acts of violence and illegality done under that entirely unconstitutional proclamation of martial law. The Imperial Government, it seems, is to have no say in that matter at all, although, if the unhappy Zulus had been provoked into a rising (and one can hardly resist the suggestion that such was the intention of Colonel McKenzie's invasion of their territory), this country would have been immediately called upon to supply troops to put down the rebellion! And when members of Parliament, jealous for law and liberty and constitutional government, and the honour of our Empire, venture to put questions on these subjects to the representative of the Colonial Office in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister of the Colony characterises such questions as "damnable interference"!

Sir, I have come to the limits of my space, otherwise I should have liked to say something about the case of the miserable chief, Tilonko, now undergoing a sentence of ten years' deportation to St. Helena. This man was tried by court-martial in July, 1906, at which date not only had all native disturbances in Zululand subsided, but the two Houses of Legislature in the Colony had actually passed an Act of Indemnity. That Act was obviously intended to apply to all things done previously to its receiving the sanction of the Colonial Legislature; yet, inasmuch as it did not receive the Royal Assent here (an assent which, I venture to think, ought not to have been given without inquiry into all the circumstances) until October 1st, 1906, it was held to apply to this unhappy chief, who, though he had been sentenced on evidence of a most unsatisfactory character, was thus deprived (for so the Act provides) of all right of appeal. You, Sir, have pointed out, in the admirable article to which I have referred, how the present state of things affects the paramount chief, Dinizulu, to whom this country lies under special obligations to secure justice and fair play. Much more will have to be said upon that subject later on.

In conclusion, I would urge three things. First, that the Government, before giving their assent to another Act of Indemnity in Natal, should, at least, give facilities for the discussion in the House of Commons of all these matters of grave constitutional importance; secondly, that, as you suggest, an Imperial Commission of Inquiry should be appointed; and, thirdly, that Zululand should be constituted a native reserve on the model of Basutoland.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE GREENWOOD.

House of Commons,
April 13th, 1908.

P.S.—Lord Carnarvon's Circular Despatch already referred to states that the entire responsibility for the proclamation of martial law, and for the withdrawal of such proclamation at any moment, rests with the Colonial Governor. I was informed, however, in answer to a question which I put to the Under-Secretary for Colonial Affairs, that this applies only to Crown Colonies, and that in the case of a self-governing colony the Governor is bound to act in accordance with the advice of his Ministers. I venture to think that this question requires further consideration. I would submit, though with much diffidence, that when the Governor is clearly of opinion that the proclamation of martial law is unjustifiable, not only has he the right, but it is his duty, as the representative of the Crown, to refuse to issue such a proclamation. He would, of course, have to be prepared to face the resignation of his Ministers—a by no means unprecedented situation.

THE "CRUX" IN "THE TEMPEST."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"He was not of an age, but for all time," so that a reply to a letter about him which appeared at the end of February is not too late at the end of April.

The passage in "The Tempest" III., i., 13-15, is really no crux at all. Mr. N. W. Hill creates a difficulty by quoting the folio thus:—

"Most busy, least when I do it."

(with a comma after busy, none after least, and an inserted a in the latter word), whereas it really reads:—

"Most busie lest, when I doe it."

The comma was used in Elizabethan English, as in modern German, to mark off a subordinate clause. The word "lest" is excluded from that clause, and closely connected with "busie." "Busie lest" makes no sense, but is an obvious misprint for "busiest." It is quite easy to see how this came about. The two letters l and i were as easily confused in rapidly written manuscript in Shakespeare's time as to-day. Shakespeare himself neglected the ligatures between his letters, neglected the dot over the i, and sometimes wrote it larger than an adjacent l. (For instance, in the first signature to his will, the first i is larger than the second l, and has no dot; and none of his signatures has its full complement of ligatures.) Let the word "busiest" have stood in his MS. as "bus iest" or "bus ie st," with no ligature after the first s (as in his two signatures on the deeds of the Blackfriars house, and the third signature to his will), and perhaps none before the second s (for he used the tall form of this letter, which does not join very readily in either direction, and in the Blackfriars signatures stands quite disconnected), let the copyist or compositor have written "busie," looked again carelessly at his copy and mistaken "iest" for "lest," and the folio misprint is explained. The first folio contains thousands of similar errors. The sense of:

"I forget:
But these sweet thoughts do even refresh my labour,
Most busiest when I do it."

is perfectly limpid. The context shows that Ferdinand is resuming his work after a short rest. He says, "I am forgetting my labour: but even my labour is refreshed by these sweet thoughts—indeed, they are busiest when I am doing it." What could be simpler? It merely gives a new turn to what he has already said:—

"The mistress which I serve quickens what's dead,
And makes my labours pleasures."

The occurrence, too, in this earlier passage, of the phrase "my labours," explains how the careless copyist, seven lines later, came to turn "my labour" into the plural. Even grammatically the lines are correct and clear; "most busiest" is a predicative epithet referring back to "sweet thoughts," the subject of the sentence. Very few of the suggested emendations are equally correct, and nearly all of them (such as Speddings' "most busiest when idlest," with the similar attempts of Bray, the Cambridge editors, Verplanck, Rolfe, and others) make Ferdinand say the very opposite of what he has been saying in the preceding lines. Mr. John Bullock's "busiliest" is more wanton still, since it destroys both sense and rhythm. What again has Scipio's remark, that he was never so little at leisure as when out of office, to do with this passage? Ovid's reference to the girls with Proserpine, and the lines from Terence, are almost equally wide of the mark. Truly a variorum Shakespeare is a monument to human perversity and misplaced scholarship!

Fuldera, Graubünden, E. W. Lummis, Pfarrer.
April 16th, 1908.

THE GARROTTING FALLACY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As you are aware, one of the commonest fallacies which goes the rounds of the Press is that relating to the alleged effect of the lash upon garrotting. One is almost weary of answering the oft-refuted statement, but if you can find room for the following extract from "Mysteries of Police and Crime," by Major Arthur Griffiths (who has just died), perhaps we shall hear less of the garrotting fallacy in the future. Major Griffiths, who was for many years a prison governor, and afterwards an Inspector of Prisons, writes:—

> "Garrotte robberies are still of common occurrence in the lonely streets at all hours, and the process is much the same. While one practitioner throttles, the other rifles. Through the winter of 1895-6 they were most numerous in the Borough, and no less than fifty were committed in a couple of months. They were the work of a number, all of whom were eventually taken into custody. . . . The streets of London are to this day strangely insecure."

This was written at a time when the amount of flogging under the Garrotting Act of 1863 had almost reached its highest point. For fuller particulars I would refer your readers to "Facts About Flogging," by the Hon. Secretary of the Humanitarian League, 53, Chancery Lane, London. Several years ago this League published a challenge on the subject. It has been circulated throughout the English-speaking world, and, so far, has not been answered.—Yours, &c.,

April, 1908. Criminologist.

"THE PRACTICAL RECONSTRUCTION OF COUNTRY LIFE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In political and social action, as well as in that of other spheres, faith must go before, or at least accompany, the same, if it is to be effective at all. As I have shown before, Mr. Montague Fordham seems in his treatment of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act to alternately—

> "Damn with faint praise . . . ."

be

> "Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike," or else to commit himself to wholesale and open condemnation, as "a law so complicated in form and dilatory in its procedure that most of us turn from it in disgust" (The Nation, January 25th). As an old social worker and Liberal, I cannot help feeling that the one thing to condemn is the attitude of your correspondent. In this matter I am making no personal attack; the way Mr. Montague Fordham looks at it is, I am afraid, that of the Socialistic Party generally, and it would be easy to substitute other names for that of Mr. Fordham. It is quite time that the workers in the Liberal camp, for the economic and social betterment of the people at large, should speak out plainly, as being those who have borne the burden and heat of the day. They have, in the darkest hour, steadily laboured for the new order in rural England, which is so greatly a restoration of an older order than that largely in possession. It is the belittling of the work of those who have gone before, and the "without sneering, teaching the rest to sneer," that is the worst side of the new Socialism. It is quite true that the older Land Acts for the benefit of the agricultural labourer and the "small man" were difficult to put into effective operation in localities where legislative help was most needed; but still I could point to good work done again and again. The Act, however, that had its "appointed day" on January 1st last has, to a very large extent, removed or lessened the difficulty. It is quite possible to make land tenure too easy, and so weaken initial powers and, above all, the discipline of individual and united action on the part of the would-be beneficiaries. What Mr. Fordham largely forgets is that the land in this country is already in ownership, occupation, and cultivation. There are lines of continuity spread all over; these may be gradually altered and bent, but the Socialistic policy makes for their destruction, not alteration. Again, while Mr. Fordham is ready to make use of the Liberal land charter, in his letter he carefully refrains from even a line of acknowledgment of the indebtedness of labour to that great party in the Commonwealth; while, in action, Socialists are being put up on all possible occasions in order to turn out Liberal holders of seats in Parliament. This can only be because Socialists believe the Liberal Party to be hostile to the betterment of the people, and an impediment to their progress. All this comes from the impossible conception of clearing out the old and setting up the new by the wave of a wand ungifted with magical powers. At the same time there is necessarily a call on local authorities, as well as the central, to perform impossibilities—to take land at a moment's notice, without a moment's consideration of present ownership, and above all, occupation; to ignore all existing interests and rights. I am persuaded that if local associations and committees of Liberals will systematically take the thing in hand (as I tried to set forth in the late "Tribune"), there will not be need for further setting up of machinery outside an Act which is ready to provide for and acknowledge combination and co-operation. Agricultural experts and experiment plots can be overdone. After all, what we want is a return to the simple outdoor rural life of a householder and his family providing primarily for home consumption before they think about profits by sales. By all means keep the authorities under the new Land Act up to their work; but that is quite another thing to hustling them and trying to drive them to a motor-speed which would lead to more harm than good in results.—Yours, &c.,

J. Frome Wilkinson.
Barley Rectory, April 21st, 1908.

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the article on Mr. Tree's "Merchant of Venice," which appeared in your issue of the 11th inst., it is stated that "if the action were followed quite literally, no twentieth century audience, gentle or simple, would endure it." Allow me to point out that this play was in fact produced, almost verbatim, and without scenery, by the Elizabethan Stage Society, at the King's Theatre, Fulham, in May, 1907. The performances were public ones; whether they were successful financially I do not know, but when I was there the theatre appeared fairly full, and a mixed audience was certainly appreciative. Personally I enjoyed it more, on the whole, than any Shakespearian production I have ever seen, and I have seen almost all that have been given in London during the last twenty years.

Of the Shakespearian productions at His Majesty's Theatre it is difficult for any lover of Shakespeare to speak with patience. One such person, at any rate, after he had witnessed the disastrous mangling of "A Winter's Tale," when fragments of the text were gabbled to an accompaniment of processions, songs, dances, and real waterfalls, resolved that he would never see another. Mr. Tree's attitude towards Shakespeare has been admirably treated by Mr. Bernard Shaw in several of the articles which are reprinted in "Dramatic Essays and Opinions" (see, for instance, Vol. II., pp. 375-8), though the best of all his articles on the subject, "The Dying Tongue of Great Elizabeth" ("Saturday Review," February 11th, 1905), is not, unluckily, included in those volumes.—Yours, &c.,

April 21st, 1908. H. V. R.

PROTECTION AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The crop of letters which the article of "J. A. H." on the tariff as a cure for unemployment has brought forth makes it quite evident that any attempt to deal with the problem by reference to an isolated industry will land the Free Trader in a dangerous morass of half-truths, and Mr. Frank Bowly is right in pointing to the danger of allowing the enemy to make his own rules for the game.

May we not sum up the case against the Tariff as a cure for unemployment thus:—

Employment in any country depends ultimately upon the national income, for it is from the national income that the wages fund and the power to consume are derived. No employment is possible without these two factors, and employment is strictly limited by the combined effect of both.

Now, the national income is relatively greater or smaller, according to the productivity of the national industry, and the national industry is most productive when it follows the lines of least resistance. But the effect of a protective tariff is to prevent it following the lines of least resistance, and to force it into channels through which it would not naturally flow.

In other words, under a state of Free Trade or free imports, industry specialises upon the production of those commodities which for the least expenditure of energy it can obtain the highest exchange value, and in so doing capital and labour are most efficiently employed.

The effect of a tariff, however, is to lower the exchange value of the product of national industry, and by so doing to reduce the national income on which the wage fund and the effective demand for commodities depend.

Thus we see that a protective tariff must bring about lessened employment.

It may be argued that effective national demand may be added to by an effective foreign demand; the reply is that a tariff tends to prevent this additional foreign demand by shutting off the commodities which would flow into the country in payment therefor. It may also be argued that the wages fund might be increased by the influx of foreign capital; but that influx would depend on the probability of its profitable employment, which, in its turn, would depend on the productivity of the national industry. But the effect of a tariff is to decrease this productivity by lowering its exchange value. Thus Protection is bound to operate against the inflow of capital and consequent increase of the wages fund.—Yours, &c.,

FORREST HEWIT.

Strathcarn, Bury Old Road, Manchester,
April 15th, 1908.

WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you permit me to make clear to "A Woman Conservative" that any divergence of opinion now existing among the various suffrage societies refers only to the methods chosen by them for enforcing the claim of woman's suffrage, not to the basis on which they are asking for enfranchisement? With the exception of the Adult Suffrage Society, all the women's suffrage societies are asking for the vote "on the same terms as it is, or may be, granted to men." This would, on the present franchise, give the vote to about two and a quarter millions of women, and would not disqualify married women by reason of their being married, but only if they did not possess the necessary qualification for the vote.

Your correspondent fears that a possible difference of political opinion between a husband and wife, both enfranchised, would embitter their relations, and cause disunion in the home. But, Sir, this result may be reached in any home by a difference of opinion about a child's education or the weekly dole of money allowed for housekeeping, both of which are fruitful sources of much bitterness of feeling between husbands and wives. If married happiness can survive these continual sources of irritation, which are not diminished by the influence of unrepealed laws that withhold from the married woman the legal guardianship of her own children, and the legal right to maintenance by her husband, it will certainly survive the woman's possession of the power to work for such legislation as will tend to dignify rather than to depreciate the status of woman in the home.

The point that woman's sweated labour will only be cured by strong combination on the part of women workers is an argument for, and not against, agitating for the speedy enfranchisement of women. It is true, as "A Woman Conservative" says, that men owe much to the strength of their trades unions; but they had their trades unions before they had their votes, and it is only since they possessed the latter that they have been able to enforce the claims of labour. Women to-day have their unions—the Teachers' Union, for instance, contains far more women members than men—yet women are unable to obtain equal salaries with men for equal work.

It is only when strong combination is backed up by political power that labour is effectually protected. That social reformers are of this opinion, and do not hold with "A Woman Conservative" that it would be better to agitate for anti-sweating legislation than for the vote, is indicated by the significant fact that the "Suffragettes" include among them large numbers of women who have spent many years of their lives in trying, without the vote, to secure better conditions for women's labour, and have now thrown in their lot with those who place their enfranchisement before every other reform.—Yours, &c.,

B. C. S.

April 13th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "E. P.," has missed the point of the Women Suffragists' campaign against the Government. The National Women's Social and Political Union oppose the Liberal nominee at all bye-elections simply because he represents a Government that will not give women the vote. There is no "spite" against the Government, or against men in general, in a purely political opposition of this kind. The Irish Party pursued the same policy; so did the Roman Catholics at Peckham; so might the Jews in North-West Manchester, an they chose. But when women follow the example of men politicians they are told that they "are using all their influence against their principles to spite their oppressors." Is this quite a fair thing to say of any body of politicians because the principle they uphold does not happen to be the one to which their opponents give the pre-eminence?—Yours, &c.,

A. KELLY.

Westminster, April 13th, 1908.

[Several letters on the above subject are unavoidably held over until next week.—ED., THE NATION.]

Poetry.

THE FORSAKEN ROOM.

THE Mirror gleams: "I saw, but will I tell?"
A pin: "She dropped me, pity my despair!"
A comb: "I glow—was burnished in her hair"—
A rose plucked for her wafts: "Her lips did spell
What I will not repeat, who loved to dwell
Close to the little cross that nestled where Sorrow for Wrong, and Courage 'neath Despair
In her warm blood leapt—leapt unconquerable!"

Swallows rejoice to build beneath these eaves
Where jasmine clings; the sun among its leaves
(All fluttered, for she pressed them back last night)
Traces in sweet deceptive light and shade
Her head, upon the pillow where 'twas laid—
Her fingers, on the book where she did write.

J. MARJORAM.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE form of Mr. Bernard Shaw's new play, "Marriage," represents, in its original setting at all events, a new departure in dramatic composition. It was written in one act, which must occupy over two hours on the stage. Of course, a division may be made, but those who have read the play think that it will well bear the shape its author originally gave it.

* * *

IN an article on "The Neglect of Irish Writers," in an American Catholic magazine, Miss Katharine Tynan says some very severe things about the want of literary culture among Irish people. The Irish literary movement is, she holds, only a one-sided revival, for although the writers have come, they find no readers among Irish people or elsewhere. Few of those who have any real knowledge of Irish life will agree with this view. Ireland is a poor country, but it spends a fair proportion upon books, and volumes by writers such as Mr. W. B. Yeats, Mr. George Russell, Dr. Hyde, Father Sheehan, Miss Emily Lawless, Miss Jane Barlow, and Dr. Barry may be seen in most Irish houses. Still wider of the mark is the verdict expressed in the following sentences: "This neglect of Irish writers is a thing that moves the sæva indignatio to think upon. The Irish are talking still of the '48 men who wrote verses à servir. There was not a born literary man among them except John Mitchell."

* * *

MISS TYNAN seems to have forgotten one at least of the contributors to "The Nation," and "The United Irishman" who, if not a born literary man, was born a man of genius and a poet—James Clarence Mangan. The current number of "The Dublin Review" contains an interesting article on Mangan, written by the late Sir Charles Gavan Duffy shortly before his death. Duffy knew Mangan well, and when "The Nation" was founded in 1842 he chose Mangan as one of the contributors. Among other things established in the article are the fact that while Mangan drank to excess, he was not at any time an opium-eater, as has often been stated. The real facts about Mangan's love affair, which were told for the first time in Duffy's reminiscences, are repeated here, and the mistakes in Mitchell's version pointed out. The life of the author of "Dark Rosaleen," which has been well told by Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, was one of the saddest in the history of literature. He was a true poet, though his reputation suffers from the mass of inferior work he produced owing to his writing under the bitter lash of necessity.

* * *

UNDER the title "Napoleon and His Fellow-Travellers," Mr. Clement Shorter will issue next autumn, through Messrs. Cassell, a reprint, with notes and elucidations, of the more important of the pamphlets written by eye-witnesses of Napoleon's experiences on the "Bellerophon" and the "Northumberland," the latter being the vessel that carried him from Plymouth to St. Helena. Among the pamphlets contained in the volume is that issued by Warden, the surgeon of the "Northumberland," which went through twenty editions during Napoleon's lifetime, but has not been reprinted for eighty years. In annotating this pamphlet Mr. Shorter has had the help of Warden's son, who is still alive. Another interesting item is the privately printed pamphlet which was circulated among his friends by the third Lord Lyttelton, giving an account of two conversations he had with Napoleon while the "Northumberland" was lying off Plymouth. This latter pamphlet is exceedingly rare—it is not to be found in the British Museum—as only fifty copies were printed. Mr. Shorter's volume should make a most interesting addition to the vast mass of Napoleonic literature.

* * *

THE aim of Mrs. Flora Annie Steel's "India Through the Ages," which Messrs. Routledge have in preparation, is to give a popular account of Indian history which will steer a middle course between the attitude towards Indian affairs taken by British statesmen and soldiers, and that which presents itself to the mind of a patriotic native. Mrs. Steel is eminently qualified for such a task. Apart from their artistic merits, her novels are remarkable for the knowledge they show of native and English life, and for their insight and balance.

* * *

A PROMISING biography which is shortly to be issued by Mr. John Lane is "The Life of Sir Halliday Macartney," by Mr. Demetrius C. Boulger. Sir Halliday Macartney's career was a remarkable one. He founded the first Chinese arsenal, commanded Li Hung Chang's forces during the Taeping rebellion, was Secretary to the first Chinese Embassy to Europe, and for thirty years remained Secretary and Councillor to the Chinese Legation in London. His knowledge of the inner working of Chinese diplomacy and of Far Eastern affairs was equalled only by that of Sir Robert Hart. As he left behind him a mass of important letters and papers, Mr. Boulger's work should add greatly to our knowledge of the attitude adopted by China towards European countries. In particular, we are promised much fresh light on the Sun Yat Sen case, and on the war with France over Tonking.

* * *

SIR HARRY JOHNSTON'S long-promised book, "George Grenfell and the Congo," is now in the printer's hands, and will be issued by Messrs. Hutchinson in a few weeks. The book should attract considerable attention, for Grenfell left behind him a number of diaries and papers bearing on the condition of the Congo Free State, and these, together with such material as the Baptist Missionary Society could obtain from Grenfell's colleagues, have been placed at Sir Harry Johnston's disposal. After Stanley, Grenfell was the leading explorer of the Congo Basin, and he also explored the Cameroons. Sir Harry Johnston is specially qualified to write on Grenfell's life and work, as he has been Consul in the district where the late explorer laboured and made his acquaintance there. There are to be nearly three hundred illustrations, most of them reproductions of photographs taken by Grenfell himself.

* * *

AMONG books announced by the Oxford University Press as in active preparation are "The Works of Ben Jonson," edited by Professor C. H. Herford and Mr. P. Simpson; "The Works of Marlowe," edited by Professor Raleigh and Mr. C. F. Tucker Brooke; "Campion's Poetical Works," edited by Mr. Percival Vivian; "Donne's Poetical Works," edited by Mr. H. J. C. Grierson; and "Herrick's Poetical Works," edited by Mr. G. S. Gordon.

* * *

BY the death of M. Emile Gebhardt, on Wednesday last, the French Academy loses one of its most distinguished members. M. Gebhardt had, in addition to profound scholarship, an unusual power of imparting freshness and vitality to his historical studies. His works on the Italian Renaissance—a period which especially attracted him—have been widely read. They have all the accuracy of the modern scientific historian, and at the same time reproduce the atmosphere of the period, and abound in picturesque details. M. Gebhart was born in 1839; he belonged to the Faculty of Letters at Nancy from 1865 to 1879, whence he was called to be Professor of the Literatures of Southern Europe at Paris. He became a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences in 1895, and was elected to the French Academy in 1904.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Early London." By Sir Walter Besant. (Black. 30s. net.)

"African Notes and Reminiscences." By F. C. Selous. With a Foreword by President Roosevelt. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"My Father: An Aberdeenshire Minister 1812-1891." By W. Robertson Nicoll. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. net.)

"The Gospel of Pain." By Thomas J. Hardy. (Bell. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Tree of Heaven." By Robert W. Chambers. (Constable. 6s.)

"Mémoires de la Comtesse de Boigne." Publiés d'après le manuscrit original par Charles Nicoullaud. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7 fr. 50.)

"Deutschland und die grosse Politik anno 1907." Von Prof. Dr. Schiemann. (Berlin: Reimer. M. 7.)

By the Author of "The Opportunity of Liberalism."

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

The Manchester Guardian says: "Mr. Villiers's book does just what such a history ought to do—sets out clearly the main facts and personalities, but does not load the story with minutiæ, giving the main attention to a spirited account of the stream of tendencies which have expressed themselves in the more definite socialistic movement."

The Scotsman says: "Thoughtful, clearly written, and well based in the study of the severer socialistic literature, of which it provides a useful bibliography, the work cannot but prove of interest to readers in search of an introduction, at once informative and sympathetic, to this important subject."

THE STANDARD LIBRARY OF HISTORY.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS.

NEW VOLUME READY.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

(B.C. 29—A.D. 476.)

By H. STUART JONES, M.A. With Maps and many other Illustrations. 5s.

A complete list of the Volumes in the Story of the Nations, the greatest historical library in the world, will be sent post free on application to T. Fisher Unwin, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

PORTUGAL.

By H. MORSE STEPHENS, M.A. New Edition. With a new chapter dealing with the most recent events, by Major MARTIN HUME, and 5 new Illustrations, including Portraits of the late King and Crown Prince and the new King. 5s. (Nations series.)

HISTORY OF IRELAND TO THE COMING OF HENRY II.

By ARTHUR UA CLERIGH, M.A., K.C. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

This volume is complete in itself. It is a record of Irish history from the earliest times to 1171.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

A Record of his Life and Work.

By his Daughter, HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With an account of his Parliamentary Struggle, Politics, and Teachings, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON, M.P. New and Cheaper Edition. With New Introductory Chapter. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. Uniform with Mr. Morley's "Life of Richard Cobden."

LIFE OF GOETHE.

By HEINRICH DUNTZER. With Authentic Illustrations and Facsimiles. Cheap Edition. Cloth 2s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Charles Bradlaugh."

HISTORY OF CIVILISATION.

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 5s. net each.

Vol. I. HISTORY OF ANCIENT CIVILISATION.
Vol. II. HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL CIVILISATION.

A concise review of the development of European civilisation since the downfall o ie Roman Empire.

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM:

A Reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X.

Translated from the Italian by FATHER TYRRELL. 5s. net.

"Amidst the quickly growing mass of literature dealing with the Modernist Movement in the Roman Catholic Church, this little volume may, without hesitation, e singled out as the best source of information for those who want to know the cts in brief."—Manchester Guardian.

WILD HONEY FROM VARIOUS THYME.

By MICHAEL FIELD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"'Wild Honey' is one of the most delightful books that the last ten years have iven us, and should be read by every lover of poetry."—The Academy.

THE CANADIAN KIPLING.

THE SONGS OF A SOURDOUGH.

By ROBERT W. SERVICE. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"In 'Songs of a Sourdough' Mr. Service has got nearer to the heart of the ld-time-place miner than any other verse-maker in all the length and height of the reat Dominion."—The Morning Post.

MY LIFE IN THE OPEN.

By WILL H. OGILVIE, Author of "Fair Girls and Grey Horses." With an Introduction and a Portrait. 5s. net.

Vital impressions of open-air life in many parts of the world.

BRITISH BIRD LIFE.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, M.B.O.U., F.R.H.S. With an Introduction by SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., and over 50 Illustrations. Cheap Edition, 3s 6d.

Popular sketches of every species of bird which regularly nests in the British les.

LAST HOURS WITH NATURE.

By MRS. BRIGHTWEN. Edited by W. H. CHESSON. Profusely Illustrated. Cloth 2s. 6d. net.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT

Readers of The Nation will be interested in seeing a list of books written by members of the New Parliament.

Published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY.
"The Life of Richard Cobden."

Mr. JOHN BURNS.
In "Labour and Protection."

Mr. R. B. HALDANE.
"Army Reform."

Mr. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.
In "The Johnson Club Papers."

Mr. W. RUNCIMAN.
In "British Industries under Free Trade.

Mr. C. F. G. MASTERMAN.
"In Peril of Change," and
"The Heart of the Empire."

ORIENTAL CAMPAIGNS AND EUROPEAN FURLOUGHS.

The Autobiography of an Indian Mutiny Veteran.

By Col. EDWIN MAUDE, late H.M. 2nd (Leinster) Regiment. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"We have thoroughly enjoyed every page of these reminiscences of an old soldier."—Daily Graphic.

CRIMINAL APPEAL AND EVIDENCE.

By N. W. SIBLEY, B.A., LL.M., Joint Author of "International Law as interpreted during the Russo-Japanese War," 15s. net.

"Mr. Sibley's work is so exhaustive that its adoption as a text book by students may be confidently recommended."—Journal of Commerce.

HEALTH AT ITS BEST v. CANCER AND OTHER DISEASES.

By ROBERT BELL, M.B., M.D., F.F.P.S. 5s. net.

"A book to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest."—The Referee.

THE MOTOR CAR AND ITS ENGINE.

A Practical Treatise for Motor Engineers, including owners and chauffeurs.

By JOHN BATEY. Cloth, 5s. net.

SPECIAL EDITION.

THE MERMAID SERIES.

THE BEST PLAYS OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

LITERAL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE OLD TEXT.

With Photogravure Frontispieces.

A complete list of volumes and particulars of the special editions in preparation will be sent post free to any address on application to T. FISHER UNWIN, Adelphi Terrace, London.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London, W.C.

Reviews.

THE ENGLAND OF DOMESDAY.*

The eleventh century, as Professor Vinogradoff reminds us, was the turning-point in the evolution of the English social organism. Down to that date "we witness the stunted growth of a Teutonic State, which might have resulted in something more akin to the formation of Denmark or Norway than to that of England as it has come to be" From the eleventh century onward, "most of the great forces of English history—royalty, the landed aristocracy, the Church, local institutions—proceed on their course of development through many a momentous crisis, but without substantial break." A description of the English social organism at that date can therefore scarcely fail to be both interesting and valuable. We may perhaps doubt whether the cleavage of the eleventh century is quite as marked with regard to some of the great forces as it is with regard to others; whether, for instance, that particular century gave anything like so decided a twist to London and to Exeter as it did to rural landlordism; whether it controlled the subsequent development of trade so markedly as did some other centuries; or whether it deflected the course of religion and the Anglican Church as much as it did that of the military forces of the Crown. These and some other important features of the English social organism are designedly omitted from Professor Vinogradoff's survey. What he gives us is a valuable analysis, derived almost entirely from Domesday Book, of the organisation of the military forces, of the Governmental taxation, of the land tenure, of the husbandry, and of the relations between the different classes of rural society that prevailed at the end of the eleventh century. And so obscure are "the short barren abstracts of Domesday Book," and so little has yet been done in patient, systematic exploration of their mysteries, that—even after Maitland's brilliant studies, and the contributions of Mr. Round, Mr. W. H. Stevenson, Mr. Ballard, and others—this analysis constitutes a real advance in our understanding of the period.

To put it shortly, Professor Vinogradoff withholds his adherence from some of the widely accepted generalisations to which we have been treated in the last two or three decades. In his judgment the pendulum has swung too far. We cannot, it is true, nowadays reinstate in its supremacy the free village community of early Victorian archæology. But Professor Vinogradoff does not find the English rural township entirely organised from above, and completely dependent upon a landowning superior. With patient learning he insists on the evidence for lordless villages, for holdings not included in any manor, for a certain degree of corporate ownership by village communities; for the persistence of this and that remnant of Celtic, of Danish, or of Saxon village organisation, intermingling with the arrangements of the Norman lawyers. In the township, as distinguished from the manor, he has a very real faith. The "prolonged existence" of the township, and its "great hold on the people," are "traced back with perfect continuity to tribal ownership and custom." The traditions "start from the conquering tribes settling on the soil of Great Britain in the course of the mighty invasions and migrations of Germanic and Scandinavian warriors." From "the maegth and the guild," the township develops into the effective "unit of social organisation," with its "common rights in woods and pastures," and the joint ownership characteristic "of a very close agrarian community." These townships "assume duties in regard to taxation, police, and justice, for which they are held responsible by the general government of the country." They are "the links of a chain which appears more completely and clearly in the action of hundreds, wapentakes and shires." The ubiquitous system of manors was an altogether later development. "If we look to the antecedents of the manor in Anglo-Saxon times, we do not find a single institution corresponding to the Conquest manor, but we do find several institutions working each by itself"—the "ham" or centre of an estate, the "bocland" held on privileged tenure, the "soke" or jurisdictional franchise, and the element of "lordship"—which were destined to be combined into the manorial system, and superposed upon the still continuing township.

Professor Vinogradoff gives us many interesting details as to the hundred, which "for the bulk of the population . . . was the most common and active of the public institutions. . . The small landowners and tenants had not often to do with the shire moot; already in the eleventh century the latter was managed by a group of thanes, which might be likened to the county families of later days, well-to-do people, who could afford to appear at the sessions, and were able to exercise local influence. . . . It was different, to a certain extent, with the hundred. Its court met sufficiently often to transact a good deal of legal and administrative business." Small suitors really had to attend. "It was the congregation of the freemen . . . even the lowest classes being represented by their tithings, or at least by their chief pledges." A feature to which Professor Vinogradoff does not seem to have paid attention, so far at least as the present work is concerned, is the extent to which the hundred court stood in hierarchical relation to other courts of subordinate or at any rate more restricted jurisdiction. The organisation of this hierarchy of courts, and the relations of the halmote, or portmoot, or the leet of the village with the distant hundred court—such as we find exemplified, for instance at Berkeley, or Taunton, or Farnham—appear to deserve further study.

If we may venture a criticism on so learned a work by so great a scholar, it is that this picture of Society in the eleventh century suffers, in our judgment, from being drawn from too restricted a selection of sources. Professor Vinogradoff's acquaintance with what he calls "the short, barren abstracts of Domesday Book" is so profound that it is impossible to regret the absence of an exhaustive analysis of the whole of that invaluable record. The time ought to have passed for the use merely of illustrative examples gathered from that store, and for the citing of particulars of this or that country only. It is difficult to understand why Domesday Book has not been, by this time, microscopically and completely indexed for persons, places, and things, and why a complete analysis has not been made of each man's holdings, wherever situated, of everything relating to each particular place, whomsoever it concerns, of all the markets, of every reference to bees and pigs and ploughs, of every kind of court and officer, and so on. Only by means of such an exhaustive analysis can we gain assurance as to what is the rule and what is the exception. And the choice of materials suffers, too, from too narrow a restriction in time. Professor Vinogradoff is so keenly alive to the danger of mixing his centuries, and of ascribing to the eleventh what may have existed only in the twelfth and thirteenth, that he shuts his eyes to the many significant indications as to the manor and the township that are afforded by the records of later times. In the present work, he seems to have imposed upon himself the restriction of citing no source, and of using no material, subsequent to Domesday Book itself. But the English township and manor is spread out before us in six or seven centuries of life, much of which has been placed on record. We ought not to be above learning what some eleventh century institution really meant from a surviving village custom of the nineteenth or an unusually extended manor roll of the eighteenth century. Professor Vinogradoff himself has said elsewhere "that it would amount to a kind of scholarly self-annihilation to reconstruct the open-field arrangement of each period purely and solely on the strength of the evidence belonging to this period." What is true of the open-field system is true, also, of the township and the manor, the hundred and the shire. The "kind of scholarly self-annihilation" which prevents Professor Vinogradoff from enriching his picture of English Society in the eleventh century by all the indications that so great an authority could draw from the materials of the fifteenth, the seventeenth, and even the nineteenth, century, comes near to being an "actionable wrong" to historical science.

Sidney and Beatrice Webb.

* "English Society in the Eleventh Century: Essays in English Medieval History." By Professor Paul Vinogradoff. (Clarendon Press. 16s. net.)

SEVENTH THOUSAND.

MODERN EGYPT

By the EARL OF CROMER.

With Portrait and Map. Two Vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

F. C. SELOUS'S New Book

African Nature Notes and Reminiscences.

By F. C. SELOUS, F.Z.S., Author of "A Hunter's Wandering's in Africa," "Travel and Adventure in South East Africa." With a Foreword by President ROOSEVELT and Illustrations by E. H. CALDWELL. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Story of the Guides. By Col. C. J. YOUNGHUSBAND, C.B. With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A concise record of the busy career of service—the Mutiny, Kabul, Afghan War, 1878-80, Chitral, the Malakand, and minor wars—seen by the corps since, some sixty years ago, it was originated by Sir Henry Lawrence and raised by Sir Harry Lumsden.

Autobiography of Montagu Burrows, Captain R.N., Chichele Professor of Modern History, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. Edited by His Son, STEPHEN M. BURROWS. With Portraits. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. [Next week.

The Eversley Tennyson. Annotated by ALFRED LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM LORD TENNYSON. In 9 vols.

Vol. I. Poems, with Portrait. Vol. II. Poems. Vol. III. Enoch Arden and In Memoriam. Vol. IV. The Princess and Maud. Vol. V. Idylls of the King. Globe 8vo, 4s. net each.

National and Social Problems. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. April 28.

A volume of great and varied interest. These collected papers deal with European political problems of the highest moment and with questions of Labour, Unionism and Socialism.

General History of Western Nations from 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D. By EMIL REICH, Doctor Juris, Author of "New Student's Atlas of English History," etc. Part I. ANTIQUITY, Vols. I. and II. 8vo., 15s. net.

The two volumes treat (1) of the method of history; (2) of the great inland empires of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, the Hittites, &c.; (3) of the border nations called the Hebrews, the Phœnicians, and the Archaic Hellenes; (4) the historic Greeks; (5) the Romans.

Atlas Antiquus. In 48 Original Graphic Maps, with Elaborate Text to each Map, and full Index. By Dr. EMIL REICH. Crown 4to, 10s. net.

Herodotus, Books VII.—IX. With Introduction, Text, Apparatus, Commentary, Appendices, Indices, Maps. By REGINALD WALTER MACAN, D.Litt. 3 vols. 8vo, 30s. net. [Classical Library.

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

Herodotus, Books IV.—VI. By the same editor. In 2 vols. 8vo, Reduced to 20s. net.

Plays of Aeschylus. The Suppliant Maidens—The Persians—The Seven Against Thebes—The Prometheus Bound. Translated into English Verse by E. D. A. MORSHEAD, M.A. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Golden Treasury Series.

Highways & Byways in Hampshire. By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. CONNOR. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

Diary of John Evelyn. With Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3s. 6d. Or Limp Leather, 5s. net. [Globe Library.

H.M.I. Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, by E. M. SNEYD-KYNNERSLEY, formerly H.M.I. North-west Division. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A highly entertaining book, containing a large number of good stories told by a raconteur of exceptional ability.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

If you Live in the Country,
If you Love the Country,
READ

THE COUNTRY HOME

An Illustrated Monthly Magazine.	Price 6d. Net.	Now on Sale Everywhere.

¶ To all who have a common interest in the country, THE COUNTRY HOME will appeal. Illustrated articles on interesting homes with their surroundings. —Natural History.—Rural Industries.—Country Customs. —Garden and Greenhouse.—Poultry.—Insect Pests.—The Planning of Cottages and Buildings.—The Interior of the Home.—Furnishing.—The Gathering Together of Old Ornaments.

These are but a few of the subjects dealt with in THE COUNTRY HOME.

6s. NOVELS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

THE TREE OF HEAVEN

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS
Author of "The Younger Set."

MAROTZ. By JOHN AYSCOUGH.

THE ANCIENT LAW. By ELLEN GLASGOW.
Author of "The Deliverance."

A COMEDY OF MOODS. By GREVILLE H. TEMPANY.

THE DAUGHTER. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.
Author of "Conflict."

THE BURNING CRESSET. By HOWARD PEASE.
Author of "Magnus Sinclair."

THE BEST EXPLANATION OF THE SOCIALIST IDEA IS CONTAINED IN

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD

BY

H. G. WELLS. 6/-

Mr. BERNARD SHAW'S WORKS

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND. 6s.
CONTENTS: "John Bull's Other Island"; "How He Lied to Her Husband"; "Major Barbara."

MAN AND SUPERMAN. 6s.
A Comedy and a Philosophy, containing as well "The Revolutionist's Handbook" and "Maxims for Revolutionists."

PLAYS PLEASANT. 6s.
CONTENTS: (1) Arms and the Man. (2) Candida. (3) The Man of Destiny. (4) You never can Tell.

PLAYS UNPLEASANT. 6s.
CONTENTS: (1) Widowers' Houses. (2) The Philanderer. (3) Mrs. Warren's Profession.

THREE PLAYS FOR PURITANS. 6s.
CONTENTS: (1) The Devil's Disciple. (2) Cæsar and Cleopatra. (3) Captain Brassbound's Conversion.

CASHEL BYRON'S PROFESSION. 6s.
Being No. 4 of the Novels of his Nonage, containing also "The Admirable Bashville," and an Essay on Modern Prize-Fighting.

THE IRRATIONAL KNOT. A Novel. 6s.

THE COMMON SENSE OF MUNICIPAL TRADING. 2s. 6d.

THE PERFECT WAGNERITE.
A New Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS.
With the Author's Apology. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

London: A. CONSTABLE and Co., Ltd.

A MASTER IN ISRAEL.*

Ridding was, in fact, a Father of the Church long before he became a Bishop. When the See of Southwell was founded, and Gladstone had to find its first occupant, he knew, as he said, where to put his finger on the man. The difficulties were great. Two counties had been joined in a yoke under which both fretted. The see was unwieldy and its cathedral ill-placed. There was, as yet, no Chapter staff or endowment to provide one. Gladstone may well have thought that last difficulty to be temporary, and can hardly have foreseen that Ridding in the second, as in the first, great achievement of his life would find his most stubborn opponent in the selfish greed of ecclesiastical bodies.

When Ridding followed Moberley as Head Master of Winchester, the government of the school still lay with those whose pockets profited by starving it. The position was much the same as at Westminster, where, some years later, the Public Schools Commissioners told the Prebendaries, with polite circumlocution, that they were little better than thieves. At Winchester a slight reform had already been effected by the Oxford Commission of 1857. Another Commission was already sitting, and legislation was in the air. What line it took would depend upon what should be already done, and Ridding was determined that much should be already done before a Bill was framed. The Warden and Fellows might now have redeemed their character. It was the last thing they thought of. If Ridding asked for more class-rooms, it would reduce their dividends. If he claimed more space for cricket, it would interfere with their cows' pasture, and "all for the sake of boys." Such was the phrase of a governor of the school. It remained for Ridding to do the work with his own labour and at his own cost. His zeal and his success are set forth in vigorous narrative and with commendable pride by his wife's pen. The Warden and Fellows disappeared in a whirlwind, and old Wykehamists, who feared that Ridding was going to ruin the school, lived to reverence him as their Second Founder.

In 1889 Ridding was the guest of sixteen Fellows of Oxford colleges, who had been boys under him in his eight last years at Winchester. A crammer would despise his methods, but might envy his results. He was discursive in form. "One never knew," says one of his boys, "what was coming next." A theorist or an inspector, Matthew Arnold not least, would soon have called him to book; and his method is not for everybody. It succeeded with him because his mind was on the heights and his thoughts in sequence. Nor did he, in his sequence of thought, ever forget that boys are not of one mould. Some pedagogues strike their pupils with awe; some try to make them walk by themselves. Few can, as Ridding could, do both. The combination is due, as we believe, to what, in its full meaning, is one of the rarest qualities—intellectual sincerity. Most men find their truths where they seek them—Ridding sought the truth where it was. Here, in the next generation of schoolmasters, he found his successor in Rutherford. Intellectual sincerity is impossible in a little mind, and is not admired by little minds. It was not in Ridding to give the comforting solutions which a bishop of the present day distributes wholesale to his flock. We cannot wonder that, as his wife tells us, Ridding in the last years of his ministry "viewed the situation with some anxiety, and doubted whether the coming generation of Church leaders were adequately armed with learning and discernment to meet it." He who sets a trap for popularity may do so unconsciously, but his trap will recoil, if not upon himself, at any rate upon the society which he is supposed to represent. Nevertheless, there will always be many ready to comfort or to be comforted by some equivalent for "Mesopotamia."

Ridding was a close friend of Archbishop Benson, though, as Lady Laura Ridding superfluously informs us, "their theological views differed." We cannot read in her pages the ground of their friendship. A mind which could believe in omens must have been tuned to another string than his whom Benson described as a "Churchman who recognises progress and science." Ridding did much more than this. Throughout his life he stood firm for freedom of discussion and the right to form a conclusion. This is the full claim of intellectual Liberalism, which asks for no more, and is content with no less. Different men, and, indeed, the same man at different periods of his life, will reach different conclusions; but the method itself is the one principle that can never submit to change. It is the unwearying enemy of clericalism, and clericalism, though it has not always dared to say so, recognised its foe in Ridding. To the eyes of Montagu Burrows he seemed, in 1864, "the most dangerous man in Oxford." And such he was to the end. In his last charge, unfinished and not delivered, he meant to meet the cry of the clericals with the old voice of Liberalism. "Discussion, even of fundamental truths, cannot be suppressed if we wish, and we ought not to wish it if we could. A church debarred from discussion of serious questions adequately raised will have its convictions, however real, discredited as only obligations of tradition." And in his eyes such discredit was not only inevitable, but justified; for convictions thus held have no claim to be called real in the sense in which he habitually used the word. They rest upon an uncriticised basis, and are, therefore, taken at second-hand by him who holds them. Such men go by rule, and the rules, which should be "schoolmasters to train to liberty and reality," become drivers of slaves. To this point he reverted in his last charge. "That at this moment the keenest Church interest should be spent on considering, not 'Will this or that proposed measure be for the good of the Church in her present circumstances and work?' but 'Did such an organisation ever exist in the primitive Church?' is simple hypnotism . . . playing with shadows, as if dealing with facts." Ridding never so played with shadows. He knew that discussion with a foregone conclusion is such a shadow. Another prelate has, in effect, told his clergy that they may discuss everything except the Creeds. No, Ridding replies, you may, at times you must, discuss these also, and you must discuss them with the possibility in view that you may come to disagree with them. In his own case, the possibility had been in one point realised. He held that the Athanasian Creed was intended to mean what it says, that all who do not receive it are doomed to hell, and for himself he did not believe that every Jew or Unitarian or heathen would, without doubt, perish everlastingly. In his last year he discussed with himself the physical reality of the Resurrection and the Virgin Birth. His conclusion was conservative, but it is clear that another issue would have affected neither his peace of mind nor his place as a pastor of the Church. The Church is built on a rock; but even a rock, much more our knowledge of its qualities, is subject to change.

"Reality," says Mr. Palmer, one of his examining chaplains, was among his principal ideals, and nothing was greater in Ridding than his grasp of fact. He saw the truth where others cried out for an authority to tell them where it lay. The ecclesiastical mind hankers for an Ecumenical Council that shall tell it what it is to believe, or rather, if we may use exact terms, what it is to suppose itself to believe. Your Council, says Ridding, if you had it, would give you a formula, but its formula could not be a perpetual edict. As Ridding's tutor once said from the University pulpit, if a Christian had lived through the first four centuries of the Church, he would have excommunicated himself several times over. But why, said Ridding, demand your Council when, in fact, you have it? You will not find it gathered under one roof, you will not see it composed wholly of bishops and priests, but, if you were not the slaves of words, you would not, in the modern world, seek it under such conditions. It is called nowadays not a Council, but "general public opinion," or "the religious intelligence of the whole Church"; but, whatever its name, it is no less under the guidance of the Holy Spirit than the Council of Jerusalem or the Council of Nicaea. Ridding's view of the facts once stated becomes self-evident. The Higher Criticism cannot, in fact, be reconciled with ecclesiastical formulae, but religious intelligence has forced it into the pulpits. General public opinion has revoked the formulae more slowly, but not less surely, than a Council of the Church. But, as Ridding said, with

* "George Ridding, Schoolmaster and Bishop." By his wife, Lady Laura Ridding. Arnold. 15s. net.

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

THE GREY KNIGHT:

An Autumn Love Story.

By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "Peter's Mother."

Daily Graphic.—"An interesting story. A sense of pleasant rest is imparted, and it is made the more pleasant by many delightful touches of humour."

CROSSRIGGS.

By MARY and JANE FINDLATER.

Authors of "A Blind Bird's Nest," "The Green Graves of Balgowrie," &c.

DAN RIACH: SOCIALIST.

By the Author of "MISS MOLLY."

Manchester Courier.—"A fascinating study of character. The plot is admirably unfolded, but the strength of the book lies in its clear delineation of character."

MEMOIRS OF FIELD-MARSHAL

SIR HENRY WYLIE NORMAN.

By Sir WILLIAM LEE-WARNER, K.C.S.I.

With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"The story of a man of remarkable ability and of remarkable personal charm, told in a simple, dignified, and deeply interesting fashion."

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING.

By MRS. SUTHERLAND ORR.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Revised and in Parts Re-written, by FREDERIC G. KENYON, D.Litt., late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. With 2 Portraits, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Evening Standard.—"The work of the present editor has aimed solely at making a valuable book more serviceable to future generations of students and lovers of Robert Browning."

MEMORIES OF MEN & BOOKS.

By REV. PROFESSOR ALFRED JOHN CHURCH, M.A.

With a Portrait, small demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Globe.—"As a contribution to one side of the social life of the past century, Mr. Church's volume is of much value."

THE PASSING OF MOROCCO.

By FREDERICK MOORE, Author of "The Balkan Trail."

With a Cover Design, Men and Illustrations, 5s. net. [Just published.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

From . . .

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons' List.

Prospectuses of these books may be had post-free on application.

JUST OUT.

SERVIA AND THE SERVIANS.

By M. CHEDO MIJATOVICH, late Servian Minister to the Court of St. James's.

With 16 Illustrations, in demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s. net.

The author of this book is a recognised authority on all Servian affairs, and in this book he gives us a very vivid account of the religious and social life, the institutions and the traditions of Servian folk. As an authoritative history of Servia from an ethnographical, historical and political point of view, this book is believed to stand alone.

SIR JOHN GORST'S RECOLLECTIONS.

NEW ZEALAND REVISITED.

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net, with 16 Illustrations.

"This charmingly chatty book."—Western Mail. "Amusing and instructive."—Morning Leader. "Will be valued at its true worth by every intelligent reader."—Daily Telegraph. "Sir John has a fluent and descriptive pen."—Daily Express. "Delightful."—Manchester Guardian. "A pleasant and readable book."—Globe.

"A Book of Very Deep Interest."

MODERNISM: a Record and Review.

By the Rev. A. LESLIE LILLEY, M.A., Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington.

With Epistle Dedicatory to the Rev. Father G. Tyrrell. 6s. net.

"Mr. Lilley's lively pages make us feel the excitement of the contemporary movement in France. The volume will help anyone who cares so to do to trace for himself the growth of a controversy which is of momentous importance for Western Christianity. . . . It is wholesome reading."
—Manchester Guardian.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MESSIANIC IDEA: a Study in Comparative Religions.

By the Rev. W. O. E. OESTERLEY, D.D.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net.

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD., 1, Amen Corner, London, E.C.

From ROUTLEDGE'S SPRING LIST.

ASPECTS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

By RICHARD H. P. CURLE. With an Engraved Portrait after G. F. WATTS. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A distinguished and well-balanced piece of work, which should gain its author immediate recognition, as among the most sane and well informed of the younger critics of the day."—Daily Telegraph.

"I would advise any aspirant to the study of Meredith to read a book by Mr. Richard Curle, very recently published, entitled 'Aspects of George Meredith.' It is the work of a convinced and penetrating admirer, and analyses a number of points highly deserving of being taken into consideration."—Mr. W. M. ROSSETTI, in the Daily News.

A RESIDENT'S WIFE IN NIGERIA

By CONSTANCE LARYMORE. With 41 Illustrations on Art Paper, and a Portrait of the Author, 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mrs. Larymore is not only a skilled traveller in wild countries, but is able to describe her wanderings most graphically with pen and camera. One of the most enjoyable books of travel we have seen of late."—Globe.

"Miss Kingsley has shown us that a woman can travel. . . . Mrs. Larymore gives a further demonstration of the fact. . . . In Miss Kingsley's book nothing is more striking than the good humour of the writer; Mrs. Larymore has the same fine gift of kindly optimism. A most engaging account of her life and experiences in Nigeria."—Liverpool Courier.

THE LAND OF THE MAPLE LEAF;

OR, CANADA AS I SAW IT.

By B. STEWART, Author of "My Experiences in Cyprus," &c. With 16 Plates, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"There has been quite a flood of books about Canada of late, but few of them have been of such deep interest as this. . . . In every way this latest volume on Canada is a valuable one. It gives a true picture of the country from the Canadian side, and all through the reader feels that he is in the hands of a writer who has a thorough grasp of his subject."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE CASE FOR THE GOAT,

WITH THE PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE OF 24 EXPERTS.

By "HOME COUNTIES." With 16 Full-page Plates, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.; also with 4 Full-page Plates, boards, 1s.

"Shows how easily anybody with no more accommodation than a backyard in the suburbs can become a keeper of live stock which will make him independent of the dairyman."—Lancet.

"May be warmly recommended as containing much that is very likely to be useful."—Spectator.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LIMITED.
Carter Lane, E.C.

AN AUSTRALIAN VIEW OF "PUBLIC OPINION."

Here is an Australian estimate of PUBLIC OPINION, from the Sydney Stock and Station Journal, published in Sydney, N.S. Wales:—

"This week there came to hand the very sort of paper that a busy man wants, and that is PUBLIC OPINION. I remember having seen it years ago in England, but somehow amid the multitude of things I saw at home, it failed to grasp my imagination. But it's an all right paper. You would think it was the idea on which Stead modelled his Review of Reviews.

"It is simply what it professes to be, public opinion. It gives you the opinions of leading men and leading papers in regard to the current events of the day. No man out here has either the time or the inclination to read all that is going on in the great British world, and this paper boils it all down, and gives it as purely as possible. What I like about it is the fact that the editor does not appear to have an axe to grind or fad to illuminate. That is what we need. We all have fads of our own here, because I think we are more intelligent than the stay-at-home people. If we're not, we probably think we are, so it's all the same. 'Cogito ergo sum.'"

PUBLIC OPINION A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.

Every Friday Twopence

EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION.

justifiable impatience, the ecclesiastical mind easily reverts to rules.

If we were asked to supply a motto for this book, we should suggest "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and these things shall be added unto you." Ridding's Wykehamists won their distinctions at Oxford because he aimed at something other and higher than a Hertford or a fellowship. His diocese became a thing of life in his hands because he never mistook the means for the end. It remains to add that his biographer has excellently accomplished her labour of love. Good memoirs are rare, but Lady Laura Ridding has added to the number.

ARAB AND GREEK.*

It is significant of a good deal of the literature of the present day that it is more concerned for the collection than the interpretation of facts. Mr. Nicholson's history of Arab literature, however, is much more than a collection of facts. The facts are there, but they are well arranged and well handled; they engage our attention and build up an interesting narrative. And yet in a sense the interpretation of these facts is left to the reader.

Of all forms of literature extant, none, perhaps, has so vividly embodied the likeness of its authors as Arab poetry. The hundred and fifty years before the birth of Mohammed saw the gradual coalition of the desert tribes. It was the moment when the Arab race, concentrating and collecting itself for its spring upon the tottering empire, seemed, in its units and in its tribal chiefs and leaders, to breathe a consciousness of the purposes that lay before it. It was inspired. It rose at that moment, in dignity, in self-control, in the stern hardihood of its valour, to a level never before reached and not long maintained. The heroes of that age are in a pre-eminent degree types of their race. They were the best the desert had done, and to them, above all others of their stock, belong the peculiar qualities which have given to the Arab his place in history.

And, just as it has always been an instinct with barbaric tribes to raise a chorus and sing themselves to the fighting point before engaging the enemy, so it was precisely this moment of national preparation and fierce bracing of the sinews which, for the Arabs, was their age of song, of poetical achievement. All Arab life and character, all Arab ideals and passions and feelings, were poured in this their most sparkling moment into the ballads of the clans' poets. The result, in the way of portraiture, is not a few indicated traits, not hints from which we can reconstruct a personality, but a personality itself; a form and face not to be mistaken, lean, fierce, and hard, reproduced as in the moment of life, and glancing at us out of these verses with a keenness which time cannot dim. The real value of this pre-Islamic poetry consists in this living, breathing personality of the Arab which it sets before us, and that in dealing with this period every care should be taken by the historian to bring the features of this personality well out. Now although Mr. Nicholson mentions indeed various traits which have left their imprint on the poetry, he makes no attempt to combine these into a living individuality. He fails somehow, as one feels, to see the Arab, and so fails to make us see him. It may be that this is partly due to the rather exaggerated estimate, as we think it, which he has formed of the poetry itself. Arab poetry, if it is to show us Arab character, must be accepted for what it is, the frank, vigorous, emphatic expression of the ideals of an age of barbarism. It is a poetry of action. It glories in the stroke of swords and thrust of lances, in the flow of blood and the vultures feasting on the slain. Its heroes are all exactly similar, brave, vigilant, and daring, prompt to take offence, ruthless in vengeance and extraordinarily voluble in vaunting and self-praise. To be feared and admired, to raid your enemy's camels and mares, to strike down and humiliate all who oppose your progress, these were the ideals of pre-Islamic poetry. It was a poetry most energetic, forcible, and direct in expression, but a poetry, on the other hand, superficial, hard, literal in all its observations, a poetry quite lacking, as all semi-barbaric poetry is lacking, in the depth which the cultivation of mind and intellect develops.

Somehow Mr. Nicholson does not seem inclined to let this poetry go as mere poetry of action, semi-barbaric poetry. He does not, in the seventy pages he devotes to the subject, attempt any exact analysis of its merits, but his references to the poets of this period as "consummate masters of the craft," and to the "elaborate form and technical perfection" of their work, and his comparison of their "magnificent odes" to the Iliad and Odyssey as "works of highly-finished art which could not possibly have been produced until the poetical art had been practised for a long time," all tend to leave on the reader's mind the impression that he is meant to think of this poetry as positively of the first order, as the outcome of a fully-formed mind and character, and as conveying an interpretation of life which will endure. Really the poetry cannot support such claims for a moment. As a representation of a certain type of character it is full of interest, but as poetry, self-sufficient and dependent only on its own inherent excellence, it does not count. The worst of it is that its human and interpretative value cannot be recognised so long as its claim to poetic excellence is upheld. The more we insist on its positive excellence the more we separate it from the life of its age. It is not only that there is nothing in the poetry itself to justify such pretensions; it is that there is nothing in the life of which this poetry is the outcome to justify them. Both life and poetry are a life and poetry of action, of a semi-barbaric people and age. See them thus and you have a living personality as the result of their conjunction. Pretend to see them otherwise and the personality fades away.

The limitation in Arab poetry is an intellectual limitation. Great actors as they were, the Arabs of the pre-Islamic age had not learned to think. But did they ever learn to think? Mr. Nicholson calls the pre-Islamic period the Golden Age of Arab poetry, and in this all critics agree with him. Such as it was, this poetry of action was the finest poetry the race ever wrought. Nothing equal to it came after it. It did not, as was the case with the corresponding European ballad poetry, give birth to a later poetry of thought; and this it did not do because the intellectual faculty in the Arab was never developed. It is interesting and curious to observe how in every department of Arab literature and science the note of unreality due to lack of intellectual grasp creeps in; how alchemy mingles with chemistry, astrology with astronomy; how dreams and visions and magical talismans and charms and horoscopes and the like take the place of reasons and facts, until we are inclined to say of the Arab generally what Professor de Boer, in his "History of Philosophy in Islam," says of the famous poet and philosopher al Maarri: "He is almost entirely wanting in the gift of combination. He can analyse, but he does not hit upon any synthesis, and his learning bears no fruit." A civilisation so based was itself more visionary than real, and it has vanished like a vision. Mr. Nicholson's book suffers a little, it seems to us, from his not taking a sufficiently defined and determinate view of Arab character. The reader of his pages feels the lack of a clue.

We find this lack of intellectualism in the Arab curiously brought out and emphasised in turning to another recent book, to Mr. Short's "History of Sculpture." Sculpture, the art of form, the art that defines, is pre-eminently the art of the intellect, pre-eminently, therefore, the art of the Greeks. Oriental wisdom, Professor de Boer points out in the work we have already mentioned, delivered over to the Arabs a vast amount of more or less nebulous material, "but the form—the formative principle—came to them from the Greeks." He adds this criticism on Arab manipulation which is worth quoting: "In every case where it is not a question of mere enumeration, or chance consideration, but where an attempt is made to arrange the matter according to logical or positive points of view, we may conclude with all probability that Greek influences have been at work." Here, then, in Mr. Short's book, we are dealing with a principle which Greek civilisation was rich in, and which later European civilisation is rich in, but of which Arab civilisation was so destitute, that when it appears it is to be referred to an outside source.

* "A Literary History of the Arabs." By R. A. Nicholson. Fisher Unwin. 15s. net.

"A History of Sculpture." By Ernest H. Short. Heinemann. 10s. net.

NEW EDITIONS OF "EREWHON" BUTLER

"Samuel Butler was, in his own department, the greatest English writer of the latter half of the 19th century."—Bernard Shaw.

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. A Novel. Entirely re-set. 6s. 424 pp.
EREWHON A Satire. 11th issue. 2s. 6d. net. ... ... 324 pp.
EREWHON RE-VISITED. 3rd issue. 2s. 6d. net. ... ... 340 pp.
ESSAYS ON LIFE, ART, AND SCIENCE. 2s. 6d. net. ... 340 pp

Now Ready. 6s.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A SUPER-TRAMP

By W. H. DAVIES (Author of "The Soul's Destroyer.")

WITH 8-PAGE PREFACE BY BERNARD SHAW.

"I recommend this most remarkable Autobiography of a Super-Tramp to your special attention." (Note made by Mr. Bernard Shaw on the MS. sent to the publisher.

Now Ready. 3s. 6d. nett.

ON CAMBRIAN AND CUMBRIAN HILLS

By HENRY S. SALT. With Two Photographs.
A record of forty years' experience. A delightful companion for the hills.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—
Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.

Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:
6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at
3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

And, as the reader will find if he makes the experiment, passing from one to the other, passing from the shadowy speculation of Arab philosophy or Sufi mysticism to the clear statements of Greek sculpture, is like waking up from a dream to the world of substance and concrete reality.

The object Mr. Short has set before himself, as he tells us in his preface, is to treat sculpture as the expression of the life of its age. Greatness in sculpture depends on its being this. "Throughout I have written from the standpoint of one who believes that the great schools of sculpture were created, not by individuals of genius, but by the peoples to whom they appealed." No doubt it is true that sculpture, like all art, is powerful and significant in proportion to the weight and volume of conviction poured into it by the life it emanates from, and is therefore best interpreted through that life. It should be one of the achievements of a criticism which regards art in this way as the expression of life to be able to distinguish between the work of genuine creative epochs and individual experiments. Mr. Short easily applies his theory to Greek art, but his task becomes harder as he approaches modern times and when he encounters the great experimentalist, Rodin, he dares not apply it at all. Rodin browbeats him. "Whether Phidias, Scopas, and Praxiteles are right and Rodin wrong matters little." Rodin is great because he has "sounded a new note of passion in sculpture." But Mr. Short's test of greatness in sculpture was that it must be the product of the national life rather than of individual experiment, and it is undeniable that M. Rodin is as individual as Phidias is national. Now a theory that is worth anything in art is as valuable for what it condemns as for what it approves, nor can it be of any use as a standard of judgment if it flinches before even a Rodin. Apart from this breakdown of its main theory, however, the book contains a great deal of interesting matter, and is to be welcomed moreover because, as Mr. Short himself points out, sculpture is a branch of art which has long suffered from neglect, and which must be placed by all possible means before the public view if interest is to be revived in it.

TWO NOVELS OF DOMESTIC LIFE.*

Of the two novels before us, the first, "Crossrigs," is a fair example of the school of British domestic fiction; the second follows the main stream of Continental standards. It would be a curious and profitable task if some clever critic would set himself to trace the social causes why the Victorian novelist came to be warned off from treading those special paths of life which had been opened up by the Georgian masters, paths which at no time have been closed to his European fellows. "I cannot write the real life of a man: the British public will not allow me to," Thackeray is reported to have said. But whatever may have been the causes, it is highly significant that it was women writers who, at the close of the century, made a dash for freedom, and claimed the artist's inalienable right of showing forth life as he finds it. Whatever may have been the faults of the "sex novel," as the ordinary British reviewer hastened to label it, it had at least the merit of clearing the air, of setting forth frankly, if too hysterically, the emotional strain imposed on a vast body of modern women by that network of traditional restraints which Ibsen satirised in "The Doll's House." It cannot be asserted too definitely that in no field of social activity is "the conspiracy of silence" less salutary than in the field of art. One of the chief functions of art is to penetrate beneath the appearances and conventions that every society wears as a crust of defensive armour. The French naturalistic school, for example, so long cold-shouldered in England, performed the great function of exposing the lowness of social ideals prevalent under the Third Empire. If you close the artist's mouth, because his picture of life is "unpleasant," you at once play into the hands of those very tendencies which you wish, presumably, to check, yet fear to understand. We must remember also that it is always the tendency of every class in power to make the artist minister to its own gratification, to prevent him from telling truths that are unpalatable.

The two novels before us both have for their subject the thwarted love instincts of a woman, and we can see no valid reason why the Misses Findlater's story should not be boycotted if Miss Violet Hunt's book be sent to Coventry; no reason, that is, except that "Crossrigs" is gently idealistic in its tone, while "White Rose of Weary Leaf" is frankly naturalistic. In saying this we do not mean to assert that the latter is a book for everybody. On the contrary, it contains matter that renders it undesirable for the young person; certain of its scenes will place it beyond the pale for people who dislike or are repelled by unconventional situations, or who hold that such an analysis of the love relations between a man and woman as "Jude, the Obscure" offers us, is inadmissable. Further, we may add that the tone of the first third of the novel is cheaply cynical, and that the stress the author lays on the physical defects of her characters, such as Lady Meadows and Dulce, is in doubtful taste. Miss Violet Hunt's style, in short, has assimilated some of the repellent characteristics of French naturalism; but she has the redeeming virtue of spiritual sincerity, and her somewhat "unpleasant" opening is atoned for by the highly serious analysis of her situation as it develops. Her heroine, Amy Steevens, a plucky, unattached woman, who, thrown early in life on her own resources, fights a hard and callous world with smiling face, is quite as admirable a figure as Alex Hope, the unselfish daughter who wastes her womanhood in toiling for her sister's careless family brood, who "could have got on better without her." In "Crossrigs" we find drawn for us a careful and over-minute picture of Scottish family life among the gentry of a quiet village, a patient domestic chronicle which holds one's interest, although the tones are flat, and the general effect is too monotonous. Alex Hope's life is typical of that of a countless army of women of her class who year by year, waiting in a secluded home life for the love that never comes to them, slowly find their youth and capacity for happiness shrivelling away. There is considerable delicacy shown in the authors' analysis of the passion that Alex nurtures in secret for Robert Maitland, the man married to a cold and stupid wife. Alex wishes for "the best," and it is the best which, we are told, is the enemy of the good, that keeps her from marrying the ardent young Van Cassilis, who, in his mortification, turns and weds the sensual and hard Miss Orranmore.

The weakness of the idealistic method is apparent in many passages, especially in those which describe how, after a few months of marriage, Van Cassilis is "hardened and coarsened unbelievably," and how "not a trace of boyishness or innocence is left in him." The moral purpose emphasised not infrequently destroys the illusion of what is, in other respects, a thoughtful and careful piece of work.

The career of Miss Violet Hunt's heroine, Amy Steevens, opens for us delicate psychological problems of an interest far surpassing those found in the life of Alex Hope. Amy's employer, Jeremy Dand, the clever, cynical, and masterful owner of Swarland Hall, engages her as "companion" to his ineffective, ornamental wife, Edith, to run his house for him, and keep everybody satisfied and amused. And then he falls in love, platonically, with Amy, who has ten times more brains, sense, and womanly depth than Edith. Amy becomes the real mistress of the establishment, the nurse of his child, the one practical woman who can avert disaster when the neurotic Dulce, Jeremy's daughter by his first wife, is seriously endangered by her unhappy love affairs. The complex relations between Amy and the selfish and self-absorbed Edith, who poses before everybody as the devoted wife and mother, when she is, in reality, a hollow sham, are very cleverly indicated. And the author succeeds, too, admirably in showing how Amy, by keeping herself perfectly sincere and honest in her relations with Jeremy, increases the man's love for her, till at last the flashpoint of danger is reached. Amy herself wishes, womanlike, to strengthen her hold over Jeremy's heart, while keeping her own free spirit, and her independence of mind, unspoiled by love ties which she knows can never be sufficiently valid. The analysis of the struggle between her own strong brain and the cravings of her unsounded feminine emotions recall to the reader's mind Sue's struggle, in "Jude the Obscure" to keep herself free and yet necessary to the man who loves her. Amy is, however, not a spiritual egoist

* "Crossrigs." By Mary and Jane Findlater. Smith Elder & Co. 6s.
"White Rose of Weary Leaf." By Violet Hunt. Heinemann. 6s.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, last edition 10 vols., 25/-, cost £2 16s. net. Who's Who, 1907, 4/6, cost 11/- net. Burton's Arabian Nights, full edition, illustrated, 17 vols., £13 13s. Lear's Book of Nonsense, 2/6, pub. 6/. Balzac's Famous Novels in English, 40 vols., £3 3s. Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray, 10/6. Pepys' Diary, 4 vols., 15/-, pub. £1 10s. G. P. R. James's Historical Novels, 25 vols., £2 2s. Encyclopædia Britannica, last edition, 35 vols., £12 12s. Business Cyclopædia and Legal Adviser, 6 vols., £1 4s., cost £2 8s. Catalogues free. Books bought. Special list of 3,000 books wanted post free. Libraries purchased for cash.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.

[Books out of print supplied. Please state wants.]

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD

(Viâ NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the { PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. / OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. / TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,

London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.;
City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.;
And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED.
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Car Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Will be ready in a few days.

like Sue; she realises that her position in Dand's household is a dangerous one, that she may bring disaster on Jeremy, and that Edith may go to pieces if her husband throws her over, and that then "everybody will be in the wrong." The moral problem presented to us in Part I. is one that is balanced delicately on the knife-edge of circumstance, and the actual tragedy is precipitated by the shock of two accidents—the first when one of Jeremy's platonic love-letters to Amy is brought to Edith's knowledge, the second when Amy's nerves are shattered to pieces by the mental stress and strain of a railway accident in which Edith is dangerously injured. The weak spot in Amy's armour of good sense and feeling is penetrated by Jeremy's double-dealing at this juncture. She yields to him in her emotional distress, despite her instinct, and yields, moreover, only in the belief that Edith is dead. With the extreme complexity of the situation that then arises when she discovers that she has been deceived, with Jeremy's increasing infatuation for her, with her flight from Swarland Hall and its tragic consequences, we cannot here deal. The novel, as we have said, is not for the young person, and, indeed, not for the large class of readers who dislike a subtle analysis of human motives and demand conventional verdicts. The figure of Amy Steevens is of marked interest—one that bears secret affinities to Ibsen's Rebecca West, and we can only regret that the author has spoiled its purity by painting it in with a number of coarse hot touches.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

There is an old Cornish saying that "a Godolphin was never known to want wit, a Trelawny courage, or a Granville loyalty." Courage is, however, the only good quality with which the hero of the Rev. Roger Granville's volume, "The King's General in the West" (Lane, 10s. 6d. net), can be credited. Sir Richard Granville, the subject of the book, was a man of very different character from his grandfather, whose name has been made familiar by Tennyson's spirited verses. He had his grandfather's courage in fight, but so far from being distinguished for loyalty, he deserted from the King to the Parliament, and later, when he was made Major-General of the Parliamentary Horse, he treacherously went over again to the King, bringing his whole force with him. Mr. Granville does his best to present these passages in the most favourable light, but in private as well as public affairs Sir Richard Granville was brutal, treacherous, and cruel. While attempting to hold the West of England for the King he carried on the war in a thoroughly barbarous manner. He plundered right and left, and his usual severity may be judged from the fact that when he took Saltash, he wrote to the King declaring his intention of hanging all of the three hundred prisoners he captured. According to report, Granville died at Ghent just before the Restoration, his later years being embittered by a quarrel with Charles II., who banished him from his presence. A legend concerning Granville's wife, whom he treated in a most brutal manner, still survives in Cornwall. According to the tradition that lady, who had been married three times before she met Granville, may be seen every night in the neighbourhood of Tavistock, driving a spectral chaise made of the bones of her four dead husbands, drawn by headless horses. In front of the carriage runs a sable hound, with one eye in the middle of his forehead. Mr. Granville's book gives a good account of the Civil War in the West of England, and presents some picturesque incidents not to be found in other historians of the period.

* * *

"The Cave Boy," by Margaret A. McIntyre (Harrap, 1s. 6d. net), is one of a class of juvenile books intended to combine instruction with entertainment. It tells of the day-to-day life of a palæolithic family, and in detailing sundry adventures with bears, mammoths, and other exciting animals, conveys some elementary facts of social history in pleasant, if childish, language. Thorn, the cave boy, of enterprising and inventive turn of mind; Pineknot, his brother, Strongarm, his father, and Burr, his mother, are nice simple people, whose acquaintance every good child should be glad to make. The drawings in this book have a certain character and expressiveness, though they betray some inexperience of process requirements.

The Week in the City.

Broken into extensively by the Easter holiday, there has been little to attract attention in the Stock Markets during the week The resumption after the vacation was distinctly less cheerful than the breaking-up, for the cheerless weather had cast a gloom over everything, and was instrumental in specially depressing at least one market, for it was clear that the home railways had not secured even an average volume of holiday traffic. Further the menace of a strike on the North-Eastern gave weight to the impression that a spirit of discontent prevails all along the important industrial district of the North-East Coast, as the engineers have refused to confirm the arrangement entered into by their officials, and, in order to put an end to sectional disputes of the kind, a lock-out of the whole shipbuilding industry of the country is threatened. It seems extremely unfortunate that so soon as the comfort of the working classes is curtailed by slacker trade and reduced employment the distress is accentuated by the occurrence of disputes between employers and employed. So many extensive disputes threatening disastrous stoppages of work have of late years been warded off by resort to mutual discussion and arbitration, and the superiority of these methods over the old brutal system of fighting to exhaustion has been so fully demonstrated that it may be hoped good sense and better counsels will again avail in preventing the threatened conflicts. The ill-success of the German and Prussian loans, which are now quoted at a discount, has not tended to enliven markets. The syndicates are endeavouring to prop up the quotation by an agreement not to put upon the market the blocks they have taken up until the definitive scrip is issued.

Pennsylvania Bonds.

Another circumstance calculated to repress any approach to buoyancy is the announcement of an issue of £8,000,000 Pennsylvania Railroad Four Per Cent. Bonds. It is not, perhaps, surprising that the announcement has been followed by a spell of activity in the American market, for it is not unnatural that those responsible for the issue wish to assure for it a good reception. Certainly it has a good backing, including the Rothschilds, Barings, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the Crédit Lyonnais, and the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas. The time may seem unfortunately chosen for floating a large issue of American railway bonds, but one would have to go a long way back to pitch upon a period that might have been considered favourable, and necessary expenditure must be provided for. The Pennsylvania is not Erie or Union Pacific, and, though it is in contemplation to reduce the dividend on the Common stock from 7 to 6 per cent., the company is in a position to offer excellent security for the bonds, and at the figure of 96, which is reported to be the price of issue, it seems likely the flotation will "go" better than some other four per cents. on offer.

Turkish Finance.

Mention was made here a fortnight ago of the manner in which the finances of the Porte were being bolstered up by the Deutsche Bank. The latest instance is the provision of funds—refused by the Imperial Ottoman Bank—for the payment of a month's wages to Government employés in celebration of the Prophet's birthday. The unfortunate employés must wish that the Prophet had a birthday every month; but the circumstance is another proof of the straits to which the Treasury is reduced for money. Apologists of the Turkish Government assert that these periodical applications for comparatively small sums are quite usual, and that the advances are always repaid with interest, while the regular sinking fund for the reduction of the debt is duly applied. The debt, however, is increased in other directions, as, for instance, by the loan raised on the security of the 3 per cent. increase in the Customs duties. We can only repeat that the sole question is how much longer the game can be kept up.

Lucellum.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's
Navy Cut
Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute 0487.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE
CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Liver troubles

are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Price 1/1½ and 2/9 of all Chemists and Stores, or, if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Beware of spurious imitations.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

PRINCIPAL OF FULHAM DAY TRAINING COLLEGE.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL invites applications for the post of Principal of the Fulham Day Training College for Women, to be opened as a day college at Finlay Street, Fulham, in September next, and ultimately to be carried on as a residential and day college in new permanent buildings in North West London. (It is probable that special attention will be given at this college to training teachers for infants' schools).

The commencing salary will be at the rate of £400 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to a maximum of £500 a year (together with board, residence, washing, and medical attendance when the college becomes residential).

LECTURERS, &c., IN TRAINING COLLEGES.

The Council also invites applications for the following posts in its training colleges. The lecturers required in all cases will be women.

1. Moorfields Day Training College for Women, White Street, Moorfields, E.C.—To be opened in September next, as a day college at Moorfields, and ultimately to be carried on as a residential and day college in new permanent buildings at Clapton.
   (a) Mistress of Method.
   (b) Two Lecturers, specially qualified (I.) in Nature Study and Geography, and (II.) in Modern Languages.
2. Fulham Day Training College for Women, Finlay Street, Fulham, S.W.—To be opened in September next as a day training college, and ultimately to be carried on as a residential and day college in North West London.
   Four lecturers, specially qualified in (I.) Mathematics, (II.) Modern Languages, (III.) Science, (IV.) History or Geography.
3. Clapham Day Training College for Women, Cedars Road, Clapham:—
   (a) One Lecturer, specially qualified in History.
   (b) Two Assistant Mistresses of Method, of whom one should have had training in Kindergarten methods, and experience in teaching young children.
   (c) Two Assistant Lecturers, one specially qualified in Science and one in Geography.
4. Islington Day Training College for Men and Women, Offord Road, Barnsbury, N.—Assistant Mistress of Method, specially skilled in infants' school work.

The salaries will be as follows:—

LECTURERS AND MISTRESS OF METHOD.

Commencing at £180 a year, and rising by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £250 a year.

ASSISTANT LECTURERS AND ASSISTANT MISTRESSES OF METHOD.

Commencing at £130 a year, and rising by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £170 a year.

Applicants are advised to make themselves acquainted with the conditions of work in training colleges, as given in the Board of Education's regulations for the training of teachers, &c.

The persons appointed will be required:—

(I.) To give lectures in their subjects.
(II.) To help in supervising the students' school practice.
(III.) To assist in the organisation of college clubs and societies (bearing as a rule some relation to their own department of work), and to take an active interest in the general life of the college.

The Council also invites applications for the undermentioned posts:

DRILL AND GAMES MISTRESS.

Eltham Secondary School for Girls, Deansfield Road, Well Hall. Drill and Games Mistress, at a fixed salary of £130 a year.

ASSISTANT MISTRESS.

Kentish Town Secondary School for Girls, Ingestre Road, Highgate Road, N. Assistant Mistress, specially qualified in History. The commencing salary attaching to the post will be £120 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than the minimum stated above will be allowed if the person appointed has had satisfactory experience, and in this connection two years' satisfactory service in a school approved by the Council for the purpose will be counted as equivalent to one year spent in one of the Council's secondary schools, provided that (1) experience of less than two years in any one school shall not be reckoned, and (2) not more than ten years' outside service in all shall be taken into account.

Applications should be made on official forms, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on 11th May, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "Principal of Training College," "Lecturer to Training College," "Drill and Games Mistress," or "Assistant Mistress in Secondary School," as the case may be, and a stamped and addressed envelope must be enclosed.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
April 16th, 1908.

EDUCATIONAL.

DARLINGTON TRAINING COLLEGE.

A RESIDENT ART MISTRESS is required at the above College in September. Salary according to qualifications and experience. A Certificate from South Kensington or the Royal Drawing Society is desirable. —Application should be made at once to The Principal, Training College, Darlington.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1354 GERRARD

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

EDUCATIONAL.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Ten Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years at the College, will be awarded on the results of an Examination to be held from June 29th to July 4th, 1903. Names must be entered before May 30th. The College prepares Students for London Degrees and also for certain of the Oxford Honour Examinations. Inclusive fee, £100 a year.

For forms of entry and further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class: Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields: gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

NEXT TERM, MAY 1st.

ST. GEORGE'S PUBLIC CO-EDUCATIONAL SCHOOL,

HARPENDEN, HERTS.

Headmaster—The REV. CECIL GRANT, M.A.

The next Term begins on Thursday, May 7th.

For prospectus and full particulars apply to The CO-EDUCATIONAL PUBLIC SCHOOLS TRUST, LTD., 41, Moorgate Street, E.C.

MILL HILL SCHOOL,

LONDON, N.W.

The Next Examination for Entrance Scholarships (value 15 guineas to 60 guineas) will be held on Thursday, July 2nd, and two following days. For further particulars apply to the Bursar.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),

GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Tel-phone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

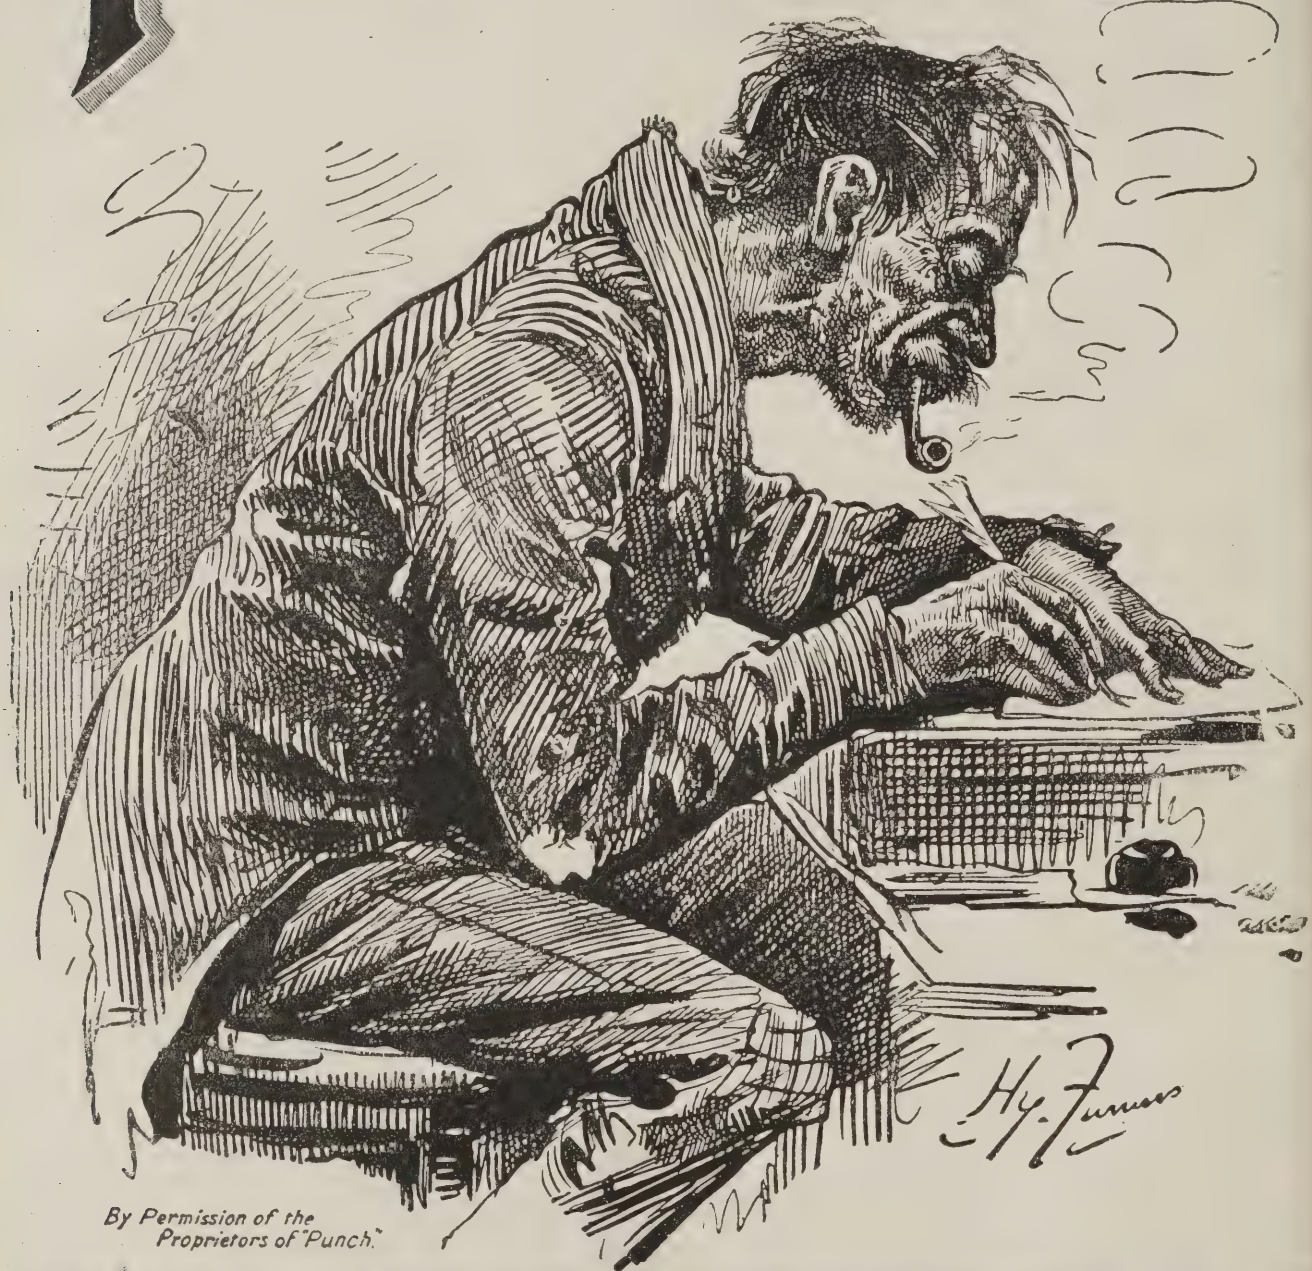
WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager

Pears' soap.



By Permission of the Proprietors of "Punch."

Two years ago I used your Soap Since when I have used no other!

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 5.] SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
The Diary of the Week	141
Politics and Affairs:—
The Vision of Liberalism	144
Tomlinson of Manchester and Elsewhere	145
A Free Hand for the State	146
An American Labor Party	147
Life and Letters:—
Order. By John Galsworthy	149
From Mid Devon to Manchester. By C. F. G. Masterman, M.P.	150
Are Wild Animals Born Wild?	151
The Mart	152
Letters from Abroad:—
The Stifling of Freedom. By Ixe	153
Art:—
The New Gallery	154
Communications:—
The Defect of the Housing Bill. By George Haw	155
Letters to the Editor:—
"C.-B." and Church Patronage. By the Right Hon. George W. E. Russell	156
The New Policy of the Football Association. By Footballer	157
Women and the Suffrage. By A Liberal Woman and J. S. F.	157
Armaments and Utility. By A. R.	158
A Shakespeare Memorial. By Observer	159
"The Breaking Point." By C. Gasquoine Hartley	159
The Future of Poor Law Administration. By C. E. Maurice	159
Poetry:—
Nature's Moods. By William H. Davies	159
The World of Books	160
Books to be Read	160
Reviews:—
The Journalist	161
A History of Local Government. By Prof. Vinogradoff	161
London's Playground	162
The Novel of the Week	163
Books in Brief:—
Memories of Eight Parliaments	164
The Shakespeare Library	166
The Highways and Byways	166
Through a Peer Glass	166
The Rhine: Its Valley and History	168
Some British Birds	168
The Week in the City	168

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was buried on Tuesday in Meigle Churchyard, near to the companion and the home that he loved. On Monday at noon a funeral service was held in Westminster Abbey, whose walls enshrine most of the great political memories of our people. Wreaths were laid upon his coffin by the Prince of Wales, representing the King, by M. Clemenceau, the French Prime Minister, who explained that he did honor to an old friend, but who also represented the Government of a very friendly nation, and by the representative of the German Emperor. The pall bearers included the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Fife, the Prime Minister, the Lord Chancellor, the Speaker, and Mr. Burt. Mr. Balfour, who was stopped by illness from attending the funeral service, and the eulogium in the House of Commons, has written a letter to Mr. Asquith praising Sir Henry for his "courage, consistency, high ideals, kindliness that never fell into weakness, shrewdness that was never edged with malice." Mr. Asquith, with great dignity and feeling, laid stress, in his Monday's speech in the House of Commons, on the delicacy of his sympathies, his sensitiveness to suffering, his reliance on moral force, his passionate love of peace, and his idealism, touched with discernment and qualified by humor and insight. That, however, which gave him his peculiar authority and the affection which he enjoyed was his entire character, composed so largely of firmness, tenacity, quietude and sweetness of temper. This tribute was endorsed by representatives of the Liberal, Conservative, Irish, and Labor Parties.

Mr. Asquith's succession to the Premiership was confirmed by the Liberal Parliamentary Party at a customary gathering at the Reform Club. A resolution of welcome was moved by Sir Brampton Gordon, seconded by Mr. Burt, and supported by Mr. Wason and Sir Alfred Thomas, representing Scottish and Welsh Liberalism. Mr. Asquith's reply contained some interesting suggestions of policy and point of view. There was to be "no change of policy or of purpose." The "citadel of Free Trade" must be held. On education he hoped for a concordat, but could not abandon either principles or friends. The Government would rather "sink" with the temperance cause than abandon it. Poverty and unemployment must be dealt with through "classification" of out-of-works, and by the problems of childhood and old age. The purpose of Liberalism was to secure for all classes of the people "a more even level of opportunity," and a "richer and a fuller corporate life." Neither Ireland nor the House of Lords was mentioned.

* * *

Mr. Churchill has failed to retain North-West Manchester and has accepted the offer to contest Dundee. His poll fell from that of 1906 by 651 votes; that of Mr. Joynson-Hicks rose by 1,019. The candidature of Mr. Irving, the revolutionary Socialist candidate, could only have been ridiculous. He received only 276 votes, and the net anti-Free Trade majority was only 153. Mr. Churchill, writing to his Chairman on Wednesday, attributed the result to the "sudden and organised transference of between four and five hundred Catholic votes." It is clear, however, that the lukewarmness of the Unionist Free Traders also contributed. Both the factions appear to be deterred by similar arguments. The priests said to the Irish Catholics, "You can vote for Home Rule at the General Election." The advice to Unionist Free Traders was that they could support Free Trade then, and vote against a too Radical Government now.

* * *

The political bearing of the election must be taken in connection with the contests in Dewsbury and Kincardineshire, which, like North-West Manchester itself, showed that, while the abnormal electioneering of 1906 is over, the Government may well count on retaining a normal majority. In Kincardineshire, a stranger, Captain Murray, has retained the seat by a majority of 1,698, which is larger than any majority that Mr. Crombie, its very popular member, secured in any contest save that of the "miraculous year." Kincardineshire is an agricultural county, full of small holders, but containing no crofters. Special efforts were made to discredit the Scottish Land Bill, which was the central subject of the contest. These failed, and the election strengthens the general impression that Scotland stands perfectly firm for Liberalism and for the special form of legislation against which Lord Rosebery's campaign was directed.

* * *

The second reading of the Licensing Bill was moved by Mr. Asquith on Tuesday in a speech very firm in purpose and close in argumentative texture. Its principal points were a pledge to check the growth of drinking-shops in the guise of clubs, but to remove causes of offence to respectable clubs, a definition of monopoly values as representing the difference between licensed and unlicensed rentals, but excluding tied-house profits, a promise to define monopoly value more closely and to secure its fruits to the State rather than to the locality, and a challenge to the Opposition to say whether or no they accepted the principle of the time-limit. This vital point was not answered clearly in the debate. Mr. Cave moved an amendment opposing the Bill as failing to promote the cause of temperance, and as violating "the principle of equity." His most interesting points were that the compensation under the Bill was on far too low a basis. For example, an owner who, under the Kennedy judgment, obtained £1,123 would only get £52 under the Bill. Furthermore, the Government's definition of a monopoly value, applied to old licences, must mean a confiscation of goodwill. These points were also taken by Sir John Dickson-Poynder, a moderate Liberal, who declared for a time-limit of twenty-one or even twenty-five years. Mr. Whitbread, and one or two other Liberal members connected or sympathising with the trade, thought that the compensation proposed was no more than one-fifth of that now being paid. He did not oppose the principle of the time-limit, and hoped that he might support the Bill on the third reading. Generally, the party stood firm, and were notably backed by the Labor Party, represented by Mr. Snowden, Mr. Crooks, and Mr. Parker. Mr. Herbert Samuel, answering Mr. Cave, suggested that the Government were open to consider whether the time-limit should be altered as either too long or too short.

* * *

The most interesting speech in the later stages of the debate—which has lasted for three days—was that of Sir Thomas Whittaker, whose knowledge and insight enabled him to expose the critical question of brewers' finance. He divided the brewing companies into three compartments, with a view of estimating their ability to bear the burden of the Bill. The first class, consisting of thirty good companies, with a capital of twenty-two millions, and having ample reserves, could replace the whole monopoly value of their premises in fifteen years, and go on all the while paying their last year's average dividend of 12½ per cent. A second class, consisting of thirty companies, which he described as "good to middling," with a capital of thirteen millions, could also wipe out the whole of their license values, and yet continue to pay, as in the past, six to seven per cent. dividends. The class which would suffer by the Bill consisted of a third set of "poor and weak" companies. But they had already lost much of their capital, and were only paying trifling dividends. Good companies could "take the Bill and never turn a hair." The annual charge for making up the monopoly value would only be 3½ millions at four per cent., and 3¼ millions at five per cent.—no great burden.

* * *

Meanwhile, the Archbishop of Canterbury stands with some strength to his support of the Bill. Speaking on Tuesday at the annual meeting of the Church of England Temperance Society, he said that he could not understand how any of its members could entertain doubt of its general principles. Suggestions that implied confiscation must be carefully weighed. He mentioned that in one day he received a number of postcards, posted at towns wide apart, which proved to be all in the same handwriting. He spoke very strongly on the danger of transferring the retail sale of drink from licensed houses under regulation to non-licensed houses under no regulation, and he thought the restrictions upon clubs in the Bill "very timorous." Both Scotland and Ireland had workmanlike regulations, and these might be transferred to the present measure. He concluded firmly that the Society must not let the Bill "get out of their reach."

* * *

As to the attitude of the Prime Minister with regard to one important part of the Bill we must express some disappointment. The provisions which deal with clubs have been universally recognised as too weak—probably they will be ineffective. Mr. Asquith did, indeed, say that Ministers would welcome with interest and sympathy any really practical proposal to prevent the growth of parasitic drinking shops masquerading as clubs. But the country expected from him, we think, a definite statement that they would put forward such a proposal. This is not a Committee point. It is a point which goes to the root of the case for the Bill. As it stands it is like an armoured ship with unarmoured ends. We believe that the Government intend to remedy this well-founded reproach against their measure. But we think it is due to their supporters and to their own reputation that they should make clear their intention without further delay.

* * *

Yesterday was the day fixed for a general advance of Sir James Willcocks's force into the Mohmand territory, but it seems likely that the need for such a movement no longer exists. News comes that a Mohmand deputation is seeking to confer with our Chief Commissioner of the North-West Province, and we may suppose the Frontier disturbance to be over for a time. It is difficult to understand so sudden a collapse. Ten days ago a force of 10,000 tribesmen, in three parties, was reported to have advanced within 20 miles of Peshawur, while crowds of Afghans were crossing the Kabul from Dakka, where the river approaches the Khyber Pass, to Lalpura, the Mohmand capital on the opposite bank. Then came Sir James Willcocks's action near Shabkadar on Friday 24th, and we can only suppose it justified his rather heavy casualty list, as well as confirming the belief that Mohmands are not conspicuous among the mountaineers for fighting qualities.

* * *

On Saturday they abandoned all their positions, and devoted their attention to getting in the harvest before the British came, while the Afghans returned home across the river. Three things must be remembered: one, that we have to restrain the forward military party that aims at occupying the hill country up to the Durand line, which would certainly involve us in an extensive way; another, that the Ameer has not yet signed the Anglo-Russian Agreement, and is obviously displeased at not being consulted beforehand; and thirdly, that in this year's "punitive expeditions" the British authorities have the sympathetic support of the Hindu populations in North-West India, because it is Hindus who have chiefly suffered during the recent Mohammedan raids.

* * *

Congress has rejected the President's demand for four battleships, and completely ignored his campaign against the Anarchists, but Mr. Roosevelt has, nevertheless, hurled another special message at it. Like so many of its predecessors, it rehearses in Mr. Roosevelt's sonorous commonplace the misdeeds of the trust and of the millionaire and presses a programme of legislation, which Congress is determined not to touch in this election year. Mr. Hearst apparently is quite serious about his new party, which hitherto has been confined to New York. He has been inaugurating its conversion into a national party, and attacking Republicans and Democrats as "talkers unable to perform." The National Independence Party is to have its own Convention, and it may nominate its own candidates, unless a "deal" is arranged with the Democrats. The coming election already promises to be the most interesting since President Cleveland first broke the Republican monopoly. Should Mr. Hearst intervene as a candidate, the interest will be all the greater, though Mr. Bryan's chances will be badly damaged.

* * *

The chief subject of political discussion in Germany is the secession of Dr. Barth and a small following from the Radical Union at the Congress of that Party. The occasion was the refusal of the Congress to censure the Radical members for approving the language clause of the Associations Law, but the cause is a profound difference of opinion on general policy between the majority and the minority. The majority are "practical" politicians; they want to maintain the "bloc," form alliances with the Right, and get their share of Government patronage; the minority want to co-operate with the Socialists. The split is generally interpreted as making for the consolidation of the three Radical groups, and perhaps their consolidation with the National Liberals, on the basis of throwing over their Radicals. It means that the Radicals are well on their way towards becoming indistinguishable from the National Liberals, and the National Liberals have this week given a taste of their quality by pronouncing in favour of a "reform" of the Prussian voting system in the direction of jerrymandered constituencies and fancy franchises.

* * *

The British Navy has been heavily smitten during the last few days. During a thick snow-storm on Saturday afternoon, the "Gladiator," a second-class cruiser of 5,750 tons, was rammed by the St. Paul, the American Atlantic liner, and almost cut in two. Though she managed to steam into shallow water off Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight, where she heeled over and sank, twenty-seven of her crew were killed or drowned. A coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death." The crew showed perfect courage and discipline, lining up on the slanting deck, and striking up "Sons of the Brave." On Tuesday, during a night attack in a series of manœuvres, the torpedo destroyer "Gala" was cut clean in two and sunk by the scout "Attentive," and a sister ship, the "Ribble," was also injured. Engineer-Lieutenant Fletcher was killed in his bunk. In a boiler explosion in the stoke-hole of the "Britannia" five men were injured. The allied Japanese Navy has lost by a magazine explosion an almost out-of-date cruiser, of 4,000 tons, the 'Matsushima," which, however, figured in the battle of Yalu, with a loss of about 200 lives. The son of Field-Marshal Oyama is said to have perished. We think that it is time to inquire whether we are not risking our sailors' lives too easily in night manœuvres with lights out. Does not this expose them to almost 50 per cent. of the full risk of war?

* * *

The reply of Lord Crewe, the new Colonial Secretary, to a resolution of the Political Committee of the New Reform Club, asking that an Imperial inquiry should be held into the administration of martial law in Natal, is to the effect that "in such a matter the Governor of Natal ought to act only on the advice and responsibility of Ministers, and I am to add that it is not possible to appoint an Imperial Commission of Inquiry." If, as seems reasonable, this reply must be understood as implying the intention of the Imperial Government to ratify without inquiry the Act of Indemnity by which the Natal Ministry proposes to whitewash its illegal proceedings, it registers a novel constitutional position. Taken in conjunction with the reply of the late Prime Minister to an earlier appeal from the same source, and with answers given by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons, it implies that any self-governing Colony can compel the Governor, at any time and upon any pretext which it desires to put forward, to cancel ordinary civil government, and to place the life, liberty, and property of all British subjects in the proclaimed areas at the mercy of military force, afterwards conferring by its own unchecked discretion a retrospective sanction of all outrages committed during the period of martial law.

* * *

We regret to see that Sir Edward Grey announced in reply to a question put by Mr. Ernest Villiers, M.P., that the Brussels Sugar Convention will be renewed for five years from September next. No doubt the answer went on to state, that "the conditions had been altered so that his Majesty's Government will no longer be required to penalise bounty-fed sugar." We regret that we cannot put this interpretation on the new Convention, which we had hoped to the last would not be ratified by this country. In return for the nullification of Art. IV. in her case this country has agreed to a new clause whereby "the contracting States may demand that sugar refined in the United Kingdom and thence exported to their territories shall be accompanied by a certificate stating that none of this sugar comes from a country recognised as granting bounties." As this provision applies to all articles containing sugar, such as biscuits, preserves, mineral waters, &c., we think that it is hardly accurate to say that bounty-fed sugar is no longer penalised. Neither are we satisfied with the reply that Sir Edward Grey gave to the subsequent question with regard to Russia, which appears to indicate that, although this country is aware that the export from Russia is limited, "we are not to see to the carrying out of the obligation." It is extremely difficult to reconcile all this with the principles of Free Trade.

* * *

We much regret to observe that M. Metaxas, the very popular and able Greek Minister in London, is to leave us and be transferred to Rome. There is no more charming personality in the diplomatic body, and no one better qualified to serve his country's cause, or more devoted to her interests. If Greece has had less influence of late with English opinion, that is due entirely to the unhappy policy pursued at Athens, and in no sense to the conduct of her affairs by M. Metaxas.

* * *

We observe that the "Times," in announcing a selection from the late Prime Minister's speeches, refers, with a certain irony, to the expression, "Enough of this foolery," which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman used in describing (and ending) some singular verbal gymnastics by Mr. Balfour. The point is a small one, but we may say that Sir Henry, after using the expression, corrected it privately, saying that the word he had in his mind and on the tip of his tongue was not "foolery," but the more polite, and at the same time quite accurate, "fooling."

Politics and Affairs.

THE VISION OF LIBERALISM.

Bacon's saying that "adversity does best discover virtues" is of doubtful application to a political party. Twenty years of almost unceasing struggle against reaction have left their traces upon Liberal Parliamentarians in a strain of timidity and even of conservatism, which is evidently a source of moral and of intellectual weakness. There have always been voices ready to proclaim that the active mission of Liberalism was well nigh fulfilled, and that, for the present, at any rate, it was all-important to preserve what had been won, to regain what had been lost, and to do just as much or as little tinkering as was needed to maintain the fabric of our liberties. We do not for one moment suggest that this is the conscious prevailing sentiment of the Liberal majority in the House, or in the country, and the strenuous warfare waged by the Government in many fields will appear to many a sufficient answer to such criticism. But without arguing the matter here, we cannot refrain from pointing out that almost all the important measures of domestic policy before this Parliament are, in substance, endeavours to recover, for the people and the State, liberties or properties or privileges which had within recent generations been lost or encroached upon by some class, trade, or other vested interest.

In this sense, the Trade Union Act, the Education and Licensing measures, and even the Government's land policy, in its essential features, are conservative. This admission by no means derogates from their importance, but it helps to make us comprehend why Liberalism appears in some quarters lacking in organic purpose and in free enthusiasm. While to Protectionists and Socialists politics are real, positive, and fervent gospels, stirring the imagination and evoking a fanatical energy, the zeal of Liberalism is everywhere chilled by doubts and difficulties. No sooner are we approaching such large issues of social policy as are involved in taxation of land values, pensions, unemployed relief, the House of Lords, than everywhere the atmosphere is kept abuzz with whispers about "sanctity of contract," confiscation, pauperisation, and those hints of popular indifference which take the heart out of reformers.

Does this mean that coldness and placidity of purpose belong essentially to Liberalism as a middle course, and is Liberalism committed to an embarrassing and disheartening opportunism? No such thing. But we have evidently reached a period when a more conscious organisation of Liberal energy is demanded. It is a time to follow Matthew Arnold's advice and "Let our thought play freely upon our stock notions and ideas." The first result of such an operation will be to illuminate our commonplaces regarding the nature of that liberty to the service of which the party is devoted. The negative conception of Liberalism, as a definite mission for the removal of certain political and economic shackles upon personal liberty, is not merely philosophically defective, but historically false. The Liberals of this country as a party never committed themselves either to the theory or the policy of this narrow laissez faire individualism; they never conceived liberty as something limited in quantity, or purely negative in character. But it was true that they tended to lay an excessive emphasis upon the aspect of liberty which consists in absence of restraint, as compared with the other aspect which consists in presence of opportunity; and it is this tendency, still lingering in the mind of the Liberal Party, that to-day checks its energy and blurs its vision. A more constructive and a more evolutionary idea of liberty is needed to give the requisite élan de vie to the movement; and every cause of liberation, individual, class, sex, and national, must be recharged with the fresh enthusiasm of this fuller faith.

Liberalism will still insistently retain its divergence from Socialism, in taking for its distinctive test of policy the freedom of the individual citizen rather than the strength of the State, though the antagonism of the two standpoints may tend to disappear in the light of progressive experience. But it will justify itself by two great enlargements of its liberative functions. In seeking to realise liberty for the individual citizen as "equality of opportunity," it will recognise that, as the area and nature of opportunities are continually shifting, so the old limited conception of the task of Liberalism must always advance. Each generation of Liberals will be required to translate a new set of needs and aspirations into facts. It is because we have fallen so far short of due performance of this task that our Liberalism shows signs of enfeeblement. We must fearlessly face as our first, though not our only question, What is a free Englishman to-day? If we answer this question faithfully, we shall recognise that it comprises many elements of real liberty and opportunity which have not been won for the people as a whole. Is a man free who has not equal opportunity with his fellows of such access to all material and moral means of personal development and work as shall contribute to his own welfare and that of his society? Such equal opportunity at least implies an equal access to the use of his native land as a workplace and a home, such mobility as will enable him to dispose of his personal energies to the best advantage, easy access to that factor of capital or credit which modern industry recognises as essential to economic independence, and to whatever new form of industrial power, electric or other, may be needed to co-operate with human efforts. A man is not really free for purposes of self-development in life and work who is not adequately provided in all these respects, and no small part of constructive Liberalism must be devoted to the attainment of these equal opportunities.

But all such distinctively economic liberties are evidently barren unless accompanied by a far more adequate realisation of spiritual and intellectual opportunity than is contained in our miserably meagre conception of popular education. For education in the large meaning of the term is the opportunity of opportunities, and the virtual denial to the majority of the people of any real share of the spiritual kingdom which is rightly theirs must remain for all true Liberals an incessant challenge to their elementary sense of justice, as well as the most obvious impediment both to the achievement and the utilisation of every other element of personal liberty. It is this truth that also underlies the great struggle against militarism and Imperialism which assumes so many shapes upon the stage of politics, and which, driven to its last resort, will always be disclosed as the antagonism between physical and moral force, as the guardian and promoter of civilisation. The practical interpretation and realisation of moral and intellectual liberty for the people as the most urgent and fruitful of all tasks of Liberalism, though standing first in order of importance, cannot, however, be detached in political endeavour from the other more material liberties. It is the peril, as it is the glory, of Liberalism that it is required to drive several teams abreast along the road of progress.

Finally, though Liberals must ever insist that each enlargement of the authority and functions of the State must justify itself as an enlargement of personal liberty, interfering with individuals only in order to set free new and larger opportunities, there need remain in Liberalism no relics of that positive hostility to public methods of co-operation which crippled the old Radicalism. When society is confronted, as it sometimes will be, by a breakdown of competition and a choice between private monopoly and public enterprise, no theoretic objections to the State can be permitted to militate against public safety. Just in proportion as education guides, enriches, and enlightens the will of the people, and gives spiritual substance and intellectual power to democracy, the presumption which still holds against the adequacy of public as compared with private co-operation will be weakened, and Liberalism will come more definitely to concern itself with the liberation and utilisation of the faculties and potencies of a nation and a municipality, as well as with those of individuals and voluntary groups of citizens. It surely belongs to Liberalism to think thus liberally about its mission and its modes of progressive achievement. Not, however, of fulfilment. For it is this illimitable character of Liberalism, based on the infinitude of the possibilities of human life, in its individual and social aspects, which affords that vision without which not only a people but a party perishes, the vision of > "that untravelled world whose margin fades

> For ever and for ever as we move."

TOMLINSON OF MANCHESTER, AND ELSEWHERE.

There is an aspect of the Manchester election which, because it exhibits a recurring want of firmness and determination in the electoral mind, is well worth examination. This is the attitude of the Unionist Free Traders who either voted against Mr. Churchill or abstained from supporting him. Their action is not quite on all fours with that of the Irish Home Rulers who, under the persuasion of their priests, usually a Conservative force in politics, have supported a coercionist and an opponent of Home Rule. The Irishman in England is not a fixed force in our politics, and he follows a certain eccentric motion of his own. But the Manchester merchant is, we are ready to believe, a rather typical Englishman, and he so clearly established his line of conduct towards Free Trade at the General Election as to emphasise his abrupt departure from it two years later, when the controversy had again become acute. The argument addressed to him was, no doubt, plausible enough. He was told that the Free Trade cause was not really at stake. A Free Trade Government was in power, and would remain in power for two or three years to come. Therefore the question of a protective tariff could only arise in an acute form in the future, when Manchester and Lancashire could freely exhibit their fidelity to Free Trade. It is difficult to treat an argument of this kind with the patience that one would like to extend to the kindred futility that Mr. Joynson-Hicks was a Free Trader. Mr. Hicks was a Balfourian. Mr. Balfour is the head of a party which has become Protectionist, first through Mr. Balfour's failure to sustain the Free Trade element, and secondly through his own repeated endorsement of as much Protectionist doctrine as can be crammed into the first Tory tariff. The game of the Protectionist Party is to entice into the Protectionist fold those who, not caring to enter by the broad way which Mr. Chamberlain provided, may "find salvation," to use an historic phrase, through Mr. Balfour's wicket gate. To such a tactic the presence of malleable human stuff like Mr. Joynson-Hicks is indispensable. Equally short-sighted is the idea that in such a propaganda the issue of an election like that of Manchester is not of the greatest consequence to Free Trade. A year ago it did look as if Protection were dead. But Mid Devon revived it, and since then we have seen the fabric of heavily endowed agitation blown into the most vigorous life. Lancashire looked like a permanent obstacle. But its resistance has been pricked at the heart, and the fault largely lies with the shallow, undiscerning men who played their county and their cause this faithless turn. The effect of Friday week's election will be cumulative; and if Free Trade has to fight for its life, and possibly lose it, in 1910 or 1911, that discreditable result will lie largely to its account.

Nor, we are bound to add, have we any respect for the motives which determined the abstention or the hostility of a portion at least of the Free Trade Unionist or Whig vote at Manchester. We do not know what right any middle-class Free Trader had to assume in 1906 that the Liberal Government proposed to content itself with a simple affirmation of Free Trade. The late Prime Minister, at least, spared no pains to dissipate this illusion, which, if it had penetrated the Government's councils, would have overthrown them in a week. No intelligent man could suppose that a Liberal-Radical Government could issue from an election which, at a stroke, had created a Labor Party of fifty members fixed in an attitude of sheer Conservatism, and unable to do anything with the Protectionists' indictment of poverty and unemployment but ignore it, or to pretend that it was untrue. Social reform was the pith and essence of the defence of Free Trade; it turned the flank of its main attack. Without it the workmen must have been driven in flocks into one of two camps—Socialism or Protection. We confess we find it difficult to excuse the selfishness which, viewing the great wealth accumulated under Free Trade, and desiring to preserve it for powerful reasons connected with the national commerce and well-being can, at the same time, tender no concessions to the classes that have reaped the smallest measure of benefit from it. But whatever may be said about the morals of such an attitude, its material consequence is clear enough. If the Whig Free Trader thinks that we have arrived at a kind of blessed equilibrium in the general lot, he is greatly mistaken. He must make election. He cannot, like Mr. Kipling's Tomlinson, stand shivering and balancing between two spheres. Either he must be content to risk confusion and possible ruin to the shipping and import trades of this country under Protection, or he must take it that democratic politics does not end with the creation of a sound system of revenue and international exchange. Tomlinson of Manchester must face things square; they will not change their character because he would fain see politics back to the ideas of the 'sixties.

We regret to find, however, that the counsels of Tomlinson have penetrated beyond the north-west division of Manchester, and have reached the office of the "Westminster Gazette," which, indeed, is not far from his original quarters in Berkeley Square. The "Westminster Gazette," in its issue of Saturday, tells the Government that "a serious endeavour must be made to clear the ground of the many conflicting issues which now puzzle the electors," and that it does not want "the wavering elector to be perpetually distracted by the thought that if he is voting for something which he thinks very important, he is voting against something else which he thinks equally important." We shall be glad to learn the recipe for this process of perfect mental detachment, which, indeed, seems hardly made for a workaday world. And we cannot think that the "Westminster" merely means that the programme of the Government must be put into as concise and practical shape as possible, or that there should be an attempt to compromise an issue like the religious quarrel in education, where the contending parties are so evenly balanced that one cannot completely dominate the other. The suggestion is, we suspect, and as the context shows, a more refined and plausible form of the old Conservative-Whig argument of the "Spectator"—"concentrate on Free Trade."

But in this sense you cannot concentrate on Free Trade, for in its logical conclusion such a device means that social progress ought to have stopped short in 1903 when Mr. Chamberlain took up Protection, and should never go on again until he abandons it. There is no chance of an undivided outlook on such a policy. If you must concentrate on anything, it must be on the national question, on the "condition of the people," their industries and their lives. This, indeed, gives true unity of conception not only to the Free Trade policy of the Government, but to such measures as Old Age Pensions, the Eight Hours Bill, the Licensing Bill, and the Housing Bill, and presents, in its broad aspects, a continuous function of repair and appeasement of those economic forces which are inimical to the happiness of the community. Mr. Asquith's language on this point at the Reform Club lacked nothing in clearness and precision, and it is incidentally enforced by Sir John Brunner's significant advice to the new Prime Minister to drop the pure laissez-faire side of Cobdenism, and to make a "big effort for the benefit of British trade." The tone and the language of fright, of half-views, of visions of the whole electorate as consisting of the fabulous "widow and orphan," whose subsistence withers every night on the brewers' platforms, confuse the Liberal outlook, injure the chance of healthy relationships with the Labor Party, and weaken the feeling of compunction for social ills which continually fortifies the purpose of Liberalism.

A FREE HAND FOR THE STATE.

The debate on the Second Reading of the Licensing Bill, though it has not produced any great flights of oratory, has been maintained at a level not unworthy of the issues involved. Though good points have been made by the Opposition on both sides of the House—notably by Mr. George Cave, the mover of the official amendment, whose sincerity of purpose and moderation of statement have been universally recognised—they have been in the main Committee points which do not go to the root of the measure.

The desirability of a large reduction in the facilities for obtaining liquor is not seriously contested by anyone outside the trade. The country has made up its mind on the subject, and Mr. Balfour's Act of 1904 stops the Opposition from being heard against it. The details of the machinery by which this object is to be effected, including the adequacy of the compensation to be given for the extinction of licences during the reduction period, are certainly matters for discussion, and afford abundant scope for debate in Committee. But they do not affect the main scheme of the Bill. Mr. Cave made an excellent Committee point when he showed how the provisions which make the basis of taxation and compensation identical would in many cases reduce the amount of compensation payable to a merely insignificant figure if the present assessable values be maintained. But the answer to that is, first, that the effect of the Bill will undoubtedly be largely to raise the assessments of public-houses, and that, therefore, the figures he gave represent cases which will not happen in actual practice; and, secondly, that if the machinery for securing this result is insufficient, it can be amended without serious interference with the structure of the measure. And if the first object of the Bill has not been really challenged, the second and still more important object, that of ultimately securing, by means of a time limit to licences, a free hand for the State to deal with the retail sale of liquor, no less assuredly holds the field. The Prime Minister, whose speech in opening the debate was marked by a firmness and determination which augur well for the success of his leadership, used with marked effect those powers of interrogative challenge which he has again and again effectively employed in dealing with the fiscal question. He put pointedly to the Opposition the questions: "Do you approve of the principle of a time limit?" "Do you, or do you not, agree that the State is entitled to resume, after fair notice, a monopoly which it has itself created?" Mr. Walter Long, the spokesman of the Front Opposition Bench, did not answer these questions with a simple negative. His answer was in effect: "We believe the time limit to be absolutely incompatible with a concurrent levy for compensation purposes." We disagree, of course, with this position. But the compensation levy of a little over a million a year—only little more than about one-fortieth of the total taxation of liquor—is a small matter compared with the sinking fund which would be required to replace licence values at the end of fourteen years. Are we to assume that Mr. Long is prepared to accept a time limit without concurrent compensation levies? If so, a very short extension of the time limit, which we think the Government have acted wisely in not conceding until there is some evidence that it would secure the acceptance of the Bill by the Opposition in both Houses, would put the trade into exactly the same position as if the compensation charge were remitted. The fact is, that unless the claim of the trade for a freehold in their licences, which Mr. Balfour has more than once repudiated, be admitted, there can be no answer in logic to the arguments that existing equities can be justly dealt with by a timit limit.

Mr. Asquith and Mr. Herbert Samuel cleared away very widespread misconceptions about the Bill when they showed clearly that the monopoly value which is to be charged by the State at the end of the time limit will not include the ordinary trade profit of the publican or the goodwill of his business, but will simply represent the extra profit which he is able to obtain through the restriction of competition. We are glad, by the way, to note that the proposal, repeatedly made in these columns, that this monopoly value should go into the National Exchequer, and not, as now, into the County or County Borough Fund, is likely to be carried out. Ministers were, we fear, less effective in their statements as to the elements of the present value of licences. Herein they have exposed themselves to the powerful criticism of the ablest organ of the Conservative Party in the Press—the "Morning Post"—still a strong supporter of the main principle of the Bill. It cannot be denied that the price obtainable in the market for a licence consists of the goodwill of the publicans' business, treated as if it were an ordinary retail trade, as well as of that special value which is derived from the possession of the right to sell an article which everyone else is not allowed to sell. The former element is small compared to the latter. But it undoubtedly exists, and the Government Bill awards compensation for its extinction during the reduction period by the provision that the licence holder is to receive compensation for loss of business. Mr. Asquith says that the only provision which the Government time limit recognises and enables the prudent trader to make provision for, is that part of his profits which is attributable to the monopoly value of his licence. But the object of the time limit is to get rid of existing equities altogether. And the ordinary goodwill of a publican's business is an equity at least as real as that portion of the value of his licence which is derived from a State-created monopoly. It is true that the goodwill is not created by the State. But the State claims the right to destroy it in 1923, if it thinks fit. It is not an adequate answer to reply that the publican will probably in the majority of cases be allowed at the end of the time limit to continue in the enjoyment of his goodwill. To say this is to admit that in the cases where he is not so allowed he would have an equitable claim to compensation. But if this were so, the time limit would have failed to achieve what we, at any rate, regard as its principal object—an object far higher in social importance than the merely financial object of securing monopoly values for the national purse—that of securing "dominion and control" for the State over the retail trade in intoxicants, and a clear field for reform in the methods by which it is conducted. The State must have the right—if it chooses—to sell liquor itself, or to let the municipalities sell it—though we approve of neither of these methods—or to hand licences over to disinterested management, or to put them up by auction for a fixed term, or to discontinue half of them altogether, as well as to continue them in the hands of the existing publican. It must not be under any equitable obligation to hand them over to the man who has the goodwill. Otherwise that goodwill will remain as a fetter upon the freedom of the People to control the liquor trade.

It would be premature and foolish to discuss the methods in which that control may be exercised fifteen years or more hence. We shall have to be guided by the experience of other countries and by the development of our own. We believe the freedom to be well worth waiting for; and we have never, therefore, advocated a shorter time limit than fourteen years. But this freedom we must have, without fetter or qualification. And we believe that it is the hope of attaining it which gives to the Bill, in spite of the powerful interests which are mustering against it, the moral momentum which alone can carry it on to the statute-book. The speech of Mr. Cameron Corbett, the letter of Lord Lytton to the Bishop of Chester, and the clear and vigorous address of the Archbishop of Canterbury at the annual meeting of the Church of England Temperance Society, are fresh evidences of the truth of the Prime Minister's warning to the Opposition that they are living in a fools' paradise, and that they have miscalculated the character and the potency of the forces which are arrayed behind the great instrument of social betterment on which he is bravely staking the political fortunes of himself and his Administration.

AN AMERICAN LABOR PARTY.

One of the most momentous, and quite the most hopeful, developments in American politics is the growth of an organised Labor Party. It is a development with which we in England, having a special connection, should have also a special sympathy. To a very large degree it is the offspring of our own Labor movement. It is safe to say that no event in British politics of the last quarter of a century, not even Mr. Gladstone's conversion to Home Rule, has so powerfully and intimately affected American opinion as the successes of the Labor Party at the General Election of 1906. Their influence in stimulating the political consciousness of the American working men, and in revealing to the trade union leaders the possibilities of combined political action, was deep and instantaneous. They suggested an inevitable comparison. They moved American labor to inquire whether what had proved possible in Great Britain might not prove equally possible in the United States. They brought home to the popular comprehension, as nothing else could, the contrast between the supreme potential strength of American labor in politics and its almost total failure to make that strength effective. Of all the paradoxes of American civilisation, this, hitherto, has been perhaps the most amazing. How comes it that in that great industrial democracy Labor has never until now "found itself," and that in a country which is popularly (but quite wrongly) supposed to be the paradise of the working man, the working man has hitherto failed to secure a direct representation of his interests? With the voting power of the country well in their hands, constantly assured by their leaders that both Republicans and Democrats have treated them as mere electioneering pawns, and conscious as they must be that they have only to vote as a separate and cohesive unit to swamp both the historic parties and seize the government for themselves, how is it that the American working men have not long ago realised, developed, and asserted their latent political power?

There are probably many answers to this question, and many reasons to account for the political ineffectiveness of Labor on any large scale. Some of them are touched upon with clearness and knowledge by the writer of the "Foreign Chronique" in the current issue of the "Fortnightly Review." He rightly gives the first place to the extraordinary rigidity of party ties and party organisations in the United States. There is perhaps no country in which it is so difficult to start an independent political movement. The Republicans and the Democrats have for so long monopolised the field, they have so skilfully won for their own organisations the special protection of the law, they have so assiduously buttressed their power by alliances with the industrial plutocracy, the whole immense and intricate machinery of "primaries" and conventions is so completely in their hands, the Americans are such blind worshippers of the principle of "regularity," and think it not merely a high political misdemeanour, but something very like sacrilege to vote against their favourite party, and the enormous size of the country makes the effective promotion of a new party an enterprise of such vast expense and such constant hazard, that Labor might well have shrunk from the task. Then, again, the working men of America have hitherto been genuinely divided into Republicans and Democrats. The more intelligent and skilful among them have been Republicans for the singularly unintelligent reason that the Republican Party is the party of Protection. The lower grades have, as a rule, been Democrats because the Democratic Party, as they believe, has the interests of the "common people" more at heart, and has always offered a more vehement opposition, on the platform at any rate, to the plutocracy. The trade union leaders have been compelled to recognise the fact of this division. In the United States the inner conflict in trade unionism, the long struggle to discipline its membership, has been far more arduous and dramatic than its external conflict with the employer.

This is to some extent the case in all countries, but it is particularly so in America, partly because of the restiveness of the national temperament, partly because of race variations, and partly because of the stupendous complexities introduced into the economic system by the hordes of immigrants. The trade union leaders have hesitated to complicate their internal problems by advocating an independent attitude towards politics. They have, on the contrary, rather sought to keep politics in the background. They have preferred to be the allies of the regular parties, rather than to organise a force of their own. Attempts, many attempts, to form a stable and Independent Labor Party have, of course, been made, but they have always ended in failure. Nor have the rank and file been earnest in their desire to have it otherwise. It is a lamentable but an indisputable fact that trade unionism in the United States has been tainted by most of the vices that have degraded American business and American politics. The men limit their trust in their leaders to industrial disputes, and even in that sphere it is by no means absolute. Industrial America has not yet reached that point of moral confidence when a Labor leader, elected to Congress, and put in receipt of his Congressional salary of £1,200 a year, and exposed to all the solicitations of capitalistic politics, could be sure of the continued respect and trust either of his followers or of his fellow-leaders.

For these reasons the Labor vote has never been a class vote or even a solid party vote. The great quarrel of the American Socialists with the American trade unionists is, indeed, precisely this, that the latter, by their abstention from politics, have helped to perpetuate the present wage-system. Both Republicans and Democrats have in consequence been able to angle successfully for their share of the Labor vote. The Bosses have courted it, but have never really feared it. Only once in recent American politics has Labor shown that it could cut loose from party affiliations and vote with a rational approach to unanimity. It is clear, however, that the days of disunited force and a scattered allegiance are drawing to an end. The American Federation of Labor, fired by British example, resolved early in 1906 to enter politics. In the elections of that year it seriously reduced, though it could not quite wipe out, the majorities of those whom it declared to be hostile to the interests of Labor, and by judicious compacts with the Democrats it succeeded in electing several of its own candidates to Congress and to the local State Legislatures. Since then some astounding decisions of the Supreme Court against the rights and legal status of trade unions have given to Labor a new sense of solidarity. An Independent Labor Party has been founded, but without the support and against the wishes of the great majority of American trade unionists. We do not expect much from it at present. We agree that for some time to come Labor will best assert itself by voting solidly for or against the candidates of the regular parties rather than for candidates of its own. That, however, is at bottom a question, though a very important one, of tactics. The really vital thing is that American Labor, roused by the new economic issues that now dominate American discussion, by the spectacle of a pervasive plutocracy using politics as the chief instrument of its iniquities, by the multiplying revelations of financial and business corruption, and by the many agencies that have brought about what is nothing less than a moral awakening of the American people, is at last closing its ranks, becoming penetrated with a new sense of class interests and of class unity, and is preparing at the forthcoming Presidential election to vote as a conscious and distinctive force. That is not a revolution, but it is unquestionably the beginnings of one.

Life and Letters.

ORDER.

Coming from where they cooked their food, we passed down a passage. The old warder in his dark blue uniform and a cap whose peak hung over his level iron-grey eyebrows, stopped.

"This," he said, "is the jewel-room;" and, taking a key that hung below his belt, he opened an iron door. A convict with a yellow face, in yellow clothing marked with arrows, and in his yellow hand a piece of yellow leather, darted a look at us, dropped his glance, and, with a dreadful, silent, swift obsequiousness, passed us and went out. We stood alone amongst the jewels that he had evidently been polishing.

"We call it the jewel-room for fun," the old warder said, and a smile, the first of the morning, visited his face, but quickly left his eyes again to that strange mournful look which some eyes have in the depths of them—a look as if, in strict attention to the outer things of life, their owner had parted with his soul. He took one of the jewels from the wall and held it out. It was a light steel bangle joined by a light steel chain to another light steel bangle.

"That's what they wear now when it's necessary to put them on."

One may see in harness-rooms bits and chains and stirrups glisten, but never was harness-room so garnished as this little chamber. The four walls were bright as diamonds to the very ceiling with jewels of every kind—light and heavy bangles, long chains, short chains, thin chains, and very thick iron chains.

"Those are old-fashioned," said the warder; "we don't use them now."

"And this?"

It stood quite close, made of three very bright steel bars, joined at the top, wide asunder at the bottom, and clamped together by cross bars in the middle.

"That's the triangles," he said, a little hurriedly.

"Do you flog much?"

He stared. You are lacking, he seemed to say, in delicacy.

"Very little," he answered; "only when it's necessary." And, unconscious that he had proclaimed the spirit of the system that he served—the spirit of all systems—he drew his heels together, as though saluting discipline.

To his old figure standing there, tall, upright, and so orderly, and to his grave and not unkindly face, it was impossible to feel aversion. But in this little room there seemed to come and stand in line with him, and at his back, in an ever-growing pyramid, shaped to an apex, like the very triangles themselves, the countless figures of officialdom. They stood there, upright and orderly, with the words, "Only when it's necessary," coming from their mouths. And as one looked one saw how chiselled in its form, how smooth and slippery in surface, how impermeable in structure, was that pyramid. Wedged in perfect symmetry, bound together man to man by something common to their souls, this phalanx stood by the force of its own shape, like dead masonry, stone on stone, each resting on the other, solid and immovable, in terrifying stillness. And in the eyes of all that phalanx—blue eyes, brown eyes, grey eyes, and mournful hazel eyes, converging on one point—there was the same look:

"Stand away, please—don't touch the pyramid!"

Turning his back on the triangles, the old warder said again:

"Only when it's necessary."

"And when is it necessary?"

"The rules decide that."

"Of course. But who makes them?"

His smile faded. "The system," he replied.

"And do you know how the system has come about?"

He frowned—a strange question, this, to ask him!

"That," he said, with slight impatience in his voice, "is not for me to say." And he jerked his neck, as though continuing:

"Ask that of him behind me!"

Involuntarily I looked, but there was no one there behind him—only the triangles, beautifully bright. Then, with the same uncanny suddenness, there sprang up again a vision of that solid pyramid of men, and the head of each turned over his shoulder, saying:

"Ask that of him behind me."

With eagerness I tried to see the apex of that pyramid. It was too far away.

"We've got to maintain order," he said, suddenly, as though repelling a subtle onslaught on his point of view.

"Of course; everything in this room, I suppose, is for that purpose?"

"Everything—that's in use."

"Ah, yes! I think you said there are some things that are not used now?"

"Those big iron chains, and these weights here—they weighed the prisoners down with those; that's all out of date."

"They look rather queer and barbarous, certainly."

He smiled.

"You may say that," he said.

"And can you tell me how they came to be disused?"

He seemed again to check the action of turning his head round.

"No," he said; "I couldn't tell you that. They found they weren't necessary, I suppose."

"When they were used, I take it the authorities believed in them?"

"No doubt," he answered, "or they wouldn't have used them."

"They never thought that we should be looking at these things, and calling them barbarous, like this."

He stared at the great manacles.

"They used them," he said, "and never thought about it, I daresay."

"They must have considered them necessary for discipline."

"Just that."

"And was discipline any better then than it is now?"

"Oh, no! Worse! They had a lot more trouble with the prisoners than we have, from what I hear."

"If anyone had told the authorities then that those heavy things did no good, they'd have laughed at him."

He answered with a smile: "Little doubt of that."

"I wonder whether, a few years hence, people will be standing here and saying the same thing about those triangles, and all these other jewels, and calling us barbarians for using them? It would be interesting to know."

His brows contracted: "Not likely," he said; "you can't do without them."

"You think it would not be possible?"

Again he seemed to check his eyes from looking round.

"No," he repeated, "you can't do without them."

"It would be dangerous to try?"

He shook his close-cropped head under the peaked cap.

"I shouldn't like to see it tried. We must keep order."

"At the time they left off using those heavy chains, they must have thought they ran a risk?"

He answered coldly: "I don't know anything about that."

"The present state of things is final then?"

He put the bangles back upon their nail, and turning rather suddenly, as though fearing to be attacked behind, said: "We don't trouble about such things; we're here to administer the system as we find it. We don't use these, except when it's necessary."

"Have you not begged the question?"

He said with dignity: "That is not my business," laying his hand upon the triangles. And as he did so there seemed to spring up once more that solid phalanx, man linked to man, all with the same schoolmaster's eyes—a living pyramid, turned to stone by the force of its own shape. And a sound came forth from them as though they were assenting, but it was only the scraping of the triangles, as the old warder pushed them a little further back.

He went to the door and opened it; and going out in answer to this invitation, I looked back at the jewels. They hung in perfect brightness, round about the triangles; and suddenly, with that same dreadful, silent, swift obsequiousness, the man in yellow clothing marked with arrows, with the yellow face, and the yellow leather in his hand, passed us and went in. The iron door closed on him with a clang; but before it closed, I saw him at work already, polishing those shining jewels.

In dreams I have seen him since, alone with those emblems of a perfect order, working without sound! And in dreams, too, guiding me away, I see the old warder with his regular, grave face, and his eyes mourning for something he has lost.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

FROM MID DEVON TO MANCHESTER.

A FEW months ago I was trying to find explanation for a remarkable fact: that the Liberal Party had been in power for two years with an abnormal, unprecedented following, and yet in all that time had practically neither lost a seat (except to Labour, or with Labour-disturbing elements) nor reduced its majorities. In some cases, indeed, it had even increased them. That fact no longer exists to-day. A series of somewhat sensational bye-elections, in districts widely differing in character and local interests, has resulted in a series of somewhat sensational defeats. I have been present at four of these—Mid Devon, Peckham, Dewsbury, Manchester. It may be interesting to attempt a diagnosis of causes—if not to excuse, to explain.

One noticeable fact is the absence of any single compelling and dominant question. So complex is the political situation that elections fought simultaneously, and within a very short distance of each other, are fought upon divergent arguments and advocacies. It is only little more than an hour's journey between Dewsbury and Manchester; yet the pilgrimage (last week) was to a different world. At Dewsbury, education scarcely seemed to count, Free Trade and Protection were in abeyance, the Eight Hours Bill for Miners was little heard of, even the "Trade" seemed to be exceedingly quiet until their splendid organisation was revealed on the election day. Discussion had passed from these subjects to a "Right-to-Work" Bill, the problem of the unemployed, the Liberal record in social legislation, the future for social reform. At Manchester, on the other hand, Free Trade was a living cry, upon which, although the Opposition candidate attempted to elude it, the Government representative essayed to throw the full burden of the contest. The counter efforts were the Education Bill (for the first time voted upon by a Lancashire electorate), Home Rule, and a Miner's eight hours day as a method of producing dear coal. It is true to say, indeed, that in each of these four elections all the issues were present. In each a certain number of voters were influenced by various lesser subjects of excitement or repudiation. But the conviction is once more driven home, by examination of them, that it is the people, and not the political organisations, which select the issues. Whatever may be sprawled upon every hoarding, or shouted at every street corner, by a deliberate process of selection, the balance of quiet, unostentatious men of doubtful opinion who decide the verdict—the few hundreds or thousands who are normally outside allegiance to any political party—will vote upon the question which they think important—not upon the question which we think important.

And in each of these four cases the decision has been different. At Mid Devon Tariff Reform was the deciding factor. Peckham was lost in a carnival of drink and excitement: "rushed" as only a London district can be rushed by the trade campaign conducted from all the public houses, and by organisations from outside, which frightened the electors with dear coal and dear bread. Dewsbury was won on social reform, with a majority diminished owing to the return of Tory Free Traders to their old allegiance, and the quiet work of the public houses amongst the poorer sections of the people. North-West Manchester—after a Homeric contest, in which all the city took part—went back to its traditional Toryism because the Tories who were abstaining two years ago when Free Trade was in danger, voted with their party to-day, thinking Free Trade secure: and because the Irish were largely persuaded to vote for their schools as a living issue, rather than for a Home Rule against which the Government was pledged until after the General Election. Far away in Scotland, again, all these cries and counter cries are silent, or replaced by a totally different set of arguments; with the rural labourer and small farmer voting steadily for security of tenure on the land, proclaiming a different opinion of the Scottish Land Bill from that voiced by the large Scottish landlords; and the city working man voting for the Land Valuation Bill, which is a preliminary to the rating of land values; and both of them voting against a House of Lords (hardly mentioned in the English contests), which has so contemptuously rejected both the one and the other.

In every case Tariff Reform and its elaborate propagandism has been manifest as a positive and resistant force: the one constructive element which can raise enthusiasm in an otherwise arid Tory programme. The quiet work of hundreds of obscure "missionaries" in hundreds of towns and villages, is exhibiting far more fruitful results than the huge open campaign of a few years back. Tariff promises can here be adapted to different classes of producers, without any of the collision of interests which immediately arises when these are fitted together into a consistent whole. To the hop grower a tax on hops; to the Devon dairy farmer, a tax on foreign dairy produce; in the manufacturing cities, no food taxes that could in the least degree raise the price of food, but a substantial protection for each city's own particular manufacture—so the pleasant work goes forward. It is Protection in the country, whatever it may appear in the newspapers, or before Parliament: Protection, naked and entirely unashamed. No one talks about the "Empire," or the sacrifice which must be made for its preservation: no one is interested in Colonial Preference, or the questions of reciprocity and unification. To the manufacturer the monopoly of the home market is offered for his manufactures. To the workman more work, with greater security, is promised as a result of the taxation or exclusion of the foreigner.

These are cries which appeal with some force to every manufacturer who is worsted in competition, or feels the impact of a declining market: and to the workman who is more and more coming to be haunted with the fear of unemployment: who has no security but that of two weeks' notice of dismissal. Whether such propagandism can face the light of a General Election, where items such as the food taxes—now generally pushed into the background—must either be endorsed or condemned, is a legitimate subject for speculation. Manchester, certainly, shows no kind of conversion: and Manchester speaks for a large section of England. The idea that Free Trade has toppled over in its centre and "most holy place" is an idea entirely ridiculous to all those who were familiar with the conditions of the actual election. The people who decided the contest had made up their minds—and nothing could alter them—to vote at the bye-election upon other issues. Free Trade yesterday, Free Trade to-morrow—not Free Trade to-day. In this they were assisted by the Tory candidate, who implored them on every occasion to vote against him at the General Election (if they wished) on Free Trade, but at the bye-election to exhibit their general dissatisfaction with the Liberal Ministers, in a demand that these should "go slow" in the work of change. Whether such a method of defending Free Trade is ultimately possible may indeed be doubted. Beyond the question of the manner in which Manchester interpreted the election stands the further question of the manner in which England interpreted the election. And the songs of triumph at the "Downfall of Cobdenism," which have already been sung, may have convinced already those who have adopted the policy that it is a policy impossible in the conditions of the modern world.

The changing of those conditions, in the introduction of novel machinery, designed to perplex, if not to convince, is one of the characteristics of the present year's contests. Manchester last week was in pandemonium. A kind of intoxication of oratory fell upon its enormous packed populations. Wherever a man was holding forth on any conceivable subject there was an assured and sympathetic audience. Every hall was crammed, with insurgent crowds outside, two hours before the advertised time of meeting. "Spell-binders" on the approved American model, with lungs of leather and brains of brass, shouted contradictory invective from dawn till midnight. Men (and women) spouted fluent cajolery or contempt from lorries and wagonettes, clinging to lamp posts, planted on the street kerb, or shrieking from upper windows. In the Central Square, in the snow-storms and bitter cold, aggregations which must have mustered tens of thousands listened (as best they might) to rival elocutionists suspended above the mob below; here an Irish meeting in one corner, there a special meeting for the Jews in another; here the Suffragettes, here the appeal of the brewers, there the demand for Free Trade. Huge carts—the coal consumers with bogus miners and sacks of coal, the rival apparatus of real miners dug up from underground—moved slowly through the cheering crowds. Torch-light processions of special demonstrators turned darkness into day. The oratory appeared to be independent of electoral results. The Socialists held large meetings, attended by thousands, and polled less than three hundred; the Suffragettes could fill the biggest halls and theatres in Manchester and yet they probably did not alter ten votes. It was a crowd good-tempered and sober, excited but not riotous; whose general behaviour, especially on the night of defeat, was beyond all praise. Out of all this three-quarters of a million of people, all of whom took part with relish in the fray, only a tiny section of the city were permitted to vote; a section which consisted in the main of the business men, the Catholics and Irish, and the Jews. A poll of the whole of Manchester would, I think, have shown a different result. As it is, if the Government representative had been able to hold the Irish vote, he would just have been returned. North-West Manchester was actually lost on the protest of the Roman Catholics of Lancashire against the Education Bill.

Peckham showed a similar, if less acute disturbance: with all South London enjoying this novel form of sport, and drifting down into its streets, for the pleasure of being at the centre of the excitement. Mid Devon and Dewsbury revealed a less exuberant political agitation, probably because they were in less tightly congested areas. The difference in the crowds was a very noticeable feature. In Devon, in Dewsbury, and in Manchester, the men and women who occupied the streets in good-tempered excitement were almost entirely Liberal or Labor. The Conservatives were recruited from the more silent voter, who was in his own house after sundown. In Peckham, on the other hand, the "mob" was Tory; in sharp contrast to the same London "mob" of two years ago, which would scarcely tolerate a Tory speaker. At Dewsbury and (to a lesser extent) in Manchester, the unexpected feature was the diminution of the Labor vote, and the complete collapse of the Socialist. From Huddersfield, all through the week of contest, there came over to Dewsbury and Batley the pick of the Labor speakers. Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Keir Hardie were escorted in triumphant procession, and addressed vast, enthusiastic crowds. All observers alike—Liberal, Tory, and Labor—were convinced that the one certain forecast was an increase in the Labor poll by something like a thousand. As a matter of fact, it fell two hundred; and the increase went to the Tories, who seemed to have no life and fire in the contest, and to be a beaten party from the beginning.

My aim here is diagnosis—not remedy: in an attempt to find out why the elections were lost. Mid Devon, much the most sensational, remains chiefly to the credit of Protection, although still in part inexplicable. In general summary I should say that they show a Toryism gaining rather than losing (in bye-elections) by the Protectionist propaganda; that this progaganda fixes on the "Achilles heel" of modern industrial society, the uncertainty of employment on a weekly wage system, and the lack of any provision for the unemployed but the workhouse; that the Education Bill counts for a substantial factor in the electoral interest of Lancashire: that London at present is being swept by an anti-Government wave, principally on the Beer Bill (which is imperfectly understood by the working-men, and supposed to close public houses altogether, or in vast numbers, and to send up the price of beer); and that dear bread, and the fear of dear coal, even if calculated by farthings, count enormously as an electoral factor; far more than any have clearly realised who are unfamiliar with the struggle for existence among the poor. When the new Protection, based on demand for employment, confronts the unshakeable repudiation of a food tax, there should arise a situation of singular interest.

C. F. G. Masterman.

ARE WILD ANIMALS BORN WILD?

One of the first characteristics of wild nature which strikes a European when he travels in foreign countries, away from the beaten paths of civilisation, is the changed attitude of wild animals towards him. In the interior parts of South Africa there is a peculiarity in this respect about the birds and beasts not usually hunted for food, which, although it often escapes the notice of the less observant, engages the attention of those interested in the habits of animals. All the wild creatures of this description appear to the visitor to be much tamer than the familiar starlings, blackbirds, finches, squirrels, and the few score of forms which make up the corresponding wild fauna at home. The visitor soon notices however, that there is a certain average distance beyond which he is not allowed to approach. Each species, just as in the case of wild forms at home, has its own limitations. While in South Africa the imaginary circle which each kind draws round itself is undoubtedly of less diameter than in England, the average distance from which man is regarded at ease is fixed and invariable. The innumerable parrots of the bush veldt seem almost tame to the Englishman. The native pigeons are somewhat wilder, but they are far less wild than the wood pigeons at home. Even the Cape sparrow, who, with his larger size and more melodious voice, mimics in the towns of South Africa the airs of his European relative, is in every respect a more friendly bird than the familiar English house sparrow. What is the meaning of these facts?

In the backwoods of Canada, or in the pine forests of the Rocky Mountains, the visitor is struck with the same peculiarities of wild life. All the creatures not actually sought after and systematically hunted—the chickarees, the gophers, and the smaller forest birds—seem to the visitor to be surprisingly tame. But everywhere there is here also to be observed the interesting fact that each species has its own set distance within which man is considered unsafe. No two forms are alike in their standards, but, wilder or tamer, all the individuals of each species adhere with most remarkable unanimity to the standard ideas of their kind on the subject.

In endeavouring to answer the question suggested by those facts, the present writer undertook some years ago a series of experiments which led him to unexpected conclusions, and particularly with regard to one of the most deep-seated and widely received ideas of the average mind, namely, that all animals have an instinctive fear of men. The two species of wild animals with which experiments were first begun were selected as being the most shy of our native kinds. The common British field hare is a very wild and timid animal. Our native wild rabbit similarly has the distinction of being so inherently wild that it is said to be untamable. In experiments with young wild hares brought up under close observation and made familiar with persons from the earliest age, not the slightest inherent fear of human beings could be traced at any stage. The hares proved in all cases as familiar and friendly with all those around them as if they had been creatures of their own kind. Experiments with young wild rabbits gave the same results. They showed no instinctive fear whatever of man if they were kindly treated from the beginning. It is true that both the wild hares and wild rabbits retained their great natural timidity. But this was always displayed in the presence of unfamiliar sounds, movements, places, or smells. On such occasions they would suddenly become almost as wild creatures under the influence of the strong emotions excited. But when care was taken to analyse the experiences nothing was ever found to justify the conclusion that there was the slightest inbred fear of man in either case. A still more remarkable fact was that the young wild rabbits showed no instinctive fear even of a dog when made familiar with it from the beginning. These experiments were extended to other animals; to a number of our native wild birds, to wild ducks, to seagulls, sheldrakes, and other creatures. In no case was the impression left that the young of any of the wild animals possessed from the beginning any instinctive fear of man. To all appearance their natural and inbred disposition when studied under close observation was to treat man on just as friendly and familiar terms as one of their own kind.

What, therefore, is the explanation of these remarkable facts? For at first sight they seem to run counter to all the results of accepted observation. Have we not all of us who have studied wild nature found, like Mr. Kearton, that the effigy of a cow or horse excites not the least alarm at the closest quarters among our native wild birds, whereas any attempt to appear in in propria persona causes instant flight.

There seems to be room for only one explanation. The attitude of wild creatures to man, and perhaps to friends or enemies in general, is not the result of knowledge born with them, and therefore instinctive. It is the effect on them of the public opinion of their kind. It is the average result of long accumulated experience in the past, which is taught to the young at every generation. The simplicity and effectiveness with which this surprising result is achieved may be witnessed any Spring day in our town squares in the case of the London house sparrow. When the young sparrows first flutter from the nest they are almost tame. If we endeavour to approach them, however, there invariably comes instantaneously the loud jar of warning notes from the watchful cock sparrow, causing immediate flight in the young. This is constantly repeated during the first few days, until the young birds have acquired a knowledge of the exact distance beyond which, in the average opinion of the sparrow-world, it is not considered safe to allow man to approach. This is no doubt the explanation of the remarkable facts of wild life, as noticed at the beginning, and as they may be observed in all parts of the world. The exact relations of wild creatures to man, and to their enemies of all kinds, is the average result of the accumulated experience of countless generations of experience in the past. It is usually not inbred, but is inherited from public opinion, passed on, just as we see the London sparrow passing it on every Spring from generation to generation.

THE MART.

For interlacing miles of murky streets it presses up great structures to the sky in packed, irregular facades—grim buildings in an atmosphere of gloom; and a blackened wire network binds it down.

In all its wedged and crowded dinginess, where millions spend great slices of their lives, there are no homes, except an occasional top-storey room; block upon block, blank windows seem to frown. For here men only come in search of wealth, or a competence, or the wherewithal to live. In vast converging crowds they come during the opening hours of the day; and swarm and press into its sombre labyrinth of ways. Into the doorways of its thoroughfares, into dark courts and alleys and blind streets, through passages and archways, and down steps they disappear, to drudge or direct or scheme. And every hour of the working day more millions pour into its human pack; and millions leave its precincts for a while, or rush about anxiously from point to point. So that its streets are black with shifting hordes of hurrying humanity—dodging and pushing and charging on. At evening the hidden millions reappear, darting upon the streets like hunted things, and add their haste to some great hurrying stream of tired workers, only intent on getting quickly home.

Daily this mighty army marches in to fill the Mart with life; and nightly leaves it. Thus every day it regularly stirs, pulsates with feverish activity, and slows down, to start again the next day, and the next. And though at intervals its people rest, the momentum of their effort never stops.

For in its centres germinates a daily mass of thought which increases and continues to increase, and generates new forces in the world, of industry and commerce and finance. And a ferment of nefarious schemes, urged by threatened poverty and greed, mingle with lawful enterprise. So, in vast cycles of recurring trade, in tortuous dealings of finance, in speculation, trickery, and fight, the stress and struggle of its turmoil grows—quicker and keener and fiercer every day.

And for this tearing scramble after wealth a weight of principles is left at home; for they who are needlessly encumbered lose their chance.

The faces of its people show its influence. Men with the blank, unfocussed stare of burdened minds, dart through the crowds, and dodge mechanically; or plunge along with painful straining look, as if they saw the anger at delay of those who wait; or stride to a hostile interview, with the frowning, thin-lipped glare of stern resolve. And couples, often parted by the crowds, fling at each other broken sentences in the gabbled speech that races against time. Armies of harassed men with bags, and hatless, breathless youths with documents, and driven boys with baskets of letters for the post, charge every way, in tangled streaks of speed. And drawn back in corners, men converse, quickly by reason of their precious time, or, too intent even to step aside, stand, jostled by the throngs, urging and arguing in undertones; and, as they talk, they peer with searching eyes, to gauge the suspected cunning or to enforce their will.

Amid the oblivious hurry after gain are the apathy and the aftermath of loss. In sudden glimpses are they disclosed. Emerging from a many-lettered door, with unconscious step and wooden gaze, or standing listlessly on the kerb, bowed with the brooding stoop of staring care, men face the shock of ruin or defeat; and as they slowly move along the street, the crowds rush past and bump them callously. And marked by a tightly-buttoned shabbiness and a certain lingering look of better days, the passive failures of the past stare out; faded, or dogged, or battered with excess, they speed to earn the wage they used to pay, or linger to beg a loan in old haunts, or swagger in, with pitiful pretence, to spend the earnings of mean jobs on drink, where they can find a confederate, or hatch some petty trickery of their own.

But all the outward evidence of stress—the urgent busyness, the eagerness and strain—is only the generated energy of hidden springs. For seated in countless quiet inner rooms, are the men who contrive, initiate, and conduct the ramifying forces of the Mart.

Unceasingly, behind well-guarded doors, they work. In rooms with sample-littered floors, and specially marked maps upon the walls, they sign their name, and circulate the products of the earth, thereby; and, from a shabby chair, they stretch out a myriad tentacles of trade to the cities and the corners of the world. In dingy, box-lined rooms with double doors, they shape far-reaching schemes, and fend off difficulties, and devise escapes with practised brain, and pilot insolvent or daring men through the illegalities of law. And pacing the silent floors of spacious rooms, the men who manipulate the bourses give quick, weighed commands, to engineer a profit for themselves out of the fear or folly of blind crowds who hope to win; or, sitting, thinking in an easy chair, create new paper millions for sale. Thus is its mighty motive power produced; and thousands of lesser men, in smaller spheres, transmit the force.

Swelling the legions of its usual press, come the men who leave the beaten track, or the country of their birth, for gain; and with them comes something of the colour of the world.

From every corner of the earth they come. Men with lean faces, sun-burnt and strangely lined, who come from the stretching spaces of the world, and the dripping silence of the jungled hills, and frost-bound wastes, to deal in tropical estates, or miles of land, or mines in desolate ungoverned spots, where labour owns allegiance to a gun. And men in clothes all creased with long disuse, recalling the engine-smell of ships, burnt scrub, or the exotic scents of hot bazaars, come in to sell concessions hardly won—railways to run through tracks where white men die, or grants from aboriginal kings, or a tramway for some steaming city of the East. And hawk-featured or flat-faced foreigners, from the wide white cities of sunny lands, bring strange schemes of international finance, or devious intrigues for bribed monopolies.

Besides these wanderers come the multitudes who have or want or need: old women curiously cloaked, and clutching bags, and dainty ladies seemingly afraid, and hungry clergymen, and white-haired upright men, and the creased and ironed dandies of the town—all anxious to invest their hoard, or speculate, or raise the capital they need to spend. And with these crowds comes genius, unkempt and tired-eyed, hawking appliances for saving time or cost, and learning the cunning disbelief of would-be purchasers.

Thus to its crowded confines all people come. So that day by day it throbs and palpitates and heaves with the directing force of scheming minds, the hidden press of warring interests, the struggles, plots, and panics of the crowd, and the driven energy of the myriads who obey. At night it is a skeleton of empty streets and cavernous, unlighted rooms.

Out of the millions who daily come, for life or periods of fevered stress, or visits of fierce anxiety, a few are satisfied, and many fail, and many struggle on. But always unceasingly the people come into the prison-greyness of the Big Grey City's mart. The loadstone that draws them is the hope of easy gold.

Letters from Abroad.

THE STIFLING OF FREEDOM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The people of these islands almost alone can still be moved to practical indignation by the wrongs of others who suffer from oppression, or for the cause of liberty. It is true that, like the rest, they tire at the repetition of a long-continued woe, and in the case of Russia they have been hoping against hope that the Anglo-Russian Agreement, the maintenance of some kind of a Duma, and the expectations of further Western loans to stave off bankruptcy, would induce the Government to allay the violence of repression, and advance on steady and well-considered lines of progress. But, unfortunately, the woe is still continued, and there is no longer any ground for the hope. If ever there was cause for indignation at the methods of the Russian Government in stifling the spirit of freedom, there is cause for it now—now more than at any time in the last eighty years of Russia's gloomy history. For never since the "Decembrists" first raised the demand for political rights, has the Government's action been so savage as in recent months.

Probably all your readers are aware that, for thirty years, no jury has been allowed in political trials, and that capital punishment has been abolished in Russia except for political offences. Most death sentences are now passed by courts martial—not Stolypin's drumhead or summary courts martial, which completed their term of outrage last spring, but more regular and deliberate bodies, whose death-sentences, formerly countersigned by the Tsar himself, are now countersigned by any Governor-General, because the recent accumulation of that business would have overworked the Tsar.

Exile or imprisonment may also be imposed by a court martial for "active propaganda." In some few cases the trial still goes before the High Court of judges without jury. But far the most frequent method is by "Administrative Order." Formerly the orders for exile had to pass through the hands of the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Justice, but now they may be issued by any of the local Governors General. These sign the forms laid before them by the secret police. Usually there is no examination, and there is never any appeal.

Such being the machinery of justice, the results are what we see. I need not recall the number of civilians killed in the streets during the disorders and pogroms of the two years following the "Bloody Sunday" of January, 1905; a moderate estimate is 19,200. Nor need I recall the executions under military tribunals during the same time; a moderate estimate is 1,650. These things may already seem distant and vague. But take up almost any daily paper, like the "Russ," for instance. At the top of the front page you will see in big type a summary of the principal events of the day, and the summary always begins in this style—

> "Executions: four at Kazan, two at Irkutsk, one at Penza, one at Kieff; death sentences: four at Proskuroff, three at Tver."

This heading is from the "Russ" of April 18th (new style). I take four back numbers at random from the file for March, and I find on March 15th, twenty-four men and women were condemned to death; on March 16th, ten were condemned to death; on March 17th, seven were executed (including one schoolboy), and seventeen condemned to death; on March 4th, seventeen were executed. These figures are obtained by the "Russ" and other papers from the official "Government Messenger." During the last six months of last year the official figures for executions by courts martial were 736. From this New Year up to April 19th, the executions by courts martial numbered 314. The average of executions is at the present moment a little over three every day, and that in a country where only political offenders are executed.

As to exile, the official numbers of persons deported by Administrative Order to Siberia and Northern Russia, from October, 1905, to the end of last February, are 78,000. To these must be added about 2,000 who were allowed some kind of a trial. Besides these 80,000 political exiles themselves, we have to reckon the wives and families who, in the case of peasants, generally follow the father and starve in a strange and bitter country upon his Government allowance of twopence a day. No wonder that thousands of exiles disappear, are starved, die of cold, commit suicide, or are lost in the forests and frozen swamps. Many of them demand to be imprisoned as their only way of escaping death.

As to the prisons in Russia itself, they are so overcrowded with "politicals" that, though hospitals and mad-asylums are used as gaols, the accommodation is still not enough by 50 per cent. When asking credit for new prison buildings last March, the Minister of Justice told the Duma so. He also informed them that 13,000 political prisoners still lay awaiting trial. Whether Mr. Nicholas Tchaykovsky, so well known in England and America as a political writer, can be counted among those awaiting trial, is uncertain. He has been imprisoned in a fortress for nearly five months now, and no trial or examination has been held, nor is bail granted to save the life of an oldish man, for whom appeal has been made by the most distinguished authors and scientific men of Western civilisation. But as he is there under Administrative Order, it is as likely as not he will never be tried at all. Last year 2,405 "politicals" were sentenced to hard labor; but of the number imprisoned without sentence and left to rot indefinitely, it is almost impossible to give an estimate.

Of the prison treatment we have a picture in the appeal smuggled out from the Schlüsselburg about 40 miles from St. Petersburg, a week or two ago. It came from 73 "politicals," including six women, and described how they are kept in chains on bread and water, and severely knouted for trivial breaches of discipline. "Hunger strikes" are common throughout the prisons, and in the middle of April the Minister of Justice ordered chains to be supplied for gangs of prisoners passing from one gaol to another.

As I write, a typical example of Russian methods comes from the port of Revel. A newspaper paragraph states that 25 prisoners, who had been arrested in November, 1905, were brought up for trial the other day on the usual political charges. Five were sentenced to death, six were sentenced to hard labour, and fourteen were acquitted. It is a fine thing to be acquitted, no doubt, but how about the two-and-a-half years of life those innocent men have lost in gaol?

Even the greatest caution cannot save the editors of Liberal papers. In 1906 the Governor-Generals and censors suppressed 563 newspapers and periodicals, and prosecuted 732 editors. I have not got the figures for last year, but in the first two months of the present year 28 papers were suppressed and 38 editors prosecuted. And all this comes only a little over two years after the Manifesto that pledged the Tsar's "immutable will" to freedom of speech and inviolability of person.

Figures may appear dry and barren things. They are so, unless you can realise the reality that lies behind them. To one who, like myself, has seen something of that reality—who has seen young men and women driven along the streets by soldiers to be shot or hanged, and watched the faces at the barred windows of Siberian trains, and dwelt amid the torturing uncertainty of families from whose circle some member has vanished into the silence of prison—these figures are not dry and barren. They are hardly to be endured.

And what is the motive force in these frenzied efforts to stamp down the inevitable movement of a great people towards the acquisition of rights and liberties? Of course, there are sincere Russians who dread for their country the peril and disturbance that every forward step may bring. But at the head of the tyranny, surrounded by his priests, spiritualists, and astrologers, stands the Tsar, who wears the badge of the Black Hundred on his breast, and in the last two months has pardoned 180 of the pogrom assassins. No torturer of prisoners, or swindler of the starving, or butcher of Jews, petitions in vain for pardon to the man who keeps the most intelligent and honorable of his subjects by thousands without trial in his prisons. For the suppression of liberty he pleads a father's feelings. It shall never be said of him, he cries, that he hands down the powers that God has given him diminished to his son. In support of the Little Father's determination, there are gathered round the throne his company of relatives terrified for their existence, landowners terrified for their land, officials terrified for their steady incomes and more interesting perquisites, officers who are nobles ex officio, manufacturers who dread trade unions or strikes, and shopkeepers who hate to put their shutters up. Their motives are respectable: they are the common instincts of mankind. The question is, whether by executions and imprisonment these natural desires are to be secured.

The thing that the Government should notice in Russia now is that the movement for freedom is no longer confined to the educated classes. Of the 1,500 "politicals" condemned to death and other penalties last January and February, 1,246 were of the peasant or workman class. Since the agrarian proposals of the first Duma, about two years ago, it is calculated 46 per cent. of the "politicals" have been peasants. We must remember that sixteen of the Volga and East Central provinces, with a population of 25,000,000, lie starving in famine, and that the Government has closed all relief committees but their own, for fear of propaganda. We must also remember that eighty-one trade union branches, not being officially recognised, have been forcibly closed, and forty-one trade union newspapers suppressed. All these things count. The most significant thing in Russian history during the last four years is the appearance of the common people in the political movement, and the powers that support the autocracy should not suppose that by reducing the educated classes to desolation they can any longer establish peace.—

Yours, &c., IXE.

April 27th, 1908.

Art.

THE NEW GALLERY.

THE New Gallery is celebrating its majority with a summer exhibition that differs in only one feature from its twenty predecessors. The new feature, however, is praiseworthy. The balcony, instead of being filled with pictures and drawings, is mainly occupied by a collection of arts and crafts, in which the mother-o'-pearl and gesso work of Mr. Frederick Marriott and the designs for stained-glass windows by Baron Arild Rosenkrantz are the conspicuous exhibits. We welcome the innovation, both for itself and for what it gets rid of. For the balcony in recent years has been a repository, not merely for pictures, but for the worst pictures. If there was any pictorial effort which the hanging committee were, from motives of modesty, unable to find space for in the rooms below, other motives dictated the placing of that effort in the balcony. It was a resting-place for the less fortunate of the obscure exhibitors, a refuge against total exclusion; many and dreadful were the sights to be seen there, behind the friendly shelter of columns and in the dimness of a badly-lighted wall. The removal, therefore, of this reproach, and the substitution of a feature in which it is possible for the intelligence to be interested, are a stroke of policy that entitles the directors to congratulations. Below, in the Central Hall, there is hung an important work, belonging to the same description of artistic output, the inclusion of which is equally welcome, though, from one point of view, not equally politic. It is an Arras tapestry by Morris & Company, from the last cartoon designed by Sir Edward Burne-Jones, the subject being "The Passing of Venus." As a modern specimen by a famous firm, it has great merits of workmanship, and, thanks to its commanding position, facing the entrance, one is able to appreciate the design and colour at their proper value. When one enters the Gallery, one receives an impression of something fresh and at the same time reminiscent; it recalls the names of an artist and a craftsman, peculiarly associated with each other, and with a well-defined stage in the development of nineteenth century art. But it is also, incidentally, a big, bright reminder of the New Gallery's beginnings, of the artists who supported it, of the character of its earlier exhibitions, of their note of individuality, and of their definite reason for existence, and the question arises whether, in view of what the later exhibitions have become, it was wise to provoke a memory pregnant with comparisons.

The exhibitions that were supported by Burne-Jones and his fellow pre-Raphaelites had a definite character which one could not but acknowledge if one did not approve. One might laugh at the Gallery as the home of the æsthetic cult, but one was interested while one laughed. Besides, æstheticism was only carried sufficiently far to give distinction, and there was much great and sincere work that was independent alike of æstheticism and the Royal Academy's recipes. But to-day the cult is dead; only a shadow of pre-Raphaelitism hovers in a few tempera paintings relegated to the South Room. The note of distinction, false or true, right or wrong, has been replaced by one of burly commonplace. The New Gallery, in fact, is like any other exhibition that draws its artistic sustenance from members of the Royal Academy and those whose main object in life and art is to become so. It is just a collection of modern pictures, a few very good, several execrably bad, the vast majority on that border-line of meaningless mediocrity, where the modern British painter is so fond of halting for ever. It only differs from Burlington House in that, owing to its method of selection, it has less excuse for its sins, for its lack of coherence as a whole, for its want of a central governing idea. We are speaking with reference to the last few exhibitions, but the same remarks apply to the present one, and are likely to apply to its successors for as long as the ridiculous craze for large picture shows, without a semblance of combined artistic aims, without a chance of commercial gain to the artists concerned, render an institution of this kind possible in our midst.

To the twenty-first New Gallery exhibition, then, in spite of the welcome development in the handicraft section, there is attached the tragedy of a lost purpose. Yet it contains individual works that we are glad to have seen—Mr. H. Hughes-Stanton's large landscape, Mr. Hornel's "Tom-Tom Players," distinguished portraits by Sir George Reid, a cathedral subject by Mr. Sidney Lee, noteworthy sculptures by Miss E. M. Moore, a moderately good Brangwyn, and a tragi-comedy in blue by Mr. Sargent, interesting in the completeness of its failure. Mr. Hughes-Stanton's landscape is unquestionably the finest in the Gallery. For his subject he has gone once again to the Pas de Calais, and has painted "A Pasturage among the Dunes," with the morning light drenching meadow grass and sand-hill, and the distant sea agleam with the morning sun. Backing the pasturage, a line of poplars shuts out part of a middle distance, where the low, waving hills take on hues of brilliant violet and green, mingled with the drab, before their lines are lost in the shimmering band of light that comes to meet an unseen shore. In the foreground a small flock of sheep gives incident; there is also a small female figure seated on the grass. We would willingly have dispensed with that figure. It has no connection with the sheep, none with the landscape beyond the fact that it is in tone. A small rock or a rake, painted with the same regard for values, would have answered the purpose equally well, without provoking the discordant human thought that this figure gives—discordant because it induces distracting speculation as to why it is there. The landscape, with all its directness of intention, is almost idyllic, and idyllic landscape sometimes demands a figure, but not a figure of this kind, a plain-clothes figure, huddled up as if in apology for having been introduced as an afterthought. She, this inconclusive young female, is so far removed from the passion of Mr. Hughes-Stanton's morning light and the fragrance of his still cool summer air as to suggest that she has been sitting there all night. Blot her out, and there is nothing between us and the artist's appreciation of the nature spirit, as it expresses itself in this spacious, earnest canvas.

Mr. Hornel's "Tom-Tom Players, Ceylon," is the second of the two pictures which claimed our principal attention. It is, of course, in the artist's usual impasto manner, which marks him as a descendant of the workers in mosaic; his aim, like theirs, is a great significant whole built up out of innumerable meaningless fragments. But he seems here to have achieved a quality more pleasant than usual without the sacrifice of vigour, and the picture has a humanity not always observable in his all-of-one-quality pattern pieces. His five Cingalese maidens, seated round their instrument in a forest glade of silvery fairness, have a comeliness in their dark faces and darker hands, a gracefulness of gesture that makes them at ease in their beautiful sub-tropical surroundings. Notes of red and magenta accentuate the green and silver harmony; the pool with its lily pads gleams behind the bamboos, and the air is full of spices; for a picture so decorative in intention, this has a curious poetic realism. Perhaps because it is a little less purely decorative, because it has greater depth and actuality than usual, because the figures have life and their movements have the rhythm of barbaric music—perhaps it is on this account, rather than for the novelty of the subject, that the work is appreciable as marking a break in an art which, however compelling, has sometimes been open to a charge of monotony. There is not a great deal else among the pictures that impresses itself firmly on the memory. The dainty "Mdlle. X—— Belle Criselidis" of Mr. Graham Robertson is, however, among the best of that artist's child portraits, and Mr. W. G. Von Glehn's full-length portrait in the North Room has a Continental audacity that at least catches the eye.

Communications.

THE DEFECT OF THE HOUSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. John Burns's Housing Bill forces us back again upon the People of England question. Housing Acts and Public Health Acts are added to by each successive Government, yet we still have a fifth of the population living in homes that represent a condition of things only to be summed up in the word slumdom. We remember the well-night despairing cry of Sir Robert Giffen: "No one can contemplate the present condition of the masses of the people without desiring something like a revolution for the better." No fewer than eight millions of persons in the United Kingdom, Sir Robert tells us, exist under conditions represented by a family income of less than a pound a week, constituting not merely a disgrace, but a positive danger to our civilisation. Dealing with this statement, Mr. Sidney Webb maintains that these eight millions are "housed, washed, and watered worse than our horses."

This, too, in face of over half a century of the Housing Act. Has the Act failed? We have had some dozen amending Acts at different times, each put forward to mend an imagined flaw or to meet a new need; yet slumdom still reigns while the poor perisheth, and for want of homes the cry is not yet stilled of the "children withered by the street." Why this persistent neglect when the first Housing Act contains a remedy? The principles of our earliest housing legislation, prepared and piloted through Parliament by Lord Shaftesbury, now lie embodied in Part III. of the main Act. All the amending Acts have never got nearer to the root evil than the Shaftesbury Act of 1851. There it was laid down as essential that to stamp out slumdom the local authorities be given power to build new working-class tenements or cottages, and to improve and renovate existing dwellings. Giving evidence before the Housing Commission thirty-three years later, Lord Shaftesbury sorrowfully admitted that the local authorities had not given his Act a trial. "If you were to look at the terms of my Act," he further told the Commission, "you would see that it would meet everything that is required at the present moment."

Could Lord Shaftesbury appear before the Parliamentary Committee that will consider Mr. Burns's Bill, he would, with added sorrow, be compelled to say the same. Mr. Burns himself is alive to the neglect of Part III. (the Shaftesbury Act), since his new measure proposes to widen its application, and to empower the Local Government Board to call to account those municipal bodies which fail to carry out its provisions. We shall hope, then, to see fewer "clearance" schemes under Parts I. and II. of the Act, and more building schemes under Part III. The former enrich the slumlord and the landlord by reason of the heavy compensation that has to be paid for property legally described as unfit for human habitation, while the real sufferers, the tenants, are turned adrift to create slum quarters elsewhere. Nothing creates slums quicker than the demolition of slums under Parts I. and II. Nothing destroys slums quicker than the provision of wholesome dwellings under Part III. That is only another way of saying that crowds of people forced by necessity into indecent tenements to-day would quit them to-morrow were better dwellings provided.

In this beneficent work of giving poor people better homes we are not confined to building only. Part III. provides not merely for creating new houses, but for adapting old ones. It is a pity that the far-reaching adaptation clauses in the principal Act have been ignored in Mr. Burns's Bill. They ought to have been emphasised. They ought to have been brought to the front, since so many of our local authorities are not even aware of their existence. One London authority that has carried out the adaptation clauses on a large scale has been able to transform a slum quarter that was the despair of Mr. Charles Booth into a healthy, law-abiding district, without displacing a tenant or raising the rents. The Camberwell Borough Council now owns over 500 tenements, all having been adapted under Part III.

Only by adapting the houses in which they live already can you meet the needs of the very poorest. It is no use hiding the fact that many of the habitual slum-dwellers would misuse new houses. The domestic arrangements and the sanitary regulations are alike distasteful to them. To some people slum-dwelling, unfortunately, becomes a disease, and dirt a bad habit. But we are not excused in our inaction because some of the slummers make their own slums.

"It takes a high-souled man
To move the masses even to a cleaner stye."

Even the dissolute must have homes; and they, as well as the more worthy among the poorest, are best provided for in adapted houses.

Encircling the slum areas in all big cities there is generally a zone of houses originally built for the middle classes, now living far out in the suburbs. These dwellings, as a rule, are of sound construction—the old builders did their work better than the modern ones—and they could easily be converted into healthy cheap tenements. We know what happens to these houses now. They are let off by the floor just as they are, unaltered and unadapted. Built as they were, each for one family, with kitchen, scullery, water supply, sanitary conveniences and dustbin all on the ground floor, they cannot, in their unaltered state, afford healthy homes with a family on every floor.

Some of the worst slums of to-day consist of former middle-class houses, sound and strong in external wall and roof, but rotten and filthy within, by reason of each floor having for years been put to the every-day uses of a large family. How can you expect a jaded woman on the top floor to come down three or four flights of stairs for every drop of water wanted, or each time the dust and ashes ought to be put away? The accumulated dirt gets kept in the room, and water is fetched as little as possible.

If the local authorities would adapt these dwellings to their new uses, as empowered by Part III., slumdom would be less of an evil in our midst. Take these floors and convert them into flats, each self-contained, with domestic and sanitary arrangements complete. How trifling the cost compared with the price we pay under other clauses of the Housing Act for clearance schemes that benefit mainly the slumlords. Camberwell has adapted its 500 odd tenements without costing the ratepayers a penny piece.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE HAW.

April 30th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

"C.-B." AND CHURCH PATRONAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I concur in your opinion that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's ecclesiastical appointments were the least successful part of his administration. Using the freedom of an old friend and a staunch supporter, I addressed several remonstrances and suggestions to the quarter in which ecclesiastical affairs were decided, but without much success. Last autumn I wrote direct to the Prime Minister, warning him of what would be the certain consequences if he repeated at Chichester the experiment of Newcastle. The reply which I received was so eminently characteristic of the writer's temper, that I think it may interest your readers.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

"My dear George,—This is a clear case of coals of fire. You keep blazing away into me and my poor secretaries.

"I want you to authorise me to submit your name for a Privy Councillorship. Will you? and make glad "Yours,

"H. C.-B.

"Belmont, 29th October, 1907."

THE NEW POLICY OF THE FOOTBALL ASSOCIATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On April 24th, 1908, the Council of the Football Association did something, the full effects of which will in a year or two come home to football crowds with a force that may be startling. By a large majority they rescinded the existing rule which established £4 as the maximum wage to be paid to players under the Association, and £350 as the maximum transfer fee. Pressure has long been exercised upon them to this end by the Players' Union and the great football-loving towns; and one may really almost say that their principles have at length given way to constraint.

The step is one of immense significance in this branch of sport. It opens up possibilities of emolument to the clever player which may conceivably raise him as a wage-earner to the level of a Prime Minister, or a music-hall star. No wonder the members of the Union, famous and rising players, have fought hard for their chances. They possess the average instincts of human nature, and one may sympathise entirely with the state of mind which for years has made the cleverest of them discontented with their incomes. Week after week some of them have performed before crowds representing from eight hundred to a thousand pounds or more into their club's exchequer, and of this sum forty-four pounds or less have been distributed among the actual performers themselves, the man with half-a-dozen international caps receiving no more pay than his colleagues with none. The life may be a pleasant one, but it has its obvious risks and temptations. Abstract laurels, the eulogies of the Press and local adoration are exhilarating things in their way, but players have felt quite unable to see the justness of the rule which pinched their pockets in the vigorous and only prime of their days, and gave their committees more money than they knew what to do with.

So much for the players' point of view. The towns which have supported their action are not in so creditable a position. They stand to the inferior towns with paid football teams like the bosses of a trust towards small concerns whose success in business, comparative or otherwise, excites their envy. These lesser clubs have hitherto been protected by the wages limit. Most of them have one or two fine players as the backbone of their teams, and they have felt tolerably secure in the possession of these men so long as they could manage to pay them the highest legal wage. Without them their existence would be in danger. They would sink in league tables, and gradually and inevitably drop into the pit of decay which awaits the unsuccessful in football, as in other careers. They have struggled on to the best of their ability, now elating and now depressing their partisans, but always sustained by hope and the wages' limit. This prop is now taken from them. The gain is all for the large towns, and anyone with an imagination and an interest in the matter may anticipate the sordid intrigues, and the equally sordid triumphs, in men and money which will begin for them with the playing season of 1909-10. The human nature of their football committees is as average as that of the players themselves. And thus expressly licensed to offer unlimited wages to good men, they may be relied upon to write cheques which will be the despair of the smaller clubs in seducing from them their best players. Gate money is the only practical ambition of a professional football club, and gate money ebbs and flows with the success or failure of its team, which in its turn depends, of course, upon the skill of its men.

One may dislike professional football or approve of it, with more or less enthusiasm, as the people's chief open air pastime; but there can be no doubt that so far it has been kept admirably free from abuses. The wages' limit has left powers of growth to a certain very precious esprit de ville in football. To play for their town and help it to win the Cup is the laudable yearning of thousands of honest-hearted lads in scores of our manufacturing towns. They are allured, of course, by the good pay as football professionals, but local glory stands also for very much to them. One would have liked to see this spirit maintained and stimulated. The Crystal Palace on April 25th showed what it could do for eleven Englishmen under the present rules. The Wolverhampton players in the Cup Final realised as perhaps never before on such an occasion that they represented their own town and county against a team of picked purchases of the North, collected almost regardless of the size of their transfer fees. The grim and quite noble determination which gave them their victory was due in a great measure to the inspiring sense that, if they won, their town would rejoice with them. Mostly local men, they fought for their town's credit as well as their own, and beat a team of internationals with tactics and skill that reminded one of Creçy, Agincourt, and many another real battlefield, where English doggedness, rooted in patriotism, prevailed against numbers and superior fitments of war.

It seems a pity that this valuable ethical asset for the nation should be condemned to sacrifice on the altar of mere lucre. Go it must, however, unless the Football Association changes the human nature of professional players as well as its rules. Imagine the sequel to the Cup Final of 1908 if this had been played under the conditions destined to prevail a year hence. The moneybags of the football committees of the manufacturing towns with populations of half a million or so, and London itself, would, an hour after the match, have been opened against the victorious town of Wolverhampton and its mere one hundred thousand souls. Most of the men who had shown such surprising pluck in fighting for their own town would in a week be tempted to sign themselves elsewhere. With wives and chidren dependent upon them, one could not blame them for hailing the prospect of double or treble wages; but it would be the death blow to their playing honor none the less, and their town's loss in the moment of its triumph.

The future of professional football on these lines promises to be contemptible and brief.—Yours, &c.,

April 29th, 1908. FOOTBALLER.

WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many of us who are in favour of the proposal to confer the suffrage upon women are filled with regret at the recklessly destructive tactics which the extremists among the Suffragist party are now employing. They profess to desire the franchise in order that their votes may accelerate the advent of social reform; yet they daily endeavour to defeat Parliamentary candidates who are pledged to support social reform, and do their utmost to secure the return of its bitterest opponents. Many of them profess to believe that temperance reform is of the utmost importance to all members of the community—men, women, and children alike; but in a contested election they do what they can to return a supporter of "the trade" (although he is an opponent of woman's suffrage) and defeat a candidate who is pledged to temperance reform (although he is in favour of woman's suffrage). Do these ladies hold that social reform is to stand still until their singular methods have converted the constituencies to their views, and that the yoke of intemperance is rightly to be fixed on the neck of a perverse generation which is not yet convinced of the expediency of conferring the franchise upon them? It is the incapacity of these political anarchists to take a wider and less selfish view of their duties to the community which they conceive they are educating that has filled many of the supporters of the suffrage movement with undiluted indignation and disgust.—Yours, &c.,

CONVINCED SUFFRAGIST.

Lincoln's Inn, W.C.,
April 16th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—What fills me with surprise in the letters to THE NATION, written by women Liberals who think the enfranchisement of their sex a matter of secondary importance, is the absolute want of appreciation, not only of the value of a vote to a sex, but also of the value of womanhood as a sex.

With regard to the value of a vote, they seem unable to realise that it is the keystone and hall-mark of freedom—the beginning and foundation of the power to protect one's independence of thought and action. I have no wish to exaggerate, but every Suffragist must know how often the argument is used, "Oh, a vote will bring discord into the family," which means, if it means anything, either that the woman must not have opinions of her own or that she must not express them responsibly. And the natural result is that we of the Suffrage Societies have members who subscribe surreptitiously, so that their husbands may know nothing about it, or sympathisers whose husbands will "not allow" them to join our ranks. Surely the vote will teach men and women, as nothing else perhaps will, that women have a right to their own opinion, and so to their own actions.

The "want of appreciation of the value of womanhood" is seen very clearly (amongst many other things) by the inequality of the "moral law" (in its restricted sense) between men and women. We still have State regulation of vice in our dependencies, which means the last degradation of women by men-made laws for their own (men's) protection. We still have clauses in our Criminal Law Amendment Act, put in by men, apparently, to get men off the just punishment (according to law) of his own infamous acts, at the expense of women. We still talk of "fallen women" without realising (some of us) that every fallen woman means also a fallen man.

If women—which will not be—lose the battle now for the freedom and dignity of womanhood, who can tell how far a wave of reaction might go? The emancipation of women, and the placing in their hands of a weapon to prevent any possible reversion towards sex dominance in the future, the giving to the Councils of the State the voice (through the ballot-box) of the womanhood and motherhood of the country, seems to me a revolution of far deeper meaning for good than any individual Liberal measure. The Liberal measures will follow (as they have done in New Zealand) with increased impetus and efficiency when women are represented. As George Meredith—the greatest understander of women—says: "There is a democratic virus secret in every woman." Motherhood, potential or actual, is the great leveller, because by sympathy only comes understanding.

I appeal to all who love fair play, to the lawyers who are keeping women LL.B.'s out of their profession, to the universities who are keeping their degrees from women who have earned them. Is it fair play to ask us to let you regulate our interests? Can the dominant partner be depended upon to see what is best and look after the interests of the other? The answer to this is the history of England, and the voice of the best men of the country, who are all on our side. They are only pausing, with the British love of caution, to ask us if we can't put it off again a "little longer." We must answer very firmly, "No."—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL WOMAN.

April 21st, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think your correspondent, Mr. Lloyd Thomas, does not grasp the main reason for the resentment Liberals feel at the action of the Suffragettes at Peckham and the present bye-elections. Every fair-minded individual admits their right to carry on their campaign in favour of the suffrage with all possible vigour. But at the present time there is an issue before the country of far greater importance, and one which affects women equally with men.

If the Government's Licensing Bill is defeated, it will be a long time before another attempt is made to curtail the power of that most powerful vested interest, the liquor trade, and to eradicate the curse of intemperance from our land. The struggle over this question gives the Suffragettes the best opportunity they could have of proving the reasonableness of their demand for the Parliamentary franchise. If they would throw themselves whole-heartedly into the struggle against the liquor trade, as Lady Dorothy Howard is doing, they would by such action have provided an overwhelming argument for granting them the vote. We are seeing how the attitude of the Bishops in regard to the Licensing Bill has made brighter the possibility of a settlement of the education question, and surely the same would happen in the suffrage question. Such a course, at any rate, would more favourably impress the Government than this short-sighted policy of opposing it in its struggle for the public welfare.—Yours, &c.,

J. S. F.

Hendon, N.W., April 21st, 1908.

ARMAMENTS AND UTILITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent in your issue of the 11th inst. argues that the instrumentality of man, in so vigorously assisting towards the perpetuation of the useful in animal and vegetable life, and towards the destruction of all vicious species, entirely vitiates the proposition that utility rather than fighting power is the paramount law of nature in the "survival of the fittest."

Surely, however, man is a part of nature—the highest product indeed of natural evolution, and his conduct is just as subject to natural laws as the habits of all other created things. Is he not, indeed, nature's greatest instrument and interpreter? Quite apart, moreover, from any intervention of man, biologists tell us that such law of utility exists. "It is through helpfulness in fertilisation of plants that a larger part of the insects support themselves, while plants in return make sure of fertilisation by being helpful to insects." Indeed, the biological prophets would go further and assert that all insects which are harmful to plants and animals are but temporary types, the passing of which will occur in a comparatively short time so that ultimately every form of life to be comparatively safe must learn to perpetuate itself through helpfulness. Such a proposition does not necessarily involve the assertion that force has never or can never be usefully employed. It asserts merely that utility is the predominant factor, and that unless force is subservient to this paramount consideration, it becomes an element of self destruction rather than of self defence.

Surely it is illogical to argue, without some explanation, that man, having vigorously nurtured the useful in all animal and vegetable life, is naturally imbued with an impulse to attack a useful national life should he find such perchance undefended. Probably this belief has its origin in a misconception about trade, and in the superstition that the trading efficiency of one nation is a menace to its neighbour. Our assets are presumably our trade with our possessions, but since this trade is open to the free competition of the world equally with ourselves, it can be nothing else than the skill, the industry and the enterprise of our people, that our neighbours are presumed so jealously to covet. But how superficial must be any such sentiment, if it exists. How could we ourselves be eager to strike a blow at the efficiency of any unaggressive national existence? Imagine that we could, simply by a wish, substitute for our American and European trade rivals a race commercially as inefficient as the Thibetans, would we do so? Is not the measure of our neighbours' competition precisely the measure that they are to us good customers and helpful purveyors of our wants? Does not their competition itself often bring us the greatest benefits and knowledge in its train? Why then is it incumbent to imagine that our neigbours would seek to strike an entirely unprovoked blow at the efficiency that renders us their best and richest customers, at the very moment when our purchasing power was about to be very materially increased?

At this moment how eagerly does commercial England await signs of the resumption of trade activity in the United States!

Trade cannot at once be a source of antagonism and an influence making for peace.

"Free Trade," said Mr. Lloyd-George, on the 20th inst., at Manchester, "is slowly but surely clearing a path through the dense and dark thicket of armaments to the sunny land of brotherhood among nations," while Sir Robert Giffen, in the "Nineteenth Century," for August last, suggested, "Cobden may have been right after all in his notion that increased commercial intercourse between nations ought to make war impossible."

On what evidence, again, does your correspondent base his confident, but unsupported, assertion that "a nation contemplating suicide has but to render itself defenceless"? China, though practically unarmed, has a more peaceful, as well as an infinitely more lengthy record of existence than any armed European State, and if she has lately come near to committing national suicide, is not this precisely because her effete and archaic Government has stood in the way of her utility to the rest of the world? Had her inutility been armed, might not her suicide have been complete?

Does your correspondent suggest by his remarks that if our police expenditure was going up, as is that of our armaments, by leaps and bounds, he would regard it otherwise than evidence that our civilisation was socially defective and calling vehemently for reforms to render it more useful—rather than for more policing. I suggest that precisely the same argument applies, though much more forcibly, to our foreign relations.

With representative government, open ports, and a declaration of willingness to submit all international questions to arbitration, our foreign relations, being based thus on the highest plane of freedom and justice, would more nearly approach the ideal than would in fact our social conditions.

Is it really extravagant to believe that our own immensely increased prosperity, resulting from disarmament, would immediately have the most beneficial effect on the prosperity of our neighbours, and that so bold and useful a policy, far from instigating aggression, might not win early and hearty imitation?

Your correspondent thinks the proposal impractical, but is he equally sure that the present state of society is practical for long. "Unless," wrote Lord Avebury in the "Review of Internationalism," June, 1906, "something is done, the condition of the poor in Europe will grow worse and worse. It is no use shutting our eyes, revolution may not come soon, not probably in our time, but come it will, and as sure as fate there will be an explosion such as the world has never seen."

The inutility of slavery killed the old Greek and Roman civilisations, the inutility of armaments is threatening our own.

Lastly, has your correspondent sufficiently realised to what an extent our most cherished convictions are the outcome of the mental atmosphere in which we have been bred, rather than of any unbiassed investigation of past experience and observation. We of to-day have been brought up to believe that "Armament," rather than "Utility," implies "Power," but how little relation in the past has there been between the strength of inherited convictions and their truth!—Yours, &c.,

A. R.

April 23rd, 1908.

A SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Referring to your interesting notes, p. 107, in your issue of the 25th inst., the truly "National Memorial to Shakespeare" would, in my humble opinion, be a "Shakespeare National Fund," to be devoted to the encouragement of young people who intend taking up the stage as a profession.

Consequently, instead of the proposed "Shakespeare

Theatre" or "Shakespeare Monument," I would suggest a "Shakespeare Dramatic School for Scholarships." It is not necessary, at the moment, to go into the details of such a scheme. That would have to be worked out if (and when) the money had been secured for such purposes.—Yours, &c.,

OBSERVER.

Mayfield, Jesmond, Newcastle-upon-Tyne,
April 27th, 1908.

"THE BREAKING POINT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been much disappointed at not seeing a criticism of Mr. Edward Garnett's play, "The Breaking Point," in THE NATION. Your attitude towards the important question of the censorship of the drama has been so plainly stated that I had hoped you would take the occasion of the production of Mr. Garnett's play by the Stage Society as a text for further comment upon this appalling anomaly.

I had the pleasure of seeing "The Breaking Point," and, as a writer, as a woman, and a student of life, I welcome this play as a splendid effort to redeem our stage from the reproach that modern English playwrights do not concern themselves with the real, the great, and vital problems of life. We have had plenty of sermon dramas and propaganda plays during the past few years; for there are fashions in plays as well as in clothes, and the Puritanism of the past century is finding a new expression. A great gulf is fixed between Mr. Garnett's work and these plays; it is into this gulf his critics have fallen. With fine rectitude he has attempted—and, I hold, achieved—a dramatic presentment of a woman under the terrible stress of her love for her lover and her father. For the first time I find a writer understanding the breaking of a woman through the love of men.

And this play has been condemned! I have been told that it is deficient in life and lacking in human interest. It is a mournful experience to find people groping about with little spyglasses of criticism, scrutinising here and there a speck on Mr. Garnett's work, while they have failed utterly to see the value and the splendid humanity of the whole. If "The Breaking Point" has not been a success, then I can only accept it as the unfortunate truth that there is no place at present in the English theatres for a forceful transcript from life which utters facts without appraisement.—Yours, &c.,

C. GASQUOINE HARTLEY.

The Cottage, Hampton-on-Thames,
April 14th, 1908.

THE FUTURE OF POOR LAW ADMINISTRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Your correspondent, "G. C. C.," begins his letter by stating that "there can be no doubt as to the advisability of making the Poor Law part of the borough administration just as education is in subordination to the Council as the central and co-ordinating authority." I am sorry to oppose so very dogmatic a statement, but I must say that, in common, I believe, with many others who have thought on this subject, I hold that the existing evils of the Poor Law system would be likely to be intensified by such a change, and that the precedent of the educational change is not an encouraging one. I have heard complaints from teachers in old Board Schools that they do not receive the same attention or interest from the members of the L.C.C. which they used to receive from the members of the old School Board. And how could it be otherwise? The members, even of the Educational Committee of the L.C.C., were not elected solely for their interest in education, nor can they confine their interests to that topic, though it might well absorb several men's energies. Yet the L.C.C. has come into such a splendid inheritance from the School Board, and it has, I gladly admit, chosen the head of its educational department so wisely, that it may be long before the signs of decadence are apparent to any but close observers.

But if the management of Poor Law relief is handed over to these overburdened bodies just at a time when the present administration of that work has been specially discredited in the eyes of the public, one can surely expect only a far more complete neglect, which would facilitate and intensify the present chances of corruption and maladministration; and this fear applies, in some ways, even more strongly to Borough Councils than to County Councils. But I know that the present scandals will cause a demand for a speedy and, too probably, an even hasty, reform. Therefore, I would suggest another possible solution of the difficulty which may, at least, be considered before the one suggested by your correspondent is finally accepted.

The evil of the present Poor Law administration has, I believe, arisen from the limited choice of candidates. In many of those poorer districts the people whom the electors have before them are either those who have no time to spare for the duties proposed or those who see their way to take advantage of their position for their own purposes. If the choice of electors was extended to the whole of London, and a Board was elected, not for Poplar or West Ham, but for London as a whole, I believe that there are plenty of people in the wealthier and more leisurely districts who would gladly devote the same care and interest to the poor of West Ham and Poplar that is now given by voluntary philanthropic societies recruited from other than East End districts. We should thus retain the advantages of the ad hoc elections without their present disadvantages. Of course, there would have to be provided machinery for making known to the electors their new opportunities. But all such details are already provided for in the now well-known schemes of what is now called "proportional representation," but which I heartily wish might have retained their more helpful name of "personal representation."—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead, April 20th, 1908.

Poetry.

NATURE'S MOODS.

I LIKE the showers that make the grass so fresh,
And birds' notes fresher too; and like the Mist,
Who makes thin shadows of those heavy Hills
That carried in the light a hundred fields,
A score of woods, and many a house of stone.
Or see the jealous Sun appear, and make
That Mist, Morn's phantom lover, go;
And drive him to the farthest hill in sight,
On which he'll make his last and dying stand;
A lover, he? Ah no: a vampire, who Comes out of Night's black grave and sucks Morn's blood.
I like to see the Sun appear at last,
To meet the Clouds—Clouds armed with arrow rain—
And see him lift his rainbow banner high.
Or see, upon a misty night, how stars
Half ope their eyes and close, as if in doubt
To keep awake or not; how sometimes they
Do seem so far and faint I almost think
My eyes play false, and they are Fancy's stars.
I welcome Nature in her every mood;
To see a hundred crows toss wild about,
Blowing in Heaven's face like balls of soot,
As they make their delirious cries, sure signs
Of coming storm—not half a one, I hope.

WILLIAM H. DAVIES.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE late Mr. Edmund Clarence Stedman believed that Lafcadio Hearn will, in time, be as much of a romantic personality and tradition as Poe now is. This seems highly probable, for Hearn was largely endowed with "fame's great anti-septic—Style," and had also the good fortune to write of Japanese civilisation at the moment when it was about to be transformed by Western influences. The freshness and charm of his letters, too, were remarkable, written, as they were, at the end of the nineteenth century, when letter-writing had almost become a lost art. It seems that many of these letters still remain unpublished, and we are promised a further instalment in a book by Dr. G. M. Gould, "Concerning Lafcadio Hearn," which Mr. Fisher Unwin has in preparation. Dr. Gould, whose former work, "Biographic Clinics," laid down the theory that eye-strain is a determining factor in the literary temperament, was an intimate friend of Hearn. His book is, however, far from a mere eulogy. He denies that Hearn can, with any justice, be called a great man. "To have character is to control circumstance; Hearn was always its slave. Except in one particular, the pursuit of literary excellence, Hearn had no character whatever. His was the most unresisting, most echolike mind I have ever known. He was a perfect chameleon; he took, for a time, the colour of his surroundings. He was always the mirror of the friend of the instant, or, if no friend was there, of the dream of the instant. . . . His merit, almost his sole merit, and his unique skill lay in the strange faculty of colouring the echo with the hues and tints of heavenly rainbows and unearthly sunsets, all gleaming with a ghostly light that never was on sea or shore; so that, fused as he was with his work, he himself became that impossible thing, a chromatic voice, a multi-coloured echo."

* * *

IN "George Selwyn and His Times," a book which is announced by Messrs. Methuen, Mr. S. Parnell Kerr has chosen a subject full of promise. He has, besides, obtained access to a series of unpublished Selwyn letters which are said to contain many intimate touches. Selwyn played a certain part in the social life of the Regency, his passion for gambling being remarkable even in that age of reckless gamblers. The four volumes of letters written to him are delightful reading, and the essay which they drew forth from Abraham Hayward is one of his liveliest and most entertaining. Selwyn's morbid interest in executions and death gave rise to much banter among his friends. "If Mr. Selwyn calls," said the first Lord Holland on his death-bed, "show him up: if I am alive, I shall be glad to see him; and if I am dead, he will be glad to see me."

* * *

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS have in preparation an English translation by Mr. R. Hobart Cust of the interesting series of letters written by Alessandra Mancinghi Strozzi from Florence, to her children in exile, during the latter half of the fifteenth century. These letters, which were first published by Cesare Guasti about thirty years ago, throw a valuable light upon the social and political history of Florence at the time of the Renaissance. Alessandra Strozzi, their writer, was a woman of great force of character. She was a warm supporter of the Medicis, and when the rest of the Strozzi family were driven into exile, she bravely remained at Florence watching over their interests, and it was largely through her efforts that the family won its immense fortune, and was able to build the magnificent Strozzi Palace.

* * *

ANOTHER translation which should be useful to students of fifteenth century history is that of "The Diary of John Burchard of Strasburg," by Mr. A. H. Mathew, which is to be issued by Mr. Francis Griffiths. Burchard was Master of Ceremonies to no fewer than five Popes—Sixtus IV., Innocent VIII., Alexander VI., Pius III., and Julius II.—and frequent references to his diary are to be found in the pages of Ranke, Gregorovius, Creighton, Acton, and other historians who have dealt with the period. Burchard probably started the work with the intention of keeping a record of precedents and official duties for the benefit of his successors, but later on he treats of extraneous affairs and the course of contemporary politics. The book will contain an introduction giving a biography of Burchard, and the narrative of the diary is supplemented by an appendix consisting of dispatches from agents and diplomatists at the Papal Court.

* * *

IT is nearly forty years since Matthew Arnold's essay on Eugénie de Guérin made her name familiar to English readers. His verdict that she had that in her which preserves a reputation seems to be borne out by the facts, for her "Journal" has almost taken its place as a classic. A new translation of it, made by Mr. William Lightbody, is to make its appearance in Messrs. Routledge's "New Universal Library" about the middle of next month. Other books to be added to the same excellent series are Mark Pattison's "Essays" and John Stuart Mill's "Auguste Comte and Positivism."

* * *

"STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS: A STUDY IN AMERICAN POLITICS," by Professor Allen Johnson, of Bowdoin College, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Macmillan, is the biography of the man who was at one time the serious rival of Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln's name is now a household word, and Douglas is almost forgotten, but when the two men met in joint debate some fifty years ago, it was Senator Douglas and not Mr. Lincoln who attracted the larger share of attention. After the capitulation of Fort Sumter in 1861, Douglas stood by the Union, and was sent on a mission by Lincoln to the North-Western States. Professor Jackson describes his book as "not a vindication, but an interpretation of a personality whose life spans the controversial epoch before the Civil War." Other books to be issued at an early date by Messrs. Macmillan are the fourth volume of Mr. Fuller Maitland's edition of "Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians," "The Poems of T. E. Brown" in the Golden Treasury Series, and "The Philosophy of Loyalty" by Professor Josiah Royce.

* * *

THE high level of scholarship maintained in Dr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible" and "Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels" gives special interest to the announcement by Messrs. T. and T. Clark that they will publish in September next the first volume of another work on similar lines. This is to be an "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics," which aims at giving an account of religious ethics in all ages and in all countries of the world. There are to be articles not only on every religion, but on every separate religious practice and belief, as well as on every separate ethical idea and every separate moral practice. Among the contributors are Professors Farnell, Warde Fowler, Gwatkin, Petrie, Hartmann, Ridgeway, Macdonnell, Goldziher, Schrader, and Nöldeke. The section on Ethics will be introduced by a general article written by Professor Muirhead.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The History of Twenty-five Years, 1856-1880." By Sir Spencer Walpole. Vols. III. and IV., 1870 to 1880. (Longmans. 21s. net.)

"National and Social Problems." By Frederic Harrison. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Religious Teachers of Greece." Gifford Lectures on National Religion delivered at Aberdeen. By James Adam, Litt.D. (T. & T. Clark. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Sacred and Profane Love and Other Poems." By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

"The Beaux of the Regency." By Lewis Melville. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"A History of Art." Vol. I. Ancient Art. By Dr. G. Carrotti. Revised by Mrs. S. Arthur Strong, Litt.D., LL.D. (Duckworth. 5s. net.)

"The English People Overseas: A History." Vol. I. By A. Wyatt Tilby. (Griffiths. 15s. net.)

"Marotz." By John Ayscough. (Constable. 5s.)

"L'Année Sociale et Economique en France et à l'Etranger." Par Paul Fesch. (Paris: Rivière. 7 fr. 50.)

"La Correspondance de Marat." Recueillie et annotée par Ch. Vellay. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

"Les Villes d'Art Célèbres: Munich." Par Jean Chantavoine. (Paris: Laurens. 5 fr.)

Reviews.

THE JOURNALIST.*

It seems difficult to write a good book on a great journalist: and if this type of workmanship in literature is rare, Mr. Dasent has made no definite contribution to it. Where Carlyle could not quite succeed, Mr. Dasent may well be excused for failure. The status of a journalist—especially in this country—is very indefinite. Few can seize its exact significance and appraise its real value, and though Mr. Dasent has had unrivalled opportunities in the way of free access to his uncle's intimate life and correspondence, he does not happen to have the experience or the faculty either to tell us precisely what Delane was in himself, or to describe the part he played in the society and the political organism of which he was part. Mr. Dasent can know little of politics. He misreports simple facts of contemporary history like the Benedetti Treaty; he is at once a hero-worshipper and a somewhat guileless partisan; and he is merely grotesque when he says that "Cobden's one and only idea of foreign policy was the promotion of trade, and that of the calico printers in particular." But by the mere force of citation, by dint of being, like the Seraphin, unwearied in praise, he does in the end distinguish and glorify his subject. Delane lives in these pages for at least something that he represented, and if the undiscerning are misled, it has been their fate to be so handled since time began.

The intelligent reader, however, will require some winnowing of the mass of correspondence and tittle-tattle which is here presented to us, some clear, pictorial presentment of the great editor of the "Times" in the atmosphere which he breathed. Why was Delane so powerful? He had no literary power. He lacked distinction of mind. He failed in clearness, certainly in farsightedness, of judgment. His thousand and one letters are nearly all readable; but not six are quotable. He was a Philistine, and would not have succeeded if he had been anything else. As late as 1867, within three years of the final triumph of Italian liberty, he thought Garibaldi "a mad dog," and wished him death before the Roman gates. He conceived that the hanging of the "Manchester murderers," one of the historic mistakes of English Government, was an essential act of administrative justice. He foresaw none of the larger political ideas and combinations of his time, neither German Imperialism nor English democracy. How was it, then, that from 1845 to 1865, to take the period when his powers were most freely exercised, he was not only the undisputed head of a profession which had not then arrived at its full maturity of material power, but was one of the twenty most influential men in England?

The answer would seem to be that Delane had the qualities which fitted him to shine in, and in a sense to control, his environment. He came very young to the editorship of the "Times"—he was 23 when the second member of the Walter dynasty offered him the command. He was self-confident to audacity, laborious, superficial, had brisk Irish blood in his veins, and was quick to master the technicalities of his business. He had good and serious manners. He belonged by birth to the small gentry, and shared their tastes and pursuits—could shoot and ride, and knew a field of oats when he saw it. He succeeded to a literary estate which an able man had half-made, and an astute and adaptive intelligence could fully cultivate. Mr. Dasent has not the art to show us the secret of the method of his earlier enterprises; but he does abundantly illustrate, out of Delane's mouth and pen, the astonishing completeness of his latter conquests. At least three Prime Ministers of the mid-Victorian period—Aberdeen, Palmerston, Disraeli—and two Foreign Ministers—Clarendon and Granville—were his constant correspondents, and disclosed to him freely such intimate matters as the personnel of new Ministries on their formation, their special minds and inclination on policy, their plans for a session, their design to keep power or to relinquish it. Lord Clarendon was equally confidential about Irish policy and foreign relationships. Disraeli sued him, with an unpleasant touch of servility, for friendly reviews of his books. Lord Torrington, proudly enrolling himself as his "Windsor Special," kept him minutely and very candidly advised concerning the Queen's moods, her shyness, her thrift, her persistent cult of family interests, her inveterate pro-Prussian tendencies. He had many such sources of information, notably in his later intimacy with the Duchess of Sutherland. Palmerston consistently cultivated him both as a friend and as a favoured journalist. The tone of all the confidential letters is quite familiar. Delane was a true associate of all these men, and it is clear that in the essential business of balancing such intimacies with his absorption in the interests of the "Times," and his journalist's passion for exclusive and authoritative news, he walked with an almost unfailing step.

The secret of this power is the interesting problem of the book which Mr. Dasent presents without consciously trying to solve it. It lay in the first place in the simplicity of his task. He had nothing to do with democracy—the management of which is the task of modern statesmanship. Delane produced a paper for the governing classes, for diplomatists, statesmen, members of Parliament, great ladies with curious souls, and the well-to-do world in Europe, of which the "Times" was the chief, the necessary, exchange. He had not reached the stage of servile dependence on which a later English newspaper founded its fortunes. "Snobbism" had not arrived. Delane was a manly person, and he could afford to conduct a manly paper. Moreover, the precise stage of political development reached in the England of the 'fifties suited him. There was little conflict of principles. The warfare was that of personalities. The political pack was shuffled and re-shuffled with the object of cutting in or cutting out half a dozen "Court cards"—Palmerston, Russell, Derby, Aberdeen, Disraeli, and, in a lesser degree, the earlier Gladstone, with whom, indeed, Delane's relations were neither easy nor cordial. Delane took the right estimate, from his own point of view, of such a situation. He was a strong man, and he knew that the maintenance of his power as a journalist, and the depository and dispenser of State secrets, depended not only on his discretion and personal loyalty, but on the knowledge that the "Times" was not the slave of any special member of this band of semi-sanctified condottieri, but was open, in turns, to the advances of all. Thus he kept the "Times" always in power. Each day's issue, treated, as Delane confessed, as a kind of self-contained unit, a creature "without a past," lived for itself.

Delane's specific, indeed, was independence, his sense of pride in his profession, and of a certain mastery due largely to the singularity of the position of his paper. He was bound to no party and no chief. This freedom involved him in no moral difficulties. He rightly exercised judgment and censure on opportunists like Russell and Disraeli, highly honorable and enlightened, but somewhat inefficient, administrators like Aberdeen, adepts in adventurous "bluff" like Palmerston, and incompetent servants of the State like Sir Charles Napier. Thus to him ran vanity, jealousy, ambition in their hour of need, hoping to find a friend or fearing to meet a foe, and, though he was no genius, he knew how to treat such applicants. He was Jingo, friend of liberty, moderator, in turns, thinking, with deep and steady calculation, of his newspaper as the arbiter of many irrational destinies. When he chanced on types owning some affinity with idealist politics—such as Bright and Cobden—he misunderstood and, therefore, vilified them. But he was perfectly at home with the Lowes, Osbornes, Woods, Clarendons, Malmesburys, of his time. And he was a most exact and unwearying journalist. None of the minutiæ of his business were too boring or too mean for him. Inveterate diner-out as he was, all his social pleasures centred in his work at the proof-littered desk at Printing House Square. His letters record his labors—his presence at the office till the small hours of the morning, his vexation at misprints, his cares about type, and the precise tone and phrasing of articles, his diligent choice of subjects and writers, his temperate and singularly loyal handling of his staff. In presenting all these sidelights on his character, Mr. Dasent has done, perhaps, even better than he intended to do, for he has shown where lies the essential power of journalism.

* "John Thadeus Delane: His Life and Correspondence." By Arthur Irwin Dasent. John Murray. 2 vols. 32s. net.

A HISTORY OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT.*

One of the principal ideas suggested by the study of social institutions seems to be that there is a close connection between the present aspect of such institutions and their past. Whatever parcelling up the division of labour between single workers may lead to, the study of modern facts and historical investigation have to be equally taken into account in order to get at a rational explanation of any subject.

This general truth may be conveniently illustrated by the personal work of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb. They began their literary career as social reformers, anxious to collect and to analyse the facts necessary to solve the entangled problems of contemporary economics. Gradually these studies widened into remarkable investigations of a sociological kind. "Industrial Democracy" and the sketch of the "Co-operative Movement" are as interesting for persons concerned with observing the structure and functions of economic society as they are to those who seek light on practical questions of labour organisation and on the relations between labour and capital. And, again, it is not merely as abstract sociologists that Mr. and Mrs. Webb have had to do their work: to provide a basis for sociological generalisations they had to turn more and more to historical material and to use the methods of historians. Such was the case, already, in the "History of Trade Unionism," and it is even more so in the joint work produced on "Local Government." In this last instance it was clear that the conditions of local government in England could not be interpreted by a mere general survey of existing facts. Municipal arrangements in all their varieties are specimens of life, and it is impossible to cut off their latest developments from their previous growth. Even on its title page the work purports to be concerned with the time from the Revolution of 1689 to the Municipal Corporations Act. But, as a matter of fact, investigation had often to be carried into earlier times. To put it shortly, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb have thoroughly realised that in order to explain the growth of a tree you have to look to its roots.

If one could apply ideal standards to human work, one might say that even more remote periods than those treated in the new book ought to come in for a larger share. The writers themselves have often to confess that their treatment of their subject would have gained if they could draw freely on data from a time when such institutions as the Manor were in full working order. A captious critic may point out that in some cases the study of local organisations is curtailed by incomplete information as to medieval life. The treatment of homage, e.g., the association of tenants forming the Manorial Court, might have been free from some discrepancies as to the part played by freeholders and copyholders (cf. p. 15 with 37 and 67), if the writers had started on the history of homage from earlier times instead of working backwards from late evidence. The curious complications arising from the peculiar position of Ancient Demense would have called forth greater attention. The hierarchy of courts touched upon on pages 25 and 32 would have probably been more clearly traced to the building up of so-called honors. The Customary Court, in distinction to the Court Baron, would have merited a somewhat closer examination, &c. But it would be unfair to ask for perfection when so much has been actually achieved. And the fact that in this case the starting point has been taken from modern life throws perhaps into greater relief the result that students working, as it were, from both ends of a historical development, find their roads actually meeting in its centre. To my mind, the wealth of data registered by the writers of the book before us fits most excellently into the results of investigations into the early stages of local organisation

Two features are strongly impressed on the readers of Mr. and Mrs. Webb's book—the variety of forms assumed by local government in the period under investigation, and the intermixture of rights and duties belonging to seemingly different kinds of institutions in the same Courts. To begin with, we witness a most exuberant growth of local bodies varying in details. We get what Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb call an ascending series—from manorial arrangements, in which local life is regulated by courts of a score of householders under the supervision of a steward, through privileged communities endowed with charters of different kinds, up to municipal commonwealths, like those of Bristol, Norwich and London. This organic growth, by which one is reminded of colonies of plants, suggests that, in point of development, we have to trace back the complicated arrangements of modern municipalities to earlier rudimentary stages, ultimately, to two or three original roots—an undifferentiated Court of the Manor, comprising elements of economic management, of petty jurisdiction, and of police, the convivial and business meeting of so-called gild-brethren, and the association of members of a chartered corporation. To mention one instance illustrating the influence of historical antecedents and their modern effects, I should like to refer to the passage in which Mr. and Mrs. Webb remind the reader that the municipal life of Manchester and Salford is still affected by the separate history of these two communities in manorial times. Even now, the person who finds that he has to change from one system of tramcars to the other in the great centre of textile industry, would have to be referred for an explanation to the separate history of the Court Leet of Manchester and the Hundred Court of Salford.

And, apart from such odd survivals, the authors have realised, in their painstaking investigation of seventeenth and eighteenth century evidence, that manorial arrangements were still, in a comparatively recent time, a most important and widely prevalent factor in local life. Especially striking are the many instances when rural, and even urban, communities had to frame far-reaching regulations of common pastures and open fields. The Court Rolls of Great Tew, Oxon., e.g., have been adduced by the writers as illustrating the complicated champion farming of 1692, 1756-59-61.* The general result is expressed in the following words, "We do not think that the extent and complication of this agricultural business of the Lord's Court has been at all adequately realised. Professor Maitland, for instance, to whom we, in common with all students of English institutions, owe the deepest gratitude, suggests, that 'so far as the arable land is concerned, the common field husbandry, when once it has been started, requires little regulation. . .' However true may be this suggestion about the common agriculture of the English manor of the thirteenth century—and on this we offer no opinion—it was, we think, certainly not true of many an English manor between 1689 and 1835. By that time, at any rate, even the simplest three-course system included some variety and choice among 'crops.'" I entirely agree with Mr. and Mrs. Webb's conclusion, but I may be allowed to record the fact that my investigations of the thirteenth century and earlier materials have led me to enter the same kind of protest against a theory relying on what is termed the "automatism" of the agricultural community. (See e.g. "Growth of the Manor," p. 186 ff. 296 ff.)

In regard to urban life, we are given most interesting information as to the varieties of town organisation preceding the Municipal Act of 1835. The life of close corporations like Leeds, Coventry, Bristol, and of municipal democracies, as illustrated by tiny Morpeth in Northumberland, or by London itself, presents a great wealth of interesting phenomena. The conclusions reached by our authors are not in agreement with some generally received notions; they show, for instance, that, although the Royal Commission of 1834-5, produced an admirable collection of evidence, the report of the Commissioners was vitiated by abstract theory. Every evil in the management of municipal affairs was explained by the baneful influence of close self-elected bodies, and yet, according to our writers, some of the most glaring deficiencies were to be noticed in the management of democracies of ratepayers. In some cases, like that of Liverpool, for instance, close bodies had even proved themselves to be efficient public trustees. This leads to an "alternative" examination of the defects of early nineteenth century municipalities. Two features are pointed out as extremely inconvenient—the casual way in which

* "English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act." Vols. II. and III. "The Manor and the Borough." By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. Longmans. 25s. net.

* I have treated the same subject, with special reference to medieval antecedents, in the "Quarterly Journal of Economics," 1907, IV.

areas of administration were distributed and the rules as to membership of corporations. The management of prisons, of police, of docks, and the like, gains by being entrusted to centralised authorities, with a wide range of interests and views, while the government of shopkeepers and small workmen cannot be efficient in such cases. All the various local communities are classed under the heading of "Associations of Producers," and contrasted with "Associations of Consumers" entitled to share in provident sanitation and well-regulated order, as well as in pure air and water. To my mind, this seems hardly an appropriate sociological scheme for the matter in hand. The medieval Gild may be treated as an association of producers, but not the Manor. The latter grew up in a period when production and consumption were not clearly defined. The very essence of natural husbandry, which provided the basis for the Manor, lies in the combination of production and consumption in a local community more or less independent of wider economic intercourse. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries again, it is the complication of property with political rights which, more than the special interests of profit-seeking producers, gave the rural and urban communities their peculiar cast. The prejudiced treatment of questions bearing on administration and public interests from the point of view of pure property, explains sufficiently the attitude of the opponents of municipal reform in the thirties, such as Lord Eldon and Lord Lyndhurst, and the main defects of the system defended by them.

However this may be, the new book is certainly entitled to high praise and full recognition as a most important contribution to the study of local government in England.

PAUL VINOGRADOFF.

LONDON'S PLAYGROUND.*

A DIARIST of the seventeenth century, visiting Hyde Park, observes:—

> "Here the people of fashion take the diversion of the Ring. In a pretty high place, which lies very open, they have surrounded a circumference of two or three hundred paces with a kind of balaustrade . . . and the coaches drive round this. When they have turned for some time round one way, they face about and turn t'other: so rowls the world!"

And so, as the modern spectator may remark as he surveys the Ladies' Mile on a fine afternoon in the height of the season, it "rowls" to-day. As delectable to the sociable as it is puzzling to the misanthropic, Hyde Park represents the same spirit of serious trifling and enforced idleness as in the days when it first became a pleasure-ground for the High World some three centuries ago. What memories, one fancies, must not the soil contain, and how eagerly would we conjure from it the long procession of gay phantoms who once flirted, prinked, and promenaded over its green and gravelled widths—all the hooped and patched ladies of the eighteenth century languishing on the arms of their beaux, the great bucks and macaronis, gorgeous with frill and ribbon, powder, snuff-box, and clouded cane, betting in the Ring, ogling the orange girls, or drinking syllabub in Cheesecake House with the elegant females of "ton." And how gladly would we divest ourselves of our soberly clad modern personalities to join with the cross-gartered Elizabethans in a morice-dance on May morning; or go deer-hunting with King James; or stroll along the Ring with Pepys, cocking an admiring eye at my lady Castlemaine looking her finest "in yellow satin with a pinner on," and her hair dressed "à la négligence." We would tramp, too, over the green grass in the thick boots of Cromwell's Ironsides; flock with the gaping crowd from the grisly spectacle of Tyburn to catch, between the escort that their beauty demanded, one glimpse of "those goddesses, the Gunnings"; or pick out, from among the fashionable equestrians, the homely figure of the Earl of Chatham ambling along on his small Welsh pony.

For these are among the ghosts raised by a perusal of Mrs. Alec Tweedie's "History and Romance of Hyde Park." From its pages we learn how, from a wild primeval forest, the Park became the neat and dapper public garden that we know to-day. In Domesday Book the Manor of "Eia" is held by Geoffrey de Mandeville, and then becomes Church property, till Henry VIII. did a deal with the monks and converted the area into royal hunting-ground. Wild and beautiful, its charms were for royal eyes alone; the cotters who had settled there, draining the marshes and cultivating the soil, were summarily ejected, and a great wooden paling fenced in the whole for the confinement of deer and the exclusion of man. A gayer epoch followed with Elizabeth, whose love of pageantry and display opened up the Park to more social use; the coaches, to which her reign gave birth, bumped and bundled along the road towards Westminster, and the numerous executions at Tyburn made the spot which is now covered by the Marble Arch a never-failing centre of attraction. James, whose ideas of amusement were severely masculine, banished suggestion of pageantry from the Park, and turned it again into the closest of royal preserves. Not till the reign of Charles I. did it appear in its true character of playground of fashion. Under the Commonwealth, Hyde Park, humbled, like royalty, to the dust, was divided into lots and purchased by three merchants. One of them—"sordid fellow," as Evelyn calls him—a certain Anthony Deane, conceived the thrifty notion of charging the public an entrance fee of a shilling a coach and 6d. a horse for the privilege of using the grounds that had lately been theirs by right. This "assemblage of wretched jades and hackney coaches, as, next a regiment of carmen, there is nothing which approaches the resemblance," which presented itself to Evelyn's disparaging eye, in what he contemptuously calls "a field near the town which they call Hyde Park," was, however, soon to suffer transformation. With the advent of Charles II., the purchase of the royal lands was annulled and the property seized by the Crown. Out went Messrs. Anthony Deane & Co. and their police-like "porters with long staves"; in rushed the chariots and racehorses, the gallants and ladies and the whole mad tide of frivolity bursting from its long suppression under Puritan rule. It is at this period and in later Georgian days that Hyde Park is seen at its brightest and most gay. Under William and Mary, fashion going Kensington-wards, the Park became deserted and disreputable. It was dangerous to be near it after dark, and in 1772 a bell was rung at stated intervals in Kensington to gather people together who had ventured from London and were wishing to return. Queen Anne did her best, and, issuing an order "for the better keeping of Hyde Park," instituted gatekeepers, abolished the sale of intoxicating liquors, and forbade the entry of stage and hackney coaches, one-horse chaises, carts, waggons, and funerals. But whilst the aristocracy had been disporting themselves at Kensington, Hyde Park, much to their disgust on their return, had been invaded by the bourgeoisie. Once inside, they have elected to remain, and the "mixed" condition of the population of Hyde Park has been ever since the familiar complaint of the snob.

Mrs. Tweedie devotes considerable space to the painful and gruesome chronicles of Tyburn, and tells an entertaining account of the evolution of the carriage. The interest of her work, however, is marred by a want of control over the subject-matter and a style often commonplace and occasionally confused. At the conclusion of a chapter on duelling Mrs. Tweedie remarks (evidently in consolation) that although > "duelling in Hyde Park is no more, suicide of rare occurrence, there are often riding accidents to-day"; whilst the following sentence, if taken literally,

> 'Only a century or so back the park was not safe at night, but now, although still badly lighted, thanks to the police force, anyone who passes through may feel secure."

casts a new and heavy responsibility upon an already burdened body of public servants.

The book is illustrated, and contains an excellent map.

* "Hyde Park: Its History and Romance." By Mrs. Alec Tweedie. Eveleigh Nash 15s. net.

NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

"MAROTZ" is a rare, a singular achievement. No English Protestant could have written this novel, though a man of mixed strains possibly has done so. The work is inspired by the deep and musing insight into human nature that distinguishes the finest type of priestly intelligence, an insight that is the spiritual product of the subtlest self-discipline, and racially, of contact with a civilisation far older than our own. The story shows a native insight into noble Sicilian and Roman ecclesiastical life that we should look for only from an Italian very sympathetic with his own people. And yet it is written, without style, in idiomatic English! In its spiritual gentleness and perfect freedom from any superiority of tone towards weak human nature the book is obviously the work of a Catholic, of a man who has carefully studied the Latin world, and who has had exceptional facilities for observation.

* Marotz." By John Ayscough. Constable. 6s.

After a prelude of three pages in which the heroine, "Marotz," a girl of noble Sicilian race, is shown us, at a Court ball, receiving the homage of two young men, rivals, Don Fabio Maiori and Rodrigo Duca di Reviglìano, we hark back, with Chapter II. to a quietly humorous description of the family life of the noble house of San Vito, twenty years previously. Marotz's grandparents, her eccentric great aunt Zia, and her own father and mother, Prince "Hals" Nostitz and Lucia, all are observed and sketched with a quiet detachment of vision that is masterly. What is particularly delightful in this clever description of the secluded, old-fashioned life of an Italian noble family is the tone of perfect human equality between the people of rank and the humble folk. If old Maso, the village cobbler, and Don Ercole, the village priest, whose passion for making money is only surpassed by the Contessa Belgiòjosa's passion for hoarding it, had been presented to us by any English novelist, all the uneasy shades of class feeling would have crept into the picture. But they scarcely exist in the South. There men are men and women are women first, and condescension and servility, if manifested, are not in the people's nerves and blood: moreover, the inner dignity of these Southerners gives them a frankness of feeling which is not the less subtle because it springs from an acceptance of the facts of human nature. The passion for "getting on," in fact, has not vitiated their self-respect or their inner sincerity.

Marotz, feeling that she has a vocation for the religious life, accepts neither of her suitors, but, on an impulse, enters the Convent of the Reparation as a postulant. The section of eighty pages which describes the "contemplative" spiritual life of the twelve sisters will be quite a revelation to the Protestant intelligence: we know nothing like it in modern literature. Quite simple and quite unassuming, it breathes a fine tranquility of faith which is all the more convincing because it faces all that range of unwelcome truth which is involved in human defeat and failure. If there is any truth in the contention that Catholicism has produced the finest type of religious aspiration in men and women, it is probably because its understanding of human weaknesses is more charitable than we find in the Protestant attitude. There are many strikingly human passages in the book, many pregnant sayings: the page we quote may be surpassed by others, but it is a fair example of the author's quality:—

> "For more than a week this overwhelming sense of God continued, and she spoke as little as she could to anyone, even to Poor Sister. There was only one thing she could speak of, and to speak of that was like telling the Secret of the King.
>
> "The nuns left her, not alone, but to herself.
>
> "Then, almost suddenly, it ended, and there came a change that at first seemed merely ghastly.
>
> "She could not pray. And when she tried, her words came aloud, and from the surface of her lips; it seemed as if her heart had grown dumb, and God Himself was deaf. She cried out to Him, but there was no voice nor any that answered. . . . . What was God? What had happened to Him?
>
> "Heaven was as brass; and, lifting piteous hands to it, there came back only the echoing clang of her own striking at its gates. It seemed as if there was no one inside. The saints stood stiff in a mummied sleep, the angels had dried up like mists of the hopeful morning in a pitiless noon.
>
> "She was afraid to go to the chapel lest some nun praying there should see her face, and be horrified at the blank misery that must be written on it. Still she felt she must go there.
>
> "It was empty; and the sun was beating down into it from the high windows; kneeling down in a hidden corner, she tried to rest her aching spirit in the simple, easy prayer of petition.
>
> "But it was not easy; it was not even possible. If she prayed for sinners a hateful curiosity assailed her, and the thought of their sins, like an ugly picture, wove itself swiftly into her imaginations. She shook her head impatiently, as if she could shake out the thoughts that stung her like unclean flies.
>
> "Her prayer for the wicked seemed to contaminate herself.
>
> "'Marotz,' said Sister Mechtild, 'it is what comes to all in the spiritual life. With me it began seven years ago.'
>
> "'And how long did it last?' the girl asked.
>
> "'It is lasting still,' the nun answered simply.
>
> "Marotz looked at the sweet, calm face, the smile that was so gentle and so cheerful, and felt herself blushing. For seven years! And the fuss that she had made after bearing it a day or two."

Marotz finds that her "vocation" is not sufficiently strong, and she leaves the convent and returns home to San Vito. Here the cold and unscrupuously worldly Rodrigo finds her out, presses his suit, and finally marries her because he is socially ambitious, and recognises the importance of securing as his wife the future Duchessa di Reviglìano, so beautiful, distinguished, and wealthy an heiress. The character of Rodrigo is analysed, again, with the impartiality of a man who knows the world thoroughly, and yet has a standpoint quite apart from the world. The marriage is, of course, an unhappy one. Rodrigo has no love to give his wife, and soon he begins to neglect her in favour of his former mistresses. The author has contrived, with a subtle reserve, to suggest all that the proud and passionate Marotz misses in her marriage, while her loftiness of soul will not let her avow it. However, a peasant girl, Cica, the goat-herd's daughter, breaks in upon her, and reveals that the babe she is carrying she has borne to Rodrigo. Marotz then leaves her husband for good. There is a proud simplicity, a singleness of feeling, in Marotz's attitude to Rodrigo that are very impressive. The interview between the husband and wife, in the Temple of Paestum, where Rodrigo comes up with her in her flight, has an artistic and moral dignity that is spiritually a product less of the modern than of the antique world. The humanity is deep, the speech sparing, the gesture austerely simple—and in them we recognise influences remote from the nervous fussiness and pettiness of our modern "society." Marotz separates from her husband, and retires to the old, gloomy castle of Torre Marco, with which San Vito has dowered her, and there she brings up her child Piccolo, who grows into a strangely beautiful lad. There is much charm in the description of Marotz's peaceful life in her garden in the lap of the mountains, and the searching analysis of the good and evil strands in Piccolo's nature is done with the delicacy of one who has learnt to scrutinise the heart of those who dare not confide. What is of particular interest in the book is the figure of Marotz herself. She is not, we think, a close study of feminine nature; she is rather a woman idealised by a man, who, standing some way off, has symbolised in her his own ideals of feminine purity and feminine passion. The novel is so quietly built up, we may add, that it will not appeal to the taste of the vulgar, who will not apprehend that it half reveals, half conceals, a complete philosophy of life.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Lucy's book, "Memories of Eight Parliaments" (Heinemann, 8s. 6d. net), like so many books that have preceded it, is in the nature, if not quite in the form, of a diary by a looker-on exceptionally placed and exceptionally gifted for his work. Mr. Lucy has known many Parliaments, and has had much to say about them all. Probably his most interesting survey is of the House of Commons which came to birth in 1874, and that which succeeded it in 1880. Both Houses were astonishingly full of the eccentric type of public man who is known as "a character." A good few of these gentlemen, Major O'Gorman, the O'Gorman Mahon, and Sir Peter O'Brien, were Irishmen, and Mr. Lucy's pen has made them all live in Parliamentary history. For historical sidelights, such as personal habits, the salient bends and twists of temperament, and the criticism of Parliament as a house full of men of all sorts and conditions rather than as a constitutional proposition, Mr. Lucy has an unrivalled faculty of observation and comment. The turn of his work is always towards humour, and towards the arts of the story-teller and the diarist. This book which we have before us has no dull page, though occasionally we should dispute a judgment or the precise turn of a story. The general vein is agreeable. It contains scores of lightly drawn portraits of personalities, among which we may select a very characteristic sketch of

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

"Any one who with the requisite knowledge and in a judicial spirit gave a faithful description of the various classes of contemporary Socialists, their creed and purposes, would be doing a public service."—The Times.

MR. H. G. WELLS

Has done this service in

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD.

Price 6s.

MR. HUBERT BLAND says:—"He who reads it and then declares that still he cannot make out what Socialists are driving at is either affecting an ignorance of which he is free or else is obtuse beyond hope or effort."

19th Century Art.

MY SCHOOL AND MY GOSPEL.

By Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER. Fully Illustrated. 21s. net.

"It is written with perfect ease and self-confidence, his writing is as readable as his painting is attractive. It is a piece of psychological demonstration that is extraordinarily refreshing and alluring by reason of the simplicity of its candour."—Graphic.

"A Mountaineering Classic."

ICE-BOUND HEIGHTS OF THE MUSTAGH.

EXPLORATION AND CLIMBING IN THE HIMALAYAS.

By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN. Illustrated. 21s. net.

A volume of mountain-climbing full of adventures. In the course of this expedition peaks over 23,400 feet were conquered. The Illustrations are numerous and of unusual merit.

"The Soul of a People."

THE SOUL OF SPAIN.

By HAVELOCK ELLIS. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"The picture of a Spanish renaissance in the twentieth century. . . . It is a fascinating picture, and Mr. Ellis invests it with literary charm."—Yorkshire Post.

"The Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn."

LETTERS FROM THE RAVEN.

Edited with an Introduction by MILTON BRONNER. F'cap. 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

"There is much in this little book which tells us intimately of the shy, sensitive, finely imaginative temperament of Lafcadio Hearn."—Daily News.

ROMANTIC TALES FROM THE PANJAB,

WITH INDIAN NIGHT'S ENTERTAINMENT.

Collected and Edited from Original Sources. By Rev. CHARLES SWYNNERTON, F.S.A. New and Cheaper Edition. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

"Any one who peruses Mr. Swynnerton's book will gain a far better idea of the tendencies, aspirations, and mental atmosphere of the inhabitants of these far away regions than can be derived from tomes of philosophical disquisitions and anthropological or topographical reports. They are instinct with life and narrated with a dramatic force worthy of all praise."—Daily Telegraph.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE TREE OF HEAVEN

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

Author of "The Younger Set," "The Fighting Chance," &c.

MAROTZ. By JOHN AYSCOUGH.

Author of "Admonition."

THE ANCIENT LAW. By ELLEN GLASGOW.

Author of "The Deliverance."

THE DAUGHTER. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

Author of "Conflict."

London: A. CONSTABLE and Co. Ltd.

?

Have you read the great Yorkshire novel

THE CLIFF END

By EDWARD C. BOOTH. 6s.

"The publication of 'The Cliff End' marks the appearance of a new and powerful novelist, who should command our attention in no ordinary way. This book reveals a combination of gifts which the reviewer of contemporary fiction has but seldom the good fortune to discover. From the very first page Mr. Booth attracts us by his insistent humour. . . . He works with a sure, strong hand, there is no hurry, no trepidation, in leisurely deliberate manner he shows us his villagers pursuing their ordinary labour and gossip, yet so warm and true to life is the picture that they do not pall upon us. . . . A memorable book."—MR. SCOTT-JAMES in "The Daily News."

THE CLIFF END

By EDWARD C. BOOTH. 6s.

"A remarkable book . . . it must be deliberately read in order to be suitably appreciated . . . a distinct achievement, both as a literary product and as a study of real and diverse types of character." — "Glasgow Herald." "Clever, fresh, and original, masterly in its grasp of character and power of convincing delineation. . . . every reader who turns to it will be irresistibly carried along to the conclusion in spite of himself." — "Northern Whig." "One of the most delightful books of the last few years. . . . With a single book the author should establish a literary reputation that will place him in the front rank of present-day writers."—"The Court Journal." "Intensely interesting . . . the chapters are splendidly drawn pen-pictures of Yorkshire rural life."—"The Dundee Courier."

THE CLIFF END

By EDWARD C. BOOTH. 6s.

GRANT
RICHARDS
LONDON.

TWO RECENT NOVELS

A COMEDY OF MAMMON.

By INA GARVEY. 6s.

"A highly diverting social comedy," says "The Times," of the humorous story of London Society; and "The Standard" says "It is crammed with witty observations—there is not a dull paragraph anywhere. The satire throughout is delicious. There is a genuine gaiety and irresponsible optimism which are quite infectious."—"The Morning Post." 6s.

THE BUTCHER OF BRUTON ST.

By ARTHUR APPLIN.

With Coloured Frontispiece by FRANK HAVILAND. A powerful novel dealing with the London of to-day, and the present fashionable craze for surgical operations. The chief characters are a great surgeon, a physician, and a famous dancer, and whether or not they have been drawn from life, the book will certainly create no little discussion. 6s.

GRANT RICHARDS,
7, Carlton Street,
London,
S.W.

Mr. Wharton with the assurance to our readers that it is an exact presentment of the original.

> "In the '80 Parliament there sat for some Conservative borough an unattractive, muddle-headed man named Wharton. He forced himself first on the attention of the House with the assistance of a snuff-box and a pocket-handkerchief. When he rose to take part in debate he slowly, with portentous solemnity, produced the handkerchief. Under any circumstances it was an article calculated to aggravate mankind. Never since Joseph's wicked brethren stripped him of his cherished garment was beheld such combination of aggressive colour. It was an arrangement of blue and brown, of orange and red, of scarlet and green with glints here and there of purple and yellow ochre.
>
> "At sight of this nightmare of artistic design, slowly shaken preparatory to rendering assistance in the sending forth of a trumpet blast of nasal interjection, the House literally yelled as if in an agony of physical pain. Paying no heed to this outburst, Mr. Wharton, with increased deliberation, blew his nose, and with a flourish that flashed in dazed eyes the cruel colours of his astounding handkerchief, put it in his pocket again. Next he produced a snuff-box, not a receptacle for snuff in the ordinary sense of the term, an article that would lie in the waistcoat pocket, but a roomy chest such as might on occasion serve to carry the necessaries for a night's absence from home. Again the House yelled Mr. Wharton, bearing throughout the aspect of a man sauntering along a country lane, his mind at peace, the air disturbed by no sound harsher than the music of the lark, proceeded to take snuff."

* * *

"The Shakespeare Library," of which the first volumes have just been published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, is intended to bring within the reach of all Shakespeare students a number of works illustrating English literature and life towards the close of the sixteenth century. The series is under the general editorship of Professor Gollancz, and consists of four sections, "The Old-Spelling Shakespeare," "The Shakespeare Classics," "The Lamb Shakespeare for the Young," and "Shakespeare's England." The first section will, when completed, comprise an edition of Shakespeare's works, the text of which will be "as nearly as possible in the exact form in which it left Shakespeare's own hand." It is under the joint editorship of Dr. Furnivall, the doyen of Shakespearean and early English scholarship, and Mr. Boswell Stone—a sufficient guarantee for accuracy and learning—and the volumes already issued are comely and well printed. The preservation of the old spelling and punctuation makes the series of great value to students. In each case we are told the authority upon which the text is based, emendations being clearly indicated by a difference of type.

* * *

The first two volumes in the "Shakespeare's England" section are reissues of Dr. Furnivall's editions of "Robert Laneham's Letter" and "The Rogues and Vagabonds of Shakespeare's Youth" (5s. net. each). Robert Laneham was a London merchant, who went to Kenilworth to see the entertainment given by Leicester to the Queen in 1575. His letter describing the festivities is of interest to students for the information it gives about the collection of books owned by his friend, Captain Cox. Fifty-nine works are mentioned by name, and the list is annotated by Dr. Furnivall in an introduction as fresh and amusing as it is learned. Dr. Furnivall says that his reason for giving a sketch of all Captain Cox's books was that his readers "might contrast the literature of the reading unpious middle-class of Elizabeth's pre-Shakespearean time with that of the same kind of man now, and also think whence Spenser, Shakespeare, Bacon, Milton, sprang and what we owe them." He draws the moral that "surely no member of the Tory Party, even, can want the 'good old times' of literature before 1575 back again . . . far as we are from what we ought to be now." "The Rogues and Vagabonds of Shakespeare's Youth" contains Awdeley's "Fraternitye of Vacabondes" and Harman's "A Caveat or Warening for Commen Cursetors." Both books are full of curious information concerning the habits and slang of Elizabethan vagabonds, male and female. Harman's work, in particular, deserves to be read. It gives some delightful anecdotes of the "rowsey, ragged, rabblement of rake hells," though, with a few exceptions, the author does not seem to be alive to the humour of what he relates.

* * *

In a former issue we noticed Lodge's "Rosalynde," the first volume published in "The Shakespeare Classics" section. This is now followed up by Greene's "Pandosto" or "Dorastus and Fawnia," the original of Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale" and Arthur Brooke's poem "Romeus and Juliet," the original of "Romeo and Juliet" (2s. 6d. net each). A glance through both books goes far to convince one of the truth of Coleridge's dictum that Shakespeare's judgment was equal to his genius. Indeed, it would be difficult to furnish a more striking proof of Shakespeare's craftsmanship than a comparison between Brooke's long and cumbrous poem with the magical verses of "Romeo and Juliet." As is the case with the other books in the series, both these volumes have useful introductions, and are admirably produced. "The Shakespeare Library" is excellent in every way, and Messrs. Chatto & Windus deserve the thanks of every student of Shakespeare for having undertaken it.

* * *

The best of all series of a topographical nature is that known as The Highways and Byways—a series for which Mr. E. V. Lucas wrote "Sussex," Mr. A. T. Bradley "The Lake District," Mr. Arthur H. Norway "Yorkshire," and for which that energetic worker, Mr. Walter Jerrold, has just given us a volume upon "Kent" (Macmillan, 6s. net). Michael Drayton wrote of "Famous Kent," and here perhaps is beyond question the English county that is best known of all to the outside world. Cæsar and Augustine, Hengist and Horsa, Bede and Beckett, all furnish forth early associations with the county. One recalls the many famous pilgrimages to Canterbury, and in later times the long succession of interesting men and women who, by road or rail, have passed through that pleasant Kentish land to visit the Continent of Europe, or have come from other lands to see our own. It is thus particularly that the man who is not of Kent thinks of that county—as a beautiful pathway perpetually crowded with visitors to and from the coast. But the county itself is something more than a "pilgrims' way." It is good to live in, its watering-places have and deserve a wide popularity, and its inland scenery is possessed of a beauty which makes many of its lovers claim for it, as against Devonshire, the title of "The Garden of England." Mr. Jerrold opens with an attempt at the elucidation of the alternative phrases "A Man of Kent" and "A Kentish Man," but his explanation is not final. We may either believe that "A Man of Kent" is one born within the limits of the diocese of Canterbury, while "A Kentish Man" is one born within the limits of the diocese of Rochester; or we may accept the explanation that "The Men of Kent" are those born east and south of the Medway, while "Kentish Men" are those born to the left bank of that river. Each volume of this series is a reflection of the individuality of the writer. Some have been written by men with a taste for sport, devotees of the open-air life. Others are the work of men who love books and literary anecdote and folk-lore. All must needs be written by men with a taste for walking, for the "byways" of an English county cannot be travelled by rail or with the motor-car. Mr. Jerrold, as becomes his name, is of the literary fraternity. Old ballads, quaint stories of the past, legends and literary associations have a large share in his pleasant volume, to which the illustrations by Mr. Hugh Thomson form a feature well-nigh as important as the letterpress.

* * *

There is a certain type of political skit which requires the excitement of a Parliamentary election to make it palatable. At other and saner times it neither seems so tasteful, nor is it as easily digested. We are afraid that the tale told by Mr. Arthur Waghorne in "Through a Peer Glass: Winnie's adventures in Wastemonster" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net) is of this type. The title sufficiently indicates the model chosen for an extravaganza in which political, literary, and social personalities dance to the tune of the author's broad humour, and to the jingle of atrocious puns. There is nothing offensive in the fun of his caricatures. On the other hand they are not particularly funny, and the continuous smartness is a little oppressive. The book, however, is worth getting, for the sake of the black and white illustrations by Mr. David Wilson, which combine a sprightly sense of humorous character-drawing with a sound one of design.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

THE GREY KNIGHT: AN AUTUMN LOVE STORY.
By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.
WORLD.—"A touching and refined story."

CROSSRIGGS. By MARY AND JANE FINDLATER.
MORNING POST.—"A novel of rare charm and distinction."

DAN RIACH: SOCIALIST.
By the Author of "Miss Molly."
TRUTH.—"It is some time since we read so interesting a story."

MEMOIRS OF FIELD-MARSHAL SIR HENRY WYLIE NORMAN.
By Sir WILLIAM LEE-WARNER, K.C.S.I. With portraits, 14s. net.
TIMES.—"A model of unpretentious biography, and it has an exceptional value, because it sheds much new light on a famous page of history."

MEMORIES OF MEN & BOOKS.
By Rev. Professor ALFRED JOHN CHURCH, M.A., Author of "Stories from Homer," &c. With a portrait, 8s. 6d. net.
WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"A singularly pleasant record of a remarkable, busy and useful life."

THE PASSING OF MOROCCO.
By FREDERICK MOORE, Author of "The Balkan Trail." With a Map and 12 pages of Illustrations, 5s. net.
MORNING POST.—"An excellent and workmanlike collection of impressions."

ENGLISH SOCIALISM OF TO-DAY.
Its Teaching and its Aims Examined. By the Right Hon. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P. THIRD EDITION. 2s. 6d. net.
OUTLOOK.—"If any doubt exists as to the duty of all honest citizens to combat Socialism, it will be removed on reading this powerful exposure of its insidious aims and its dangers to all classes of the community."

THE SOCIAL FETICH.
By LADY GROVE. 5s. net.
Third Edition Ready Immediately.
DAILY CHRONICLE—"Lady Grove is always entertaining. She discourses with wit and wisdom, for she has a merry, if sub-acid humour, and she has cultivated the habit of thought."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place.

From ELLIOT STOCK'S LIST.

THE EARLY ENGLISH COLONIES.
With a Summary of the Bishop of London's Historical Address at Richmond, U.S.A., and the Documents in Fulham Palace on which the Lecture was founded.
EDITED BY THE REV. SADLER PHILLIPS.
PREFACE BY THE BISHOP OF LONDON.
Fully Illustrated with Facsimiles of Documents, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (post free, 6s. 4d.)

THE CRAVING FOR MASS VESTMENTS.
AN EXAMINATION OF THE REPORT PRESENTED BY FIVE BISHOPS TO THE CONVOCATION OF CANTERBURY ON "The Ornaments of the Church and its Ministers."
By J. T. TOMLINSON.
Demy 8vo, 1s. net (post free, 1s. 2d.)

THE FLOWERS AND TREES OF PALESTINE
By AUGUSTA A. TEMPLE.
Square crown 8vo, Illustrated, 6s. net (post free, 6s. 4d.)
"The work is exceedingly well done, and is interesting from cover to cover. The information is clearly and tersely set out and admirably arranged for reference, whilst the illustrations, of which there are forty, are exquisite."—Worcester Herald.

AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR.
By ADA T. BROWNING.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
"A strong and fascinating story in verse."—Baptist Times.

RUPERT BRETT:
THE STORY OF A MODERN EXPERIMENT.
By HARRY FORRESTER.
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.
"The plot has the merit of freshness, and it is worked out amid surroundings that make it essentially a story of to-day."
—Scotsman.

THE SINS OF THE FATHERS.
OR, THE WYE VALLEY MYSTERY.
By THOMAS WALTON.
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.
This is not a sensational novel, but a story of great interest, told in an easy and natural manner. It is believed there is not a dull page in the book; indeed, it becomes more interesting as we reach the end.

SPRING HARBINGERS AND THEIR ASSOCIATIONS.
By M. G. B.
Royal 16mo, vellum gilt, 1s. 6d. net (post free, 1s. 8d.)
"A pleasantly written account of the early flowers of the year."
—Aberdeen Journal.

Write for List of New Books.
LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

SOCIALIST REVIEW

MAY No. A MONTHLY REVIEW OF MODERN THOUGHT. MAY No.

CONTENTS:

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, by J. KEIR HARDIE, M.P.
Adam Smith as an Altruist, by RICHARD WHITEING.
The Feeding of School Children, by Councillor J. H. PALIN (of Bradford).
Housing and National Neglect, by GEORGE HAW.
Hollesley Bay, by GEORGE LANSBURY.
The Comedy and Tragedy of Factory Inspection, by X., Y. and Z.
Woman and Agriculture, by RICHARD HIGGS.
The Chairman's Address at the I.L.P. Conference, by J. R. MACDONALD, M.P.
The "Socialist Review" Outlook, by THE EDITOR.

6D. NET. OF ALL NEWSAGENTS & BOOKSTALLS. Published by the I.L.P., at 23, Bride-lane, E.C. 6D. NET.
Subscription 8/- per year or 2/- per quarter, post free, from the Publishers.

SOCIALIST REVIEW

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED.
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE ALBANY REVIEW.

For May. CONTENTS. Price Half-a-Crown.

THE NEW MINISTRY. By P. W. Wilson, M.P.
IMPRESSIONS OF EGYPT. By H. N. Brailsford.
THE RUSSIAN HORIZON. By Wildover Johnson.
MR. LLOYD-GEORGE'S OPPORTUNITY—AND RESPONSIBILITY. By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P.
ARE OUR SENSES DETERIORATING? By Elizabeth Godfrey.
THE SPANISH NATIONAL RISING OF 1808. By J. Holland Rose, Litt.D.
A MASTER OF THE SONNET. By Madame Linde Villani.
THE WOMAN'S MOVEMENT. i. Woman's Progress and the Woman's Press"; ii. Suffragette Methods. By Constance Elizabeth Maud.
RELIGION AND MODERN PSYCHOLOGY. By J. Arthur Hill.
FROM A POOR MAN'S HOUSE. By Stephen Reynolds.
CURRENT EVENTS: Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman; The Housing Bill; England, Russia, and the Balkans.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, Vigo Street, London, W.

In the interest of its history and associations, as well as in beauty of scenery, the Rhine is unique among the rivers of Europe. It suggests visions of the robber knights, whose ruined castles may be seen along its banks, legends such as that of the Lorelei singing from its waters, or, to come to more recent days, Becker's "Wacht am Rhein," and Alfred de Musset's spirited reply. Mr. H. T. Mackinder, in his excellent book, "The Rhine: Its Valley and History" (Chatto and Windus), has been content to ignore the rich store of romance on which he might have drawn, and to produce a scholarly history of the effects on political and economic history which the position of the Rhine has caused. Following its course from Switzerland to Holland, he tells the story of the chief events with which each town and each tributary have been associated, showing a great wealth of knowledge and mastery of detail. Many of the illustrations in colour by Mrs. James Jardine are pretty, but in some cases, possibly owing to the deficiencies of the three-colour process, the colours are harsh and crude. Mr. Mackinder's share in the volume deserves the highest praise. He has made a close study both of the history and of the physical features of the Rhine Valley, and he has presented the results of his researches in a workmanlike manner.

* * *

"Deep in the play and passion of bird-life, as we watch it in woods and fields, we come little by little to discern the dim but living rudiments of many far-reaching and conscious forces and instincts in our own developed natures." Thus Mr. Anthony Collett on the attraction of birds, and the sentence supplies a reason for the generally sympathetic attitude of the human being towards them, and explains the curious interest of a book like "Some British Birds" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net). This work is printed from the "Book of the Open Air," is edited by Mr. Edward Thomas, and includes contributions by several naturalist writers, a dozen colour-plates from drawings by Mr. Frank Southgate, a well-known exhibitor of water-colours at the R.B.A., and five fairly successful specimens of colour photography. As regards the text, the ornithology is not made too scientific, being treated from a first-hand observer's point of view; Mr. J. W. Bond's studies in Wales, for instance, and those of Mr. A. H. Patterson in the Broads district, are recorded with all the freshness that belongs to personal and enthusiastic investigation of phenomena. Mr. J. H. Crawford has two excellent essays on sea-birds, in which he defines this class more strictly than is generally done, while "Scolopax" writes interestingly on "Some Birds of the Marsh." What may be termed the human philosophy of the subject is dealt with by Messrs. Collett and D'Esterre Baily. The latter tells of his experiments in regard to the homing instinct of birds, and goes far towards proving his contention that this instinct is not confined to racing pigeons, but is common to all birds in a greater or lesser degree, being indeed a part of a sixth sense compounded of sight and memory. His chapter on "Birds as Architects," with its special attention to the long-tailed tit, shows how the sport of bird's-nesting can be interesting without its usual accompaniment, the wholesale theft of eggs.

The Week in the City.

Very little relief has been apparent in a general aspect of dulness affecting every department of the Stock Exchange except the American market. With that exception, prices have given way generally, special weakness being shown by Home and Foreign Rails. The buoyancy shown by Americans must be ascribed to the success of the Pennsylvania bond issue, which was anticipated here last week. The issues mentioned as likely to follow in its wake are already taking shape, the most advanced being one of $50,000,000 by the Union Pacific. In the cables from the other side the assertion has been made that this would be brought out under practically the same auspices as the Pennsylvania loan—viz., Rothschilds, Barings, and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. If it were, its success would probably be well assured; but those on this side who ought to know assert that it has no such backing. In any case, it would be well for investors to be on their guard against the notion that because the Pennsylvania issue met with such a cordial response, Union Pacific or any other American company will be equally successful in placing the large sums they require. The German Reichsbank has at length been able to reduce its rate from 5½ to 5 per cent.; but, though this implies some relaxation of the monetary tension, there is no improvement in the trade and general outlook. Numerous failures are reported, and the unemployed question is very serious. In the United States matters are no better. The quarterly return of the Steel Trust discloses an enormous reduction in profits, turnover, and in orders for future work. This alone implies a great contraction in trade and increase of unemployment, and the impression is confirmed by the records of railway earnings, which exhibit a serious shrinkage in gross earnings, and a still more significant decline in net receipts, together constituting a very indifferent preliminary to the large new issues of capital which the companies find it imperative to make. The decline in earnings extends to the Canadian railways also, and jeopardises considerably the return upon all Grand Trunk securities junior to the guaranteed stock. It is hoped that the period of excessive shrinkage in traffic returns is coming to an end, and a good harvest would go far towards saving the situation on both sides of the North American border. That, however, at the best, is a remote prospect, and the outlook for the near future is by no means encouraging.

The Finances of Spain.

In the records of modern European finance there are few more creditable episodes than the recovery of the Spanish Treasury from the Slough of Despond, in which it was left at the end of the war with the United States. With her navy destroyed, her colonies torn from her, labouring under numerous internal and external obligations, and torn by domestic dissensions, the position looked indeed as hopeless as it well could be. The end of the war, however, proved to be the extremity of Spain's financial stress, and it was only after she had lost them that she became aware that her colonies, so far from being a help and support, had been the main drag upon her domestic development. A Spanish Gladstone was found in the late Senor Villaverde, whose wise adjustments of taxation and of the Treasury's relations with the Bank of Spain completed the rebuilding of the edifice of Spanish finance on a sound foundation. The result is seen in the advance of Spanish Fours, which in the recent bad years—from a Stock Exchange point of view—have moved in a contrary direction to almost every other security. From a highest quotation of 91⅜ in 1903 and 1904, they advanced to 95⅝ in 1905, and 99¼ in 1906, and 99 in 1907, while the present quotation is 92¼. It is to be hoped that the good results of all these long years of struggle and economy are not to be partially or wholly dissipated by the policy of quite unnecessary naval expansion upon which the Government decided to embark last year. At the moment the difference in the position as compared with that of some years ago is exemplified by the annual report of the Bank of Spain. After the war the main business of this institution was to bolster up the Treasury, and the greater part of its profits was derived from its dealings in Government securities, and from the inflated note circulation which it was forced to establish. For years it has been the object of the Government to reduce the note circulation and its obligations to the Bank, and in this it has succeeded to quite a satisfactory extent. As the process went on, however, it dawned upon the authorities that, if carried to a conclusion, the occupation of the Bank of Spain would be gone. The Bank was therefore urged to extend its commercial and industrial activities in order to replace the loans of the Government business, and in this it has so far succeeded that, whereas formerly two-thirds of its profits were derived from its connection with the State in 1907, the larger proportions came from commercial operations. Thus, out of a total profit of £2,330,409, the commercial business accounted for £1,313,849, and only £1,016,569 came from its Treasury business. The increased attention given by Spain's leading financiers to industrial matters must be for the good of the country, and the greater the relief they can obtain from the preoccupation of adjusting the Government finances, and the more they can concern themselves with the development of the undoubtedly ample resources of their country the better it will be. Lucellum.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS WANTED.—£20 each offered. Guy Mannering, 1st edit., 3 vols. 1815, in boards uncut. Thackeray's Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48. Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols., Salisbury, 1766. Walton's Angler, 1653. Paradise Lost, 1667. Lamb's Shakespeare Tales, 2 vols., boards, 1827, 30/- each offered for. Scrope's Salmon Fishing, 1843. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Ireland's Napoleon, 4 vols., coloured plates. Jesse's George Selwyn, 4 vols., 1843. Books with inscriptions written inside by Carlyle, Meredith, Keats, Lamb, &c. All books with coloured plates by Ackerman, &c. Special list of wants free, high prices paid. Please let us know your wants. We can supply everything.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Experts, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham. [Bargain, Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 10 vols., 25/- cost £2 16s. net.]

Books as wedding presents—this is the subject of an interesting article in the May "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net. Another article is on "What Glasgow reads," and the number contains all the news of bookland, with many illustrations.

Order from your bookseller, or write for a specimen copy to the publishers, Simpkin Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—

Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD

(Viâ NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the { PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. / OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. / TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the
GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,
London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.;
City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.;
And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the undermentioned post:—

ASSISTANT MISTRESS, qualified to teach History, at the South Hackney Secondary School for Girls, Cassland Road, S. Hackney.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £120 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than the minimum stated above will be allowed if the successful candidate has had satisfactory experience, and in this connection two years' satisfactory experience in a secondary school approved by the Council for the purpose will be considered as equivalent to one year spent in a Council school, provided (i.) that periods of less than two years spent in any one school shall not be counted, and (ii.) that not more than ten years' outside service in all shall be taken into account.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, May 18th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "Assistant Mistress—Secondary Schools," and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.,
April 25th, 1908.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

The Council is about to appoint an Assistant Lecturer and Demonstrator in Education; stipend, £150. This appointment is confined to Non-candidates. Two Assistants (one man and one woman) will also be appointed to take part in the supervision of students in the Demonstration Schools. The Assistants will be expected to undertake teaching in the Schools.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Registrar, who will receive applications for these appointments up to May 20th.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundry work and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class: Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

NEW TERM BEGAN MAY 1st.

ST. GEORGE'S PUBLIC CO-EDUCATIONAL SCHOOL,

HARPENDEN, HERTS.

Headmaster—The REV. CECIL GRANT, M.A.

The next Term begins on Thursday, May 7th.

For prospectus and full particulars apply to The CO-EDUCATIONAL PUBLIC SCHOOLS TRUST, LTD., 41, Moorgate Street, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL Temperance),

GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Telephone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus's New List

THE FLORENCE PRESS.

Believing that the time has now come when beautiful books in the choicest types can be published in larger editions, and at a less cost than has been usual with such monuments of typography as the issues of the Kelmscott and other similar but less notable Presses, THE FLORENCE PRESS has commissioned MR. HERBERT P. HORNE to design a new fount modelled on the finest types used by the Italian Master-Printers of the Quattrocento and Cinquecento The sole publishers for the Press are MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS.

The Publishers will issue the FLORENCE PRESS BOOKS, as they issue other books, in reasonable editions, neither very small, nor very large; but the books will not be reprinted in the Florence Types.

A Prospectus of the FLORENCE PRESS BOOKS, printed in Florence Type, is in course of preparation, and will be forwarded post free on application.

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS
AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

Subscription - - - £3 per annum, post free.

The Plates can be supplied separately to non-subscribers.

The MEDICI SERIES offers to Subscribers a series of reproductions in pure Collotype, printed in permanent colours upon hand-made linen paper, after the finest examples of the Great Italian Masters. Of the quality of these reproductions THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE says: "Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."

The next three plates to be issued will be :—

VII. FILIPPINO LIPPI. (?) The Virgin in Adoration (TEMPERA). Colour surface 19½ by 15 in. 15s. net. [Now ready.

VIII. BOTTICELLI. The Birth of Venus (TEMPERA.) Colour surface, 36 by 21½ in. 25s. net. [Shortly.

X. TITIAN. The Madonna of the Cherries (TEMPERA). Colour surface, half-original. 17s. 6d. net. [July.

By the same Process.

PORTRAIT OF A LADY. Never before reproduced. By an unknown Flemish Master. Now in the Academy, Vienna.
Size of Plate, 26 by 19 in. Colour surface, 16 by 12 in. (about half the original).
Price for prepaid orders before publication, 15s net. Published price, 17s. 6d. net; postage 6d. [Ready on or about June 1st.

Full particulars of plates and Frames, with method of Publication and terms of Subscription, will be found in an illustrated Prospectus which may be had post free on application.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE MARQUIS AND PAMELA.
By E. H. COOPER, Author of "Mr. Blake of Newmarket."
A dramatic story of love and sport.
"There is some delightful reading in 'The Marquis and Pamela.'"—Daily Mail.

HIS FINAL FLUTTER.
By HENRY POTTS, Author of "Circuit Companions."
A brisk story of modern racing, romance sport, and criminal law.

THE LITTLE GOD'S DRUM.
BY RALPH STRAUS.
An ambitious novel of modern manners in London.

ANNE PAGE. [Early in May.
By Miss NETTA SYRETT, Author of "The Child of Promise."

New Sixpenny Novels.

NO OTHER WAY. By SIR WALTER BESANT. [Now Ready.
THE JOY OF LIFE. By EMILE ZOLA. [May 7th.
TOM SAWYER. By MARK TWAIN. [May 21st.
Full List of Copyright Sixpenny Novels post free on application.

Three Volumes by Richard Jefferies.

THE LIFE OF THE FIELDS.
With 12 Reproductions after Water-colours by M. U. CLARKE, and coloured End-papers. Crown 8vo. cloth, coloured top, 5s. net; whole green parchment, 7s. 6d. net.

Uniform with the above.

THE OPEN AIR. [Ready May 7th.
NATURE NEAR LONDON. [Autumn.

THE NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY.

Each volume contains Photogravure or Woodcut Reproductions of the Illustrations contained in the Works translated. Each volume further contains a Title-page engraved upon Wood, after a notable contemporary example.
Size 6½ by 4¾in., boards, cloth, 5s. net; whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

New Volumes Ready Shortly.

THE BABEE'S BOOK: Mediæval Manners for the Young.
THE LEGEND OF THE HOLY FINA, Virgin of Santo Geminiano.

A detailed list of the Series post-free on application.

ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

POCKET SIZE. Mostly in Pott 8vo cloth gilt, 2s. net per Vol. Leather gilt, 3s. net per Vol.

NEW VOLUMES.

PRINCE OTTO. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. [Now Ready.
THE CHARM OF EDINBURGH. By A. H. HYATT. [Shortly.
THE NEW REPUBLIC. By W. H. MALLOCK. [Shortly.

A detailed list of the Series post-free on application.

THE WORKS OF JANE AUSTEN.

In 10 vols., each Illustrated with 10 Reproductions after Water-Colours by A. WALLIS MILLS. The Text Revised, with Bibliographical and Biographical Notes, by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

HANDY VOLUME EDITION. LARGE TYPE.

Small crown 8vo, coloured tops, cloth, with Special Binding Design and Coloured End-Papers, 3s. 6d. net per vol.

Vols. I. & II. PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. [May 15th
Vols. III. & IV. SENSE AND SENSIBILITY. Immediately

CHATTO & WINDUS, Dept. P., 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 6.] SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
The Diary of the Week	173
Politics and Affairs:—
The Triumph of Free Trade	176
A Word to the Labor Party	177
The Indian Portent	178
The Frontier War	179
Life and Letters:—
The Trade in Fiction	181
An Earthly Paradise	182
Town and Country:—
I.—The Spring Wind	183
II.—The Joyous Man	183
The Rush for the Sun	184
Letters from Abroad:—
The Two Heads of the Friesinn. By Ed. Bernstein	185
The Drama:—
"The Gay Lord Quex." By H.W.M.	186
Art:—
The Royal Academy.—I.	187
Letters to the Editor:—
The Imprisonment of Osman Digna. By An Egyptian Correspondent	188
Women and the Suffrage. By Emma Hardy	189
"Are Wild Animals Born Wild?" By G. G. Desmond	189
What a Colonist Thinks. By Thomas Yorath	190
Beer and the Bible. By A Manchester Man	190
Russian Horrors. By P. M. G.	190
A Shakespeare Memorial. By L. J. Roberts	190
The Research Defence Society. By Dr. Greville MacDonald	191
The "Crux" in "The Tempest." By Violet Churchill	191
The Sugar Convention. By "Spectator"	191
The Problem of Unemployment. By Arthur Kitson	191
Peckham. By the Hon. Henry Lygon	192
The Explanation of the Licensing Bill. By J. A. Swanwick	193
Country Life. By J. Marshall Sturge	193
Poetry:—
A Connacht Folk Song. By Padraic Colum	193
The World of Books	194
Books to be Read	194
Reviews:—
Out of Tune	195
The Soul of Buddhism	196
One Year's Life	196
Modernism in English Eyes	198
Art and Artless	200
Books in Brief:—
The Truth about Port Arthur	202
History of Music to the Death of Schubert	202
Ancient Italy	202
St. George for Merrie England	202
Romantic Tales from the Panjab	202
The Astronomy of the Bible	204
Irish and English	204
The Passing of Morocco	204
Notable Scottish Trials	204
A Novel Reader's Guide	204
The Week in the City	204

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Mr. Asquith's third Budget, expounded in a speech of crystal clearness and massive simplicity of structure, is a veritable triumph for Free Trade Finance. At one stroke the outworn fiscal system upon which British commercial and financial prosperity is founded has (1) produced a splendid surplus, (2) made a record reduction of debt, (3) rendered possible a large remission of taxation, and (4) concurrently started Old Age Pensions on a scale of far-reaching application. The salient points in this truly epoch-making Budget are as follows:—

1907-8.

	Estimated. £	Actual. £	+ or −. £
Revenue ...	152,835,000	156,538,000	+3,703,000
Expenditure ...	*153,444,000	151,812,000	−1,632,000
Surplus (+) or Deficit (−)...	− 609,000	+4,726,000	+5,335,000

* Including Supplementary Estimates, £942,000.

The original estimated surplus was £333,000; this was converted into an estimated deficit of £609,000, by supplementary estimates for £942,000; and this deficit, thanks to the soundness of our fiscal system, and to general prosperity, has been converted into the handsome surplus of £4,726,000. To this result income-tax, on the revenue side, contributed nearly £2,000,000, which is the more remarkable in view of the relief granted to earned incomes under the Finance Act of last year.

For the current year, Mr. Asquith's estimate of Revenue on the basis of existing taxation, when compared with financial requirements, showed a large surplus, thus:—

1908-9.

Estimated Revenue	£157,770,000
,, Expenditure ...	152,869,000
Budget surplus	4,901,000

In arriving at these figures, Mr. Asquith estimated for an increase of nearly a million in the tax revenue (income-tax £620,000 increase), and of about £200,000 in the non-tax revenue. His estimate of expenditure is as follows:—

Expenditure, 1908-9.

National Debt	£28,000,000
Other consolidated fund services ...	1,685,000
Payments to local taxation account...	11,250,000
Supply services	111,934,000
	£152,869,000

£28,000,000 is the amount of the fixed annual charge of the debt as determined by Mr. Austen Chamberlain, the added appropriations of £500,000 in 1906-7, and of £1,500,000 in 1907-8, being temporary additions to the Sinking Funds, as explained in the Budget statements of those years.

* * *

The kernel of the Budget consists in the appropriation of a surplus, or the measures adopted to make good a deficit. Mr. Asquith, as has been shown, was the fortunate possessor of a surplus of nearly £5,000,000, and this is how he distributed it:—

Budget surplus, 1908-9		£4,901,000
Reduction of sugar duty from 4s. 2d. to 1s. 10d. per cwt. ...	£3,400,000
Provision for Old Age Pensions, beginning January 1st, 1909	1,200,000
Reduction of stamp duty on marine policies, from 3d to 1d. per cent.	60,000	4,660,000
Final surplus for contingencies		£241,000

Mr. Asquith estimated that the Government scheme of old age pensions would absorb £6,000,000 a year; it is, therefore, not a little remarkable that he should have chosen the moment of the inauguration of so large an annual expenditure for so considerable a remission of taxation. It is also strong testimony to the ex-Chancellor's confidence in the strength of the British financial system. We already hear the criticism that Mr. Asquith, having launched his scheme of old age pensions, has left his successor to foot the bill, having first deprived him of a large portion of the necessary funds. But, as a matter of fact, Mr. Asquith gave a pretty broad hint to Mr. Lloyd-George as to where to look for the equivalent of the money surrendered by reducing the sugar tax. A reduction of the annual charge for the Debt to £25,000,000 was clearly foreshadowed for the Budget of 1909-10. Mr. George's ingenuity may be trusted to provide the balance, and to keep the war services within reasonable bounds. One of the chief advantages of old age pensions is that they will act as a rampart against excessive armaments.

* * *

A striking feature of the Budget is the enormous reduction of debt for which the Liberal Government is making itself responsible. In the course of 1907-8 no less than £18,000,000—an unprecedented amount—has been wiped off the national liabilities.

Debt paid off 1907-8.

Funded debt	£6,319,000
Terminable annuities	1,457,000
Unfunded debt (including the War Loan)	10,224,000
	£18,000,000

Further, Mr. Asquith estimated that the amount available for this purpose in 1908-9 would be £14,376,000. These, as the Prime Minister observed, are very remarkable figures. Altogether, in the three years ending March 31st, 1909, about £46,000,000 of debt will have been paid off, and the deadweight debt will again have been brought to the manageable figure at which it stood some twenty years ago—namely, just under £700,000,000.

* * *

The Old Age Pensions scheme is simplicity itself. It avoids nearly all the pitfalls. It rejects contributions and character tests, only excluding actual aliens, criminals, lunatics, people in receipt of poor-law relief, and those who have been convicted of serious crime within five years, and places the organisation of the scheme entirely outside the Poor-law. It fixes the age limit at 70, and excludes all with an income exceeding £26 a year, or married couples with £39 a year. The pension received is to be £13 a year, or 5s. a week, and £19 10s. in the case of married couples living together. There will be half a million pensioners at an annual cost of six millions, only £1,200,000 of which will fall within the present year. Payments will be made by the Post Office, acting through a pension officer and an investigating committee appointed by the local authorities. The scheme has been received with much favour. The Labor Party accept it in principle, but criticise the age limit as too high, especially for town workers, and the income limit as too low and too arbitrary. Mr. Henderson, for example, stated that the boiler-makers' pension of 11s. a week would exclude them. Liberal and Radical comment was enthusiastic, but there was a general plea for the reduction of the age limit to 65. The criticism of the Protectionist Press is ill-tempered and confused, but this is natural, for the Budget destroys the mainstay of their case.

* * *

We now turn to Germany. The first business of the Reichstag after the vacation was finance, and Herr von Sydow told the House that the Empire would have a deficit of £50,000,000 in the next five years, even though the rate of expenditure remained unaltered. Everybody knows that there are to be new Army and Navy Bills before 1911, so that Herr von Sydow's estimate that the Imperial debt will have gone up from £200,000,000 to only £250,000,000 is a good deal too comfortable. The tariff is not exactly a horn of plenty to Germany, which cannot keep an army and navy outfit, or pay its servants a living wage—to say nothing of letting the working-man enjoy the golden age. The obvious way out of a financial situation which is ruining German credit is economy on armaments. That is not acceptable, and new taxation is hazardous, because it brings Empire and States into conflict, and jeopardises the Government's Liberal-Conservative majority. German Protectionist finance is most illuminating, at a time when Tariff "Reformers" are telling the constituencies that the tariff will unite the Empire, keep down the cost of living—it is starving the German civil servant—and provide ample means for swollen armaments and social reform. Compare all this with our Budget.

* * *

The Second Reading of the Licensing Bill was carried on Monday by a majority of 246, 394 voting for it and 148 against it. The analysis of the division is most satisfactory, for it shows that the very small Liberal secession, amounting to eight votes, was almost exactly balanced by seven supporters taken from the Opposition benches. Only about half a dozen Liberals were absent unpaired, and all the Labor members who voted favoured the Bill. The failure to poll the full strength of the House was due to the indifference of the Nationalists, most of whom were absent, while a few voted against the Bill. This result has been attained without any weakening or even qualification of the Ministerial position. Practically the Government go into Committee unpledged and unscathed. We strongly hope that this stage will be taken soon, and that there is no truth in the disquieting rumour that it will be held over till the autumn session.

* * *

The most brilliant speech of the debate was supplied by Mr. Lloyd-George, who properly challenged the Opposition on their indifferent attitude to the enormous material and moral waste of the national resources, of which, as he said, drink was the "prime agent." The drink bill of the country was £22 per family, and the 200,000 annual convictions for drunkenness represented a mere tenth of the actual evil of excess. No Anglo-Saxon community ever proposed so moderate a solution. He showed by some very striking facts that the small compensation payable in some cases under the Bill arose from semi-fraudulent assessments. On the same point Mr. Asquith, in summing up the debate, declared that the Kennedy basis was absolutely bad, and that the Bill would give time, which perhaps should be extended, for a process of re-assessment. He also stated that the compensation to be paid to the publican for loss of profit would, if necessary, be more clearly indicated in the Committee stage. But the most significant passage in the Prime Minister's speech was that in which he conveyed a veiled warning to the House of Lords. The Opposition denounced the Bill as confiscation. But supposing it had never been introduced, and that in place of it he had suggested "a really good, adequate licence duty" instead of "the present perfectly trumpery duties exacted from the higher valued houses," would that have been confiscation? The Opposition made no answer. This is no idle threat; the Government are prepared at once to meet the rejection of the Bill by the Lords. With the exception of Mr. Cave's speech and parts of Mr. Long's their case was conducted with feebleness, most of the speakers evading the main issue—namely, opposition to or acceptance of the principle of the time limit. Lord Robert Cecil, indeed, admitted that there would be no great objection to a time limit if it were unaccompanied by injustice. Sir Edward Carson's main point was the existence of vested interests in licences which amounted to much more than the expectation of renewal, and that, therefore, the Bill was a confiscatory attack on property.

A SERIOUS and brutal outrage has been committed in India. At Muzaffarpur on Friday week a bomb was thrown at the carriage of an English lady, apparently under the impression that it contained relatives of Mr. Kingsford, who last year ordered the flogging of schoolboys. Two ladies, Mrs. and Miss Kennedy, and the coachman were killed. The police, in making a series of raids on houses and native newspapers in Calcutta, have seized a quantity of bombs and arms and a mass of Anarchist literature which point to a considerable propaganda or organisation of political outrage. Amongst those arrested is Mr. Arabindo Ghose, the chief writer for the native journal "Bande Mataram," a young Indian agitator of considerable ability, who was educated at St. Paul's School. It is admitted that the native press repudiate the policy of outrage and denounce the perpetrators, while asking the Government to pursue a policy of concession. On the other hand, the Anglo-Indian papers, led, of course, by the "Times," plead for repression, for the prosecution of politicals, and the "curbing" of the Press. We imagine, however, that Lord Morley will refuse to apply to India a policy whose failure he has brilliantly exposed in Ireland.

* * *

ON Friday a force of Afghans crossed the frontier into the Khyber, and part moved against Landi Kotal, while the rest are said to have turned up the Bazar Valley to rouse the Afridis. On Saturday night and Sunday an unsuccessful attack was made on Landi Kotal, where on Monday General Sir James Willcocks engaged the tribesmen, who were few in number, though they had been wildly estimated at many thousands. The Afridis remained quiet, and even offered their services to the British. On Thursday the British troops commenced to retire, so that it looks as though the trouble had passed. It has been extravagantly exaggeraed. The tribesmen who crossed the frontier are really Mohmands, because the Durand line is only an abstraction. Nevertheless, the Indian Press, and the Tory Press led by the "Times," have been preaching a Jehad against the Amir —doubtless with a view to persuading him to approve the Anglo-Russian Agreement—and have been insinuating that we are on the verge of marching into Afghanistan, and at the least cannot avoid occupying permanently the frontier country.

* * *

THE election at Wolverhampton has resulted in the return of Mr. Thorne, the Radical candidate, by a majority of eight, 4,514 voting for him and 4,506 for Mr. Amery, the high Protectionist. At the General Election there was a Liberal majority of 2,865, and the Liberal vote has fallen by 1,096, while Mr. Amery's following has grown from 2,745 to its present figure. The battle was fought on ground unfavourable to Liberalism, for Lord Wolverhampton's position was almost non-political, and until lately rested on a kind of unwritten truce with Mr. Chamberlain, while he is charged with having neglected the mechanical organisation. It is probable that the large majority of the 1,100 Catholics voted for the Tory, preferring religious to political grounds. The brewers' campaign was more concealed than at Peckham, but it is said to have been most thorough and, needless to say, unscrupulous. But the chief moral of the election is more economic than political. Mr. Amery is one of the leaders of the "Imperialist-Protectionist" movement which looks to Lord Milner as its chief. In spite of this fact, he was blessed by a strong letter from Mr. Balfour, and he made a vigorous attempt to capture the great working-class district of Willenhall, where the lockmaking and other industries are said to have been affected by German and American competition. Wholesale promises or suggestions of protecting local industries seem to have been made. We note, by the way, that Lord Avebury has written a letter of support to Sir George Baxter, the Protectionist candidate for Dundee, and Unionist Free Traders are everywhere excusing their treachery to Free Trade by the pretence that it is identical with laissez-faire. These politicians resemble the bloodless ghosts of heroes who greeted Odysseus in the land of the shades. They have ceased to live in the active world.

* * *

MOROCCAN affairs have taken a bad turn for France. The French papers have been reporting that Mulai Hafid had been abandoned and plundered by the tribes and was a fugitive, and for the fiftieth time they announced that Abdul Aziz was on the road to Fez. Abdul Aziz, however, has again stopped at the first river outside Rabat, though with French help he has re-occupied the port of Saffi. Mulai Hafid, however, has escaped the French forces at Settat, which were anxious to wipe him out, and has reached Mekinez, the second city of the empire, only five hours' march from Fez. The race to Fez—there was never more than one runner, despite the countless French newspaper alarums—has thus been won by Mulai Hafid, who will now hold the North as well as the South, everything not dominated by French guns. Meanwhile, the German Government is to receive his envoys "unofficially," a decision which has stung the Colonial fire-eaters in Paris to explosion. M. Clemenceau is meditating plans. He cannot now long delay choosing between preparing the restriction of French action to the Algeciras act, as sane French opinion desires, and a march on Fez, which will set France in open war with Morocco, and violate the pledges repeatedly given to the French Chamber, and, as the German White-book shows, to the German Government.

* * *

THIS week King Leopold's critics have raised the Congo debate in the Belgian Chamber to a level commensurate with the greatness of the issue. M. Vandevelde, the Socialist leader, explained on Saturday why he differs from his party. He is for annexation in principle, because internationalisation is impossible, and since Belgium cannot abandon the problem she has created, she must annex as the only guarantee of reform. But he will vote against the Government's treaty, because it imposes financial burdens that would hamper the work of reform. M. Lorand, the Radical, took up this point of finance, which is the crux of the reform question. The concessionary companies had confiscated the nation's rights, and England was insisting that they were a breach of the Berlin Act. Were they to be bought out, and where were the necessary millions to come from? He was against annexation, because it involved grave international and financial complications. Mr. Janson, another Liberal leader, favoured internationalisation. The Minister of Justice, in reply, tried to show that the Belgian taxpayer would incur no burdens, because the Colony and Belgium are juridically distinct entities, a not very plausible piece of sophistry. while the Foreign Minister, in explaining that the negotiations with England were still incomplete, did not throw away the chance of repeating a well-worn appeal to Belgian "patriotism."

Politics and Affairs.

THE TRIUMPH OF FREE TRADE.

The Budget of 1908 is more the triumph of a system than of a man. We do not disparage Mr. Asquith's powers as a financier, nor his brilliant gifts as an exponent of policy, when we say that the outstanding feature of his financial statement was the vindication of Free Trade as a basis of national finance. It is not too much to say that the success of Free Trade this year has exceeded the most sanguine anticipations of Free Traders. What are the outstanding facts? Mr. Asquith has been paying off the National Debt at the rate of about 15½ millions a year. The annual charge on the debt has been reduced during his term of office by nearly one million and a quarter. By his exertions, and the less strenuous economies of his predecessor, who made reductions at the rate of £9,000,000 a year, the National Debt has been reduced by seventy-four millions since the close of the South African War. More than this, by March of next year, the Debt will stand at £696,500,000, or lower by half a million than it was twenty years ago. While Protectionist nations are perpetually borrowing to make good their deficits, Free Trade finance has paid off the expenditure of a great war in six years and reduced the National Debt to the level at which it stood before the epoch of expenditure, and to a point at which it was easily borne by the smaller population and far smaller wealth of the 'Eighties. Nothing will convert the inconvertible, but we imagine that great numbers of the more thoughtful, who have been rendered anxious by the endlessly reiterated jeremiads of Tariff Reform, will rub their eyes when they read Mr. Asquith's plain statement of figures. They will ask themselves whether as a mere matter of national economy we can possibly do better than continue a system which shows such results, and whether those who have been telling us that we are sick and need a change are not too like the vendors of quack medicines, who persuade healthy men into imaginary complaints that they may be willing to pay for nauseous and dangerous medicines.

But this is only one side of the Free Trade triumph. On all sides we have been told that Free Trade and economy is a passable cry, but that Free Trade and Social Reform is a contradiction in terms. Tariff Reform alone, the Protectionist has assured us, can find the sinews of a policy of progress. The newer demand for increased provision for the children, the sick, and the aged was a demand of the national conscience that could no longer be resisted It must be met, but it could only be met by broadening the basis of taxation. A Free Trade Chancellor might be sympathetic, but must be helpless. He was hopelessly hampered by an inelastic revenue, and his good intentions could never bear fruit in deed. From a certain quarter of the Free Trade ranks themselves the same cry has gone up, only with a variation of stress. Free Trade was the one and only good. Increase the public burdens, and you imperil the ark of the covenant. Give Old Age Pensions, and you must weigh down the taxpayer with a burden not to be borne—a burden that must make him cry out in despair for import duties. Mr. Asquith's reply is to show the complete and startling success of his last year's scheme of differentiation of the income-tax, and to lay the foundations of an Old Age Pension scheme, and lay them solidly, if as yet on a modest scale, without adding a penny to the taxes of the community. Thursday's Budget marks an epoch in British social history as a decisive breaking away from the traditions of the Poor Law and the beginning of a new conception of the duty of the State towards poverty. But this is not all. The most sanguine of us were led to believe that Old Age Pensions were an alternative to the abolition of the sugar duty, and there were not wanting men of real feeling for the poor who held that cheap sugar was more important than a pension in old age. Mr. Asquith has created the pension system and halved the sugar duty at one blow. The charge that a Free Trade Government could do nothing to lower the cost of living has been rebuked at the same moment in which independent living is rendered possible for half a million of the aged. Incidentally, the famous Tariff Reform equation is overset. The reduction in the sugar duty which Mr. Chamberlain promised at the price of a bread tax is given at no price at all, but as the free gift of a sound financial system. The charge that the poor would be made to pay for their own pensions by the retention of a war tax is destroyed. Old Age Pensions and cheaper sugar are the double gifts of Free Trade finance and Liberal policy to the nation which has trusted them.

We have said that the Budget marks a new era in the attitude of the State towards the poor. As compared with the existing system of relief for the aged, the pension system makes a subsistence provision a matter of right, independent of the destitution of the recipient or of the will of Poor Law authorities. The underlying principle of the new departure is that destitution and dependence are alike intolerable in civilised life. The right to live, and to live in independence, is recognised as an attribute of citizenship, and it becomes one of the recognised functions of the State to see that the bare minimum of civilised sustenance is the portion of each one of its members who does not forfeit it by waste and misconduct. The principle is destined to receive a larger application in the general reconsideration of the Poor Law, which the Report of the Commission will set in motion, and which, as Mr. Asquith has hinted, will occupy the attention of Parliament next year. It brings up for revision the whole position of underfed children, and of the sick who cannot obtain adequate treatment. The question of the aged has been taken first because it ripened first, and it ripened first partly because it was simpler, and partly because it attracted the attention of Mr. Charles Booth, whose unrivalled authority in matters relating to the life of the poor secured the attention of thoughtful men for the special remedy which he favoured. But the solution of the problem has long hung in doubt. There were the pitfalls of the contributory schemes, there were the still more insidious pitfalls of the discriminating schemes. Against both of these Mr. Asquith has been on his guard. The pensions involve no contribution, and—apart from the income limit—the classes excepted are reduced to a minimum of which few will complain. Mr. Asquith has, in fact, followed the general lines frequently advocated in the columns of The Nation, though he has not this year advanced as far along those lines as we could have desired. Our contention was that with a not unreasonable increase of taxation it would be possible to reduce the age to sixty-five, with an income limit of ten shillings, or to abolish the income limit and raise the age to seventy. Mr. Asquith has retained the income limit and the higher age. He has left it to his successor to raise the one or lower the other. Everything in the scheme, as he justly said, is provisional, and at both points the scheme itself points to expansion in the future. One criticism of detail, however, must not be passed over. The refusal to entertain a sliding scale is a real blot on the scheme as it stands. We may presume that the matter has been considered, and that, for reasons of simplicity, it has been thought best to start with a single standard of wage. But the objections are obvious. If we understand Mr. Asquith aright, a man with 10s. a week might claim his 5s., while the unlucky owner of 10s. 1d. will get nothing. This is not a position which can easily be defended in argument. It is, fortunately, possible to amend it without increasing the total cost. It is a necessity of the scheme that as the income limit is approached there should be a sliding scale so adjusted that the man with a trifle over 10s. a week will not be worse but better off than the man with 9s. This is achieved, for example, by a scale reducing the amount of pension by 6d. for every additional shilling of income after a certain fixed standard, and this standard can be so chosen that the cost would not be greater than that provided by Mr. Asquith's plan.

Apart from this drawback, which we hope to see set right, we can fairly say the lines of a just and rational treatment of the aged are now fairly traced. If this is so, Mr. Asquith's last Budget will go down to history with Budgets that have made an epoch. It has confirmed the Free Trade system; it has dealt Tariff Reform a crushing blow; it has proved the power of Liberalism to deal with Social Reform and of Free Trade to finance it; and it marks a new departure in the dealings of the State with the problem of the poor.

A WORD TO THE LABOR PARTY.

It is necessary to examine the results of the Wolverhampton election with some care, if we would arrive at a really sound estimate of the political position. We know now that the English electorate is in a restless, unstable state, and that it is being worked upon by diverse influences. What are they? First there is the breaking away of the Irish Catholic electorate from their political leaders, and their rather melancholy and short-sighted adherence to the high Tory element in the English priesthood. Then there is the campaign of an interest which links itself pretty closely to the social habits of the workmen. In Lancashire and various industrial centres in the Midlands these two elements work together, and they are formidable, for they subtract from the legitimate strength of democratic Liberalism. Finally, in Lancashire, there is the influence of the Anglican Church and the Anglican school. The Church, the Catholic chapel, and the public-house are old electoral allies, and when they are all combined in a common movement of repulsion, they reveal the strength of forces which strike the progressive mind as rather blindly Conservative. Nor, for the moment, is it possible to discern a full compensating element. The heads of the Labor Party are either lacking in the power to measure the tendencies of political action; or, and this is much more probable, they have not yet acquired full control over their constituents; or they are over-sanguine, and cherish the notion that, though the workmen may be drawn away from one kind of reforming party, they may remain attached to another. In this calculation they are mistaken, as the results in Dewsbury and North-West Manchester show. When the Liberal wave was still rising, the Labor flood rose with it. As soon as one began to ebb, the other retired also. Their true policy in Dundee, therefore, would have been to withdraw a candidature which, so far as we can judge from Mr. Stuart's speeches, is discreditable to the intellect of the Labor-Socialist Party, to concentrate on a Cabinet Minister who had given broad indications of sympathy with their programme, and frankly to join forces with the Government outside as well as inside the House of Commons so long as such issues as the Licensing Bill, the Eight Hours Bill, the Old Age Pensions Bill, the Shop Hours Bill, the Wages Boards Bill, were undecided. Such a course would give them genuine power in the present juncture, and yet would leave them free for independent electoral action.

Some such policy seems to us the more necessary inasmuch as the Wolverhampton election shows that, apart from the special difficulties we have mentioned, democratic politics are in grave danger of being "sidetracked" altogether. We know what British workmen are when they apply their minds to politics. They have had no such severe training in public issues as the Irish Nationalist or the French Republican has experienced. They seem capable of being moved by enthusiasm for good causes in politics, for large, semi-religious movements like Socialism, and then of swinging right back; by the pressure of habit and association, and at the instance of a coarse, melodramatic press, which is hostile to all their serious movements, not only to Toryism, but, what is far worse, to Protection. It is doubtful whether education has as yet done much for them; certainly it has not protected them against the charlatanry of Tariff Reform. Take the Wolverhampton case. It is, perhaps, the first genuine instance of Protection, seriously and thoroughly advocated, making way in an English manufacturing district. But is there another country in the world where such a candidate as Mr. Amery would present himself as a suitor for popular votes? He is an able, and we have no doubt a sincere, Protectionist. He is also a militarist, a coercionist, and a conscriptionist. He is identified with the journal which would not describe itself as other than a secular enemy of democratic movements. In Germany he would be a member of some such Whig-Jingo party as the National Liberals, pupils and tools of Bismarck, the chief exemplar of the reaction in modern European politics. Yet Mr. Amery came within eight votes of winning a seat in a great working-class centre in mid-England.

Well, he did it apparently by promising a great many things which Protection has never secured to any body of workmen in any Protectionist country in the world. We can understand a Protectionist who promises the workman employment. We cannot understand how he can promise them, as Mr. Amery promised them, cheap goods and even cheaper food. Has he dropped Preferences and food taxes? If this is the new Protectionist move, the Empire, Mr. Chamberlain, and the Colonies, are all sold, and a thoroughly dishonest shuffle has taken place. But, indeed, the whole aim and effect of Protection are to raise prices, while leaving wages to shift for themselves, so that a priori, the workman, who sells labor and buys commodities, stands to lose by the application of such a doctrine to his daily life. "In the highly protected industries of Pennsylvania," says Henry George, "laborers, for whose sake we are told this Protection is imposed, are asking for sixty-five cents a day, and half-clad women are feeding furnace fires." But, in the main, we imagine that those workers of Willenhall who were seduced into the Protectionist camp were drawn by such gross inducements as were offered by Messrs. Joseph Evans and Sons, makers of pumps and pumping machinery. These gentlemen, in a circular to the electors, declared that if a tariff were put on foreign imports of the articles they manufactured, "they would employ at least a hundred more men in a very short time, and eventually in all probability employ double the men." A propaganda, founded on such methods as these is as scandalous as it is simple, but the workman ought to be intelligent enough to ask where his interest comes into it. Has he found that rises in prices involve increases in wages? And, if such an increase were secured, should he not inquire how long Messrs. Evans would go on paying it, when, as a result of special favour to the pump trade, workers began to flow into it from other employments, such as the pump users, or the pump carriers, or the pump importers, whose industries would receive an injury proportionate to the benefit which Mr. Amery's friends would confer on Messrs. Evans? Now that Mr. Amery has some leisure, he might inform us which of the hundred trades of Wolverhampton he proposes to benefit by his tariff and which he proposes to injure.

But what is still more serious in the effect of the Protectionist propaganda on working-class politics is that it is designed to stop the general movement of the mass of the people towards a betterment of their position, and to divert taxation from gathered wealth to labor and the processes of trade. If large bodies of workmen are alienated from Liberalism and Laborism by the lures spread for them by Tory manufacturers on the look-out for State loot, the whole conception of labor politics is dried up at its source. There is no such organised Protectionist-Socialist Party in England as serves to mitigate the evil effect of tariff-politics in Australia. If the Government goes, back come Mr. Balfour and his reactionary cohorts, pressed from behind by tariff-jobbers and lobbyists. Everything else will be absorbed and forgotten, and all power will go into the hands of the favoured capitalists and the party wirepullers. Even if we take the narrower view of present-day politics, the chance of passing effective Labor Bills is greatly qualified by the encouragement which such results as those of Peckham, and, in a diminished degree, those of Manchester and Wolverhampton, give to the House of Lords. As for the Government, we hope that it will look neither to the right nor to the left, but go straight on with its programme, determined to convince the main body of the electorate that it will press to the utmost the powers of its majority, until it has fulfilled the mandate of 1906 to answer Protection with social reform. But it is for the Labor Party to consider whether its position is not being menaced and undermined by a force which rests on aggressive wealth, and appeals to the thoughtless side of the British workman's character in order to detach him from serious politics.

THE INDIAN PORTENT.

Our indifference to the normal life of the greatest dependency in the world is an old scandal, but it will be widely disturbed by the news of the outbreak of a form of political violence hitherto almost unknown to it. From our neglect of India sprang the Swadeshi movement, for it was hoped that a boycott on English goods might make our people listen to the grievance of Bengal. We suppose that the party which has meditated these recent deeds of extreme and savage outrage was partly influenced by the same motives. If they could wreck the train of a fairly popular Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, as was attempted last November, or assassinate a magistrate who had made himself notorious by flogging political offenders, as was attempted a week ago, then, they thought, the people of our country might at last be compelled to realise the character of the crisis in India's history. Much of our news from Calcutta is untrustworthy, and confessions merely extorted by native police from Indian prisoners awaiting trial ought not to be admitted as evidence. But it seems probable that a conspiracy for violent and isolated outrage, similar to the methods of the Russian terrorists, existed in the capital. The most serious part of the news is the arrest of Mr. Arabindo Ghose, a young Indian who showed great promise at St. Paul's School and at Cambridge, passed high into the Indian Civil Service, and later served with distinction under the reforming Maharajah of Baroda. Lately, as the real director of the "Bande Mataram," an Indian paper published in English in Calcutta, he has been regarded as the chief leader of the Extremist section among the younger men, and it will be remembered that it was during the trial of his paper last summer that the agitator, Bepin Chundra Pal, refused to give evidence against his countrymen in an alien Court, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Till the contrary is proved, we assume that Mr. Ghose is innocent of the present charge. But he is admittedly a leader in the Extremist party that no longer looks to our Government for reform, but works for an ill-defined nationalist movement, in spite of that Government and in opposition to it. It is deplorable that a man of unusual intellectual power and seriousness of character, educated on the highest lines that England can offer, acquainted from boyhood with our country, and trained to political experience in one of the best administered States of India, should be prominent in such a party. But it is also significant of the capital error in Lord Curzon's Indian policy. Outbreaks of political violence may arise from one cause or another. But they certainly do occur under a system of political repression such as we have adopted in various parts of India since the partition of Bengal. They may have, as we have said, the "chapel bell" motive, the desire to attract attention to grievances when legitimate means fail. But we think, also, that in the case of India, they are the answer to the hard doctrine which Lord Morley disavowed a year ago, that "we won India by the sword and must keep it by the sword." Neither clause in that doctrine is true, but it is repeated as a form of ritual by nearly every English newspaper in India, and many newspapers and other authorities at home. The idea of violence is thus promulgated throughout the Indian Empire by a Press which incorrectly represents the best aspects and tendencies of British rule. Indians are falsely taught by many of our representatives to believe that there is no relation between us and them but the military advantage of ruler over ruled. For generations it has been the fashion for Anglo-Indians to laugh at a submissive spirit in native India. If Indians are found to meet the taunt of cowardice with cruel outrage, we are not altogether free from blame, for we have supplied the retort which ill-balanced natures readily supply when they defend, or half defend, political murder. In a far happier vein runs the advice of a member of Lord Morley's India Council, quoted in the "Westminster Gazette" of last Tuesday. He warns the Viceroy not to listen to those who insist too much on "stern repressive measures":—

> "'Wherever you get the spread of education,' he says, 'there also you find agitation and discontent. Do we not see this here in England? And what would happen if, instead of arguing these matters quietly, you were to fine and imprison your labour agitators and leaders of independent thought?'"

But, serious as outbreaks of violence are, it is the ultimate cause at the back of violence to which we must look. From the Extremist party Indians hear the counsels of despair—despair of England's justice, of her belief in self-government, of her zeal for liberty. The question of all others before us now is whether, by a wise and generous reform or enlargement of our Indian administration, we will cut the ground from under the Extremists' feet. We shall not content them. But, as Lord Morley said at Arbroath last October, it would be the height of political folly to refuse to do all we can to rally the Moderates to our cause. And if it be said, as it is now being said every day, that Orientals do not understand concessions, and believe in no power except the sword, we would reply with a passage from the same speech, one of the most courageous of recent reflections on Indian government:—

> "We are not Orientals. That is the root of the matter. We are representatives, not of Oriental civilisation, but of Western civilisation, of its methods, its principles, its practices, and I, for one, will not be hurried into an excessive haste for repression by the argument that Orientals do not understand this toleration."

The views of men like Mr. Gokhale, the leader of the largest and most powerful reform party among his people, represent a line of contact between Lord Morley's principles and the native movement in India. They include a practicable modification of the Partition of Bengal, perhaps a re-arrangement of the whole country into seven governorships, certainly the admission of Indians upon the Executive Councils, and the concession of real power to the elected Indian members of the Legislative Councils, especially in finance. They open up a scheme of universal education, gradually extending to the villages, and an essential reform of the police—the black spot in Indian administration. Reforms such as these are at least vital and full of hope. We wish we could say the same of the changes proposed by Simla last year for criticism, and now again submitted, we believe, together with the remarks of Sir Herbert Risley, unhappily one of the least sympathetic of Anglo-Indian officials on the Viceroy's Council. Surely at such a moment it is our business to listen to the counsels of hope and moderation, to lead native India away from the dangerous spirits which are beginning to misdirect her, and back to a faith in the capacity and generosity of our own Government.

THE FRONTIER WAR.

Two months ago we were all congratulating Mr. John Morley (as he then was) on the prompt termination of his first frontier war. It is a much more anxious problem which Lord Morley of Blackburn has to face to-day. He has chosen to wrestle alone with the risks and the anxieties. There may be a war party in Cabul; there is certainly a war party in Simla. Handled with firmness and forbearance, this second frontier episode may prove to be no more serious than the first—a mere local conflict, which is, indeed, already virtually ended. Left to the management of the military party in India, it might commit us, within a few weeks or days, to an Afghan war. The issue lies between Lord Morley and Lord Kitchener, and in this conflict of wills public opinion can intervene with difficulty. The news is obscure, the facts disputed, and the India Office has taken the extreme step of refusing to answer questions in the Commons. If there were a cable between London and Cabul the motives for this reticence would be intelligible, but in the absence of any rapid communications with Afghanistan, it is difficult to explain a secrecy which sets a precedent fatal to any claim of Parliament and public opinion to influence the issues of peace and war.

The present trouble appeared, at the outset, to be like the affair with the Zakka Khels an ordinary incident of frontier police. The Mohmands, a numerous but not conspicuously warlike tribe, which inhabits the No Man's Land north of the Cabul River, had for some time been restive and predatory. There was talk of a punitive expedition when suddenly they took the offensive. Brigandage in such cases is usually a declaration of war. The tribe robs because it is angry; robbery, in short, is a symptom rather than a motive of unrest. What the precise cause of discontent of the Mohmands was we do not know. Sir J. B. Lyall, who writes with unique authority, has suggested, in a letter to the "Times," that it was probably distrust of our motives in surveying a route for a new railway along the Cabul River. Behind that immediate grievance there is an older and more serious discontent. The Durand frontier line broke up the Mohmand tribe, leaving one-half of it in Afghanistan and subjecting the other to British suzerainty, though not to direct British administration. The Mohmands have always resented this arrangement as hotly as the Bengalis resented the partition of their province. The next phase of the affair was the marching of a force of "Afghans" across the frontier. It is in two bodies, under priestly leaders, and is variously estimated at from nine to twenty thousand men. The news would have sounded less alarming if the public had realised that these "Afghans" are in reality Mohmand tribesmen who are simply taking part in the clan's feud against the Indian Government. They probably consider themselves Mohmands first and Afghans afterwards. The European idea of a national state has little meaning in the East. The clan is a reality, and so is the allegiance due to Islam, when a holy war is preached. These hillmen probably thought of their quarrel as an affair of Mohmand against British and Moslem against Christian. It may not have entered their minds that they might be involving the Amir in a quarrel with his suzerain. In any event, the military consequences of this incursion were almost ludicrously slight. The raiders won no successes. They failed to rouse the Afridis, and even the Zakka Khels remained loyal. The invasion, such as it was, has been repelled, and its leaders discredited.

In all this situation there was nothing novel. During the Chitral affair, and again in the Tirah campaign, Afghan subjects from over the faint border-line assisted their kinsmen against us. Indeed, as the "Times" points out, the call to arms was openly preached in 1897 as far inland as Jalalabad. Why is it, then, that the present affair is regarded so gravely? The Simla correspondent of the "Times" has even gone so far as to say that we are already waging an "unofficial war against Afghanistan." The haste of Simla to declare "unofficial war" is of all the untoward circumstances the most suspicious. The reasons for suspecting that the Amir has connived at this invasion—if, indeed, he did not inspire it—are mainly these: (1) That he was recently at Jalalabad, and may still be there, within easy reach of the Khyber and the zone of disturbance; (2) that he has not yet condescended to sign the clauses of the Anglo-Russian Treaty relating to Afghanistan; and (3) that large quantities of arms have recently been imported into his dominions.

Another parallel line of suspicion is suggested by Dr. Winter, lately the Amir's physician, who has just arrived in London. Her theory is that the Amir Halibullah is really friendly, but that his younger brother, Nasrullah, is vehemently anti-British, and has directly inspired recent events. Mrs. Winter's authority may not be first-rate, but the latter part of this suggestion at least coincides with the little that is known about the Afghan Court. The present Amir and his late father were highly polygamous, and the Court is a nest of rival mothers and intriguing brothers. Some of these women are of the lurid Oriental type which rejoices to maim or murder rival beauties with its own hands, and their sons are bred in a tradition which regards wholesale fratricide as the normal method of securing a tranquil reign. The Amir Halibullah is reported to be a weak and indolent personality, as vain as he is malleable. His brother, Nasrullah, on the contrary, is energetic, intelligent, and ambitious.

He is at once soldier and priest, has qualified as a reader of the law, and is the commander of the army. With the clergy and the soldiery behind him he may well be the real master of Afghanistan. So long ago as 1905 he was decidedly chauvinistic, and the Dane Mission ascribed its disappointing achievements to his intrigues. So much was already known. Mrs. Winter's further information that Nasrullah Khan is now under Turkish influence is perhaps the most ominous aspect of the situation. One hopes that Mrs. Winter is not mistaken in supposing that the Amir is at bottom our friend. For, unfortunately, a good deal has happened recently to try the friendship of the vain ruler of a notoriously suspicious race. We have refused to allow him to imitate the Shahs of Persia by making a European tour, and refused his request to appoint a representative in London. The Dane Treaty of 1905 referred to him as "His Majesty," the "independent King" of Afghanistan. The Anglo-Russian Treaty degraded him to the status of "His Highness" the Amir. The whole tendency of these indications, slight enough to the Occidental mind, must have been to make him suspect that our suzerainty was tightening, and his independence dwindling. Worst of all he was not consulted before the Anglo-Russian Treaty was signed, and then, as if to emphasise his insignificance, he was bidden to set his seal to a document that had been drafted over his head. He saw his neighbour, Persia, divided into spheres of influence. He saw the traditional rivalry between Russia and Great Britain, which had always seemed to be the one security for Afghan independence, suddenly disappear. One can well believe that the chauvinistic faction in Cabul has increased its influence, and that the Amir himself, a weak man, may for a time have been powerless to resist it.

Such is the case against the Amir—a case resting mainly on conjecture and suspicion. At the worst it argues the need of vigilance. In any event, it should suggest the wisdom of forbearance, for the conduct of affairs on our side has been far from tactful, and at several points calculated to inspire suspicion. The Amir knows that behind these seemingly careless affronts to his royal dignity lie certain real projects—the construction of railways into the heart of Afghanistan among them. It is no part of a Liberal policy to menace his independence, yet we have seemed, if not to threaten it, at least to clip it, and to detract from its dignity. The case for war, even for "unofficial war," is much weaker than it was in 1897, in his father's time. At the worst we have means of making our displeasure felt much less inconvenient to ourselves than war. It is open to us, for example, to stop the Amir's monthly subsidy. The only objection to that method is that it would bring neither prestige nor promotion to the military party in Simla. An Afghan war is merely unthinkable at a moment when famine and terrorism in India are already making reform sufficiently difficult. Even if we have reason to suspect the Amir's goodwill, it is not to our interest, in the absence of any direct provocation, to unchain an imperial disaster by inquiring too closely into his omissions and his whims.

Life and Letters.

THE TRADE IN FICTION.

The romantic nature of our people is nowise better shown than in their attitude towards literature and the fine arts. Their delight is to shake off the materialism of life, and to enter an enchanted garden where the golden fruits of genius ripen in a day for any one who will to pluck, without any practised toil of cultivation. As with the works of art, so with their makers. No revelations of cynical biography, not even the brutalities of the law courts, dispel the glamour of miracle and mystery in which the popular imagination wraps even the meaner operations of the artistic spirit. It has been a common and by no means a pointless gibe that a poet or a musician holds his strength, like Samson, in his uncut hair, and it is felt that a genius in a cutaway coat and a bowler hat is somehow sinning against the ritual of his sacred calling. What the ordinary concert-goer or picture buyer feels is felt more confidently and more mystically by the literate shop-girl or the emotional young clerk whose soaring spirit seeks its chief food in cheap serial fiction. In this public still survives the full faith in the free creative life of literature, where a poet "does but sing because he must," a painter is sleepless till he has transferred his vision to the canvas, and the blessed novelist lives in a world peopled by personages belonging to a higher state of life than "that to which it has pleased God to call"—us.

To these gentle readers we feel that a real injury is done by such tearing of the veil as occurred last week, when "Rita" got a hundred guineas damages from a journalist company for maltreating the offspring of her imagination. That the showman should thus thrust one grimy hand on to the puppet stage, while with the other he shamelessly shakes the plate for pennies, is nothing else than profanation. We feel disposed to cry out in our distress, "Do not insist on telling us just how it is done; we do not want to know what skirt-hand worked at Miranda's dress, or who put on Ferdinand's flowing locks. Least of all do we desire to see the composite author squabbling among himself over the takings after the performance is over. Leave us to enjoy our miracle play in peace."

But for those curious souls who insist on peeping behind the scene, the "Rita" trial supplied some interesting facts and still more interesting speculations—artistic and ethical. Every fine art tapers down into a craft, and every craft into a factory industry. We suspect this always has been so, that painters and sculptors must always have had their train of copyists and their mechanic underlings, while the notorious "business" incompetence of writing man has enabled publisher or printer to run some sort or size of servile workshop. Even in the higher grades of literary production the "tied" author, turning out the most elevated sort of copy to order for a dictatorial business manager privileged to chop and change to fit the market, is no new phenomenon. It is only the scale of operations and the intricacy of the business mechanism that is new. A huge sub-divided reading public has come into existence in a generation with a voracious maw, and with an "effective demand" for strong-tasting, sensational romance. Town dwellers, growing up in orderly masses in frightfully dull surroundings, engaged in a steady, uninteresting grind for an uneventful livelihood, just educated up to a rude taste for verbal finery and an avid but utterly untrained fancy, are putting out an immense demand for cultural condiments, the pickles, jam, sardines, and ginger beer of intellectual life. Hence the huge organisation of which the Harmsworth press, though not the pioneer, is perhaps the cheapest instance. Cheap, showy slices are served out on the stalls of daily and weekly newspapers; old masterpieces are shortened, renamed, and smartened up for sixpenny series; little libraries of "new" fiction are everywhere in preparation. There is something very natural in this trade, something almost Elizabethan in the announcement of "a splendid love story, throbbing with the realities of life; the best story she has ever written. It deals with the loves, fears, jealousies, and hates of real people."

Observe the feigned claim of reality Real people, real incidents, real passions, are not actually wanted, are not given, would not sell. But the trade is fully alive to the artifice. Every story must be "real" in the sense in which it must be "new," respectable, and, at the same time, sense-alluring. The sort of meaning to be attached to these terms is naïvely indicated by the defence in the "Rita" case. It was not there denied that the story which appeared first as "The Sinner," afterwards as "The Grinding Mills of God," and finally in serial form as "Katie Thorne," was in substance unaltered, though in its latest shape it was advertised as "new." But "new," it was explained, was used "in a conventional and loose sense."

There is something terribly callous in the view of the creative function of the novelist, to which even so successful a parent as Mr. Le Queux commits himself, in maintaining that "an editor might do exactly as he liked in cutting down his stories." Another expert, Mr. Kernahan, makes an interesting distinction between a book which is "matter for art" and a serial which is "matter for the mart," and which must therefore be dealt with "in a serial way." It is this "serial way" which takes us into the recesses of the fiction factory. There we are confronted with the most approved economics of division of labor, and the primitive "author" is reduced to his proper place as the furnisher of raw material to be worked up by a series of "processes" into marketable commodities. In the elaborated factory the preliminary work is given out: it consists in plot-making, plot-faking, or plot-filching. It is no secret what those shabby, broken-down old searchers in the British Museum or other libraries are after, with their rows of volumes of "Keepsakes," or "Garlands," or other early nineteenth century repositories. They are resurrectionists, grubbing the bones of skeletons from the graveyards of fiction, to be pieced together, refleshed, and reclothed with modern incidents and atmosphere, and once more put upon the market But the plot-finder is not confined to graveyards; the kaleidoscope of current history furnishes new incident for the requisite distortion, coloration, and adulteration of popular romance; the law courts, the worlds of politics, "society," even of business, when they have undergone the preliminary treatment of journalism, are already apt for use. After a plot is found, it may be turned over to a "developer," then pass to the "composer," who actually writes the story, afterwards going for further treatment to a "finisher," who hands it to the editor for a last twist. For the market is a various one and many lines of goods are wanted; the same article must be made up in several sizes and qualities for different sorts of readers. A "splendid love story," throbbing with reality, must be given differently in a full-blooded novelette and in a magazine intended "for a pious child of fifteen." Even names are matter for nice trade discrimination. "Katie Thorne" was "a simple and pretty English name more suitable for this journal than Nellie Nugent." Then, too, when a story is serialised, skilled cutting must be accompanied by a doctoring of the wounds. Nor is this all. Each instalment requires for its ending "an emotional explosion," which, if it is not there already, must be found, because it is obviously necessary to carry the passion of the reader over the time-span between two instalments.

Such is the sordid background to the most characteristic and the most influential of our literary arts. Not even the liberty of the greatest artist is secure, for we learn from his own lips that Mr. Clement Shorter has "cut" a story of Robert Louis Stevenson. But perhaps, as was freely suggested by other literary witnesses, we are all too squeamish and unduly precious in our regard for any sort of written word. If Shakespeare can bear such rude handling and survive, why raise such outcries about minor acts of mutilation? The representation of authors as innocent sheep dumb before their shearers is not wholly just or reasonable. If the "high art" of literature desires to sever itself from the trade, it can do so—in a measure, and at a price. In prose fiction, at any rate, a great writer can make a livelihood without becoming a base mechanic, and without handing over the fruits of his genius to the masterful middleman to be put in cold storage, trimmed and doctored for six separate markets. But, if he is eager to make money, he must put himself into the hands of a successful merchant, and do as he is told.

It is the same with every art, and we confess we have no great sympathy with the painter whose early visions and enthusiasms fade before the wiles of the dealer, and who paints the portraits of the vulgar great in order that he himself may live in their society; or with the novelist who, being capable in his own judgment of great things, yet decides to sell his fictive soul to a syndicate. So incalculably great is the harm done by any sort of bad art that we are disposed to say that no one has a right to practise such abuse of any talent he possesses. Moreover, we believe that a sound, genuine public feeling upholds this view, and that when men of high literary or artistic talent complain, as they often do, that they are compelled to prostitute their gifts for gain, they get more popular contempt than sympathy.

AN EARTHLY PARADISE.

"To England God has given the dominion of the sea, to France the dominion of the land, to Germany of the air." How amazing the splendid irony of Jean Paul's boast appears to us now! It is barely a century since he uttered it. The words take us back to that dear land of aerial contemplation, where philosophers in high-pitched attics brooded day and night over the Thing in Itself, where poets wrote each other stout volumes of letters on the metaphysic of nursery rhymes, where youths haunted moonlit ruins with romantic shudders, and maidens with languishing eyes sought the Blue Flower of intangible passion. There stood the little villages with brown-tiled roofs and wooden rafters. Round them confidingly clustered the forests of formal little trees, like the curly firs in oval boxes of toy farmyards. There walked the goats and cows, whose horns get entangled in the curly branches; there labored the men and women, meek and peaceful as their toy similitudes; and there the friendly stork brought the babies over the snow.

Hardly a century has gone, and what a different Germany it is that makes the flesh of the "National Review" to creep, and holds the members of the Navy League awake and trembling through the night watches! Out of that visionary dominator of the air has grown a ravening monster, who grips the land and threatens the sea, whose mailed teeth crunch the bones of men from China to the Cameroons, whose iron crest, looming upon our Eastern offing, surpasses the summer's serpent in perpetuated and recurrent terror. In place of the soughing of wind upon the forest and the fevered brow, we hear the trampling of two million solid men in arms. In place of the languishing eyes that sought the Blue Flower we behold the searchlights of a hundred "Dreadnoughts" seeking a blue estuary where they may vomit their accursed spawn upon our holy shores. Thou hast conquered, O man of blood and iron! From the dominion of the air this is a change indeed.

It is not with poor Mr. Maxse's nightmare that Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick deals in her large but pleasant book upon "Home Life in Germany" (Methuen). Here she is concerned with the lesser things of daily existence that are supposed to occupy a woman's attention more than man's. She speaks of them as the insignificant trifles that make the common round of life, and, no doubt, when a man's mind is crowded up with battleships and army corps, there is not much room for what German ladies call "the great Wash." But to us who hope to preserve some kind of sanity, even when the Kiel Canal is widened, the subject of Mrs. Sidgwick's book is far from trifling or insignificant. Setting genius and spiritual things aside, we may in the household best examine the essential qualities of a race. If we were clever enough we might very likely there discover a good deal about genius and spiritual things as well. The philosopher has always been fond of saying, "Show me a man's friends, books, clothes, or something of that kind, and I will show you the man himself." We may fear that the philosopher is not the person to show us anything, but to the list of things that reveal the man or the race we may just as well add the kitchen, the bedroom, and the public-house.

It is true that German provinces differ widely in habit and temperament. In spite of uniform regulations and all the cheers for unity, the differences go on subsisting. Due to climates and past history, they are deep in the blood as nationality itself, and no race bred on wine will ever coalesce with the race of beer; no Bavarian who has snuffed the Tyrol will claim kinship with the serf who plods East Prussian mire. The differences of manner are almost as violent, the sentiment almost as hostile and aloof, as between the four or five races that people our own islands; and even the differences of blood are only a little less marked. Yet through them all there runs a character that we call emphatically German, and Mrs. Sidgwick, being of German parentage herself, though she prefers to regard herself as an Englishwoman ("naturally," as Englishwomen would say), has been able to live in various parts of her fatherland with complete understanding, and to show us the essential habits of a common stock.

She takes us note by note through the whole gamut of life among the middle-classes and the poor. To one who has lived in a small German town, it may seem strange that she has omitted royalty and the aristocracy; for he will remember the inexhaustible discussions on Grand Dukes and Princesses, and how shamelessly he tried to satisfy the curiosity about his personal knowledge of England's King and royal family. But for all that, the German aristocracy has less influence upon the common affairs of life than our own, and Mrs. Sidgwick is right in keeping most of her book for the people of "moderate incomes," the small professional households, the "educated classes," among whom, in all civilised nations, the special characteristics of a race are most easily seen. So she takes us through the whole thing—the common experience of this class between birth and death—from the baby in its "cushion," through the stages of boy and girl, student and "Backfisch," man and wife, servants, shopping, family meals, games, arts, watering-places, and beer, up to the apotheosis of a desirable residence in Berlin. It is a major scale, and it ends satisfactorily with a common chord. There is something, direct, orderly, and healthy—what the Germans call kerngesund—about it all. On the whole, Germany would have a right to pride herself, even if she did not so frequently take the right. She has aimed at certain results and gained them.

To put it quite grossly, we think the German of the middle and lower-middle classes gets more for his money than the Englishman of the same standing. As far as mere knowledge goes, he gets a better education. His health is more scientifically watched, his body more scientifically developed. When he marries, his home is more comfortable, his wants more carefully attended to, his cheap cigars superior. He gets goose more often for dinner, and he gets other sauces than the paste called "melted butter." His clothes are always mended, and usually clean; so are his children's. His wife is serviceable, admiring, quietly affectionate, and so thrifty that she pockets the sugar for him at a café. His being is pervaded by a kind of spiritual Gemüthlichkeit. From childhood to old age he can drink beer with safety and economy, and for the price of a glass in an artificial garden can have excellent music thrown in. At any of the numerous small capitals and university towns he can count on a good library and a theatre where classic masterpieces and modern experiments are to be seen for next to nothing in quick succession. Once a year he can take a "cure" in earth, air, water, sun, mud, odours, or any other element he chooses. And when at last he can keep alive no more, all his relations and friends will express their deep-hearted lamentations by an advertisement in the local paper half a column long.

One cannot do all that in England at the price. We are not speaking of the poor or even of the artisan classes; but, in spite of her growing riches and rising standard of life, Germany is still the Paradise of moderate means. She is a Paradise, too, in which it is almost impossible to go wrong. As in her own forests, there are guide-posts at every turn, and different coloured stripes are painted on the trees guiding you in accordance with pre-arranged directions. The paths are constructed in easy gradients and neatly kept. Here a notice requests you to spare the beauties of nature; there a notice calls on you to admire a specially charming view; and it is hard to miss your way to the nearest "restauration," where beer flows like water, and, indeed, for sixpence they will turn you on a waterfall as well. In the towns the police will take care that you are in no doubt as to your own identity. They will take care that no flower-pot falls on your head from a neighbour's sill, that the sweet girl opposite practises her music on a summer's noon with the window shut, and that the string with which your enemy's wife leads her lap-dog in the public gardens is short. They will take care that your servant-maid's book registers every fault she has ever committed, and that the applications for your kindly assistance are investigated upon the sternest principles of the Charity Organisation Society. Pedagogic specialists will see that your baby's toys are designed for graduated intellectual improvement. Psychological specialists will submit your children to mental vivisection from year to year. At Christmastide your wife will drag a goose from market by a string, slaughter it in the back garden, and serve it up with stewed plums, before she lays her tearful cheek upon your shoulder in a passion of humble Wehmuth beside the lighted Christmas-tree, and thanks God you still tolerate her because she has the mind of a cook and keeps the linen straight.

"O my brothers," as the gipsy used to say, why should we suffocate any more? Where is that old grandmother Liberty whom Heine heard whispering strange, sweet tales of freedom into the ears of youth? Does the wind no longer blow upon the heath? Is there not somewhere a woman who sounds the horn of the wild old forest?

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

I.—THE SPRING WIND.

Under the daisy's little shadow on the short turf lie the rusty grains of withered catkins. Over them the daisy's head bends southwards to drink of the hot sun face to face. Imperceptibly its disc follows the sun to the west as the day declines. Looking from the sun's glory back to the flower's white rays, one sees that, though she is dependent on him for her life, both he and she are equal in nature's sight. Suns are being extinguished there, beyond the veil: here at hand the sap is rushing up beneath the tough bark.

Around the great horizon sweeps the savage wind, roaring up the hill, shivering through gorse and dried grasses, and whirling far the oak scrub's withered leaves. But in the sunshine from the trembling hazel buds gleams the pale transparency of the green spring. When the hard, grey clouds, fleeting from the north-west, hide the sun's face, everything shivers in the icy wind, and, under the wild cherry snow lies patching the ground ivy.

Not yet has the cherry unfolded its white petals, tightly held by the brown-green sepals, but marvellous are the male and female blossoms of the ash, set high in heavy bunches against the white cumuli clouds gigantic in the heavens, and greener than the fields' herbage are the feathering larches swaying in slender companies against the blue.

This is the song of the spring—life struggling up out of death, death dragging life down, and the killing of weary and aged things by frost, by shattering winds, by freezing rain and hail, the weak and old and feeble being beaten down without mercy, perishing off the earth's face under the restless onslaught of the spring. You hear it at night in the deep triumphant roar of the firs in the hurrying gale. Myriads of small creatures, in the outrageous blasts, are perishing out there in the iron fields, and within the near cottages both young and old are fading out of life, the ailing babe that cannot move its mouth towards the mother's breast, and the aged, bedridden woman laboring for her scant breath. And the wind never ceases, the insolent, clamouring wind of spring, loud in the tree-tops, coursing over the land's face, filling the immense heavens with its song of mastery—a sweeping sea of sound and conflict, of spring's renovation and destruction.

On the edge of the hill-road, sheltered from the wind by two protecting gorse bushes, an old villager, long past his work, sits day after day, brought there by some friendly hand to gaze over the great weald. In all but the worst weathers every morning finds him at his post till sundown, his back propped against the bank, wrapped in a heavy frieze coat, the gift of an old farmer dead and gone. Bodily he is still hale, but his mind is in its second childhood, smoothed clean of thought and memory after the stress of seventy odd years. And his shaking treble, piping back broken words to the passers who hail him, are addressed in the same key to all alike. All faces and voices come now to him from far off, now stirring, now dropping away into the inner misty vacancy that holds him. Only his dim eyes rest perpetually upon the great weald stretching there before him, as though its hamlets and farms, its ploughlands and brooklands, its holts and hills and shaws were strange to him now that all the people of his world are dead and gone.

High on a twig of an oak sapling, a few feet from the old man, a finch sits and shrills out the defiant call of the spring. The sunlight is obscured; a thick belt of dark, spreading vapour is flying rapidly up from the north-west. Like an arrow the finch darts down the hill, with three swerving wing-beats flashing from sight. The wind roars round the hill-crest, and, with the freshening gusts, across the valley, slants the grey veil of driving snow.

II.—THE JOYOUS MAN.

He came bustling along in the shadow of the wall, in the darkest hour of the very early morning, his right arm swinging in tune with his step, his left moving stiffly. He was very small, little more than five feet in all, and a long, shapeless coat, tattered at the sleeves, hung loosely round his tiny body, reaching well below his knees. When I called him, and he came briskly to my side, I saw that he wore only three garments, the long coat, his trousers, and a buttonless linen shirt, filthy and discoloured, which showed his bare breast, and was only gathered in, in some ragged foldings, below it. In the shadow his figure seemed sinister, but when he approached, and I also saw his face, it expressed only alacrity and willingness to please. He was highly coloured, with the countryman's bloom on his cheek like slightly withered apples, and his eyes were dark and full of light. But what fixed my attention, so that I could not for one moment withhold my gaze from him, was the look of joy which illumined each feature. His eyes smiled, his mouth smiled, and the whole face was radiant, so that the red cheeks seemed faded in comparison with this inward light.

"Where are you going?" I said.

"To the City," he answered, and his voice and gesture, like the rapid, swinging gait which had first drawn me to him, bespoke a man who had regular duties, in an office, which were agreeable to him, and called for punctuality.

"To sleep?" I said.

He nodded. "The Embankment," and smiled again.

"Why do you hold your arm like that?" I said, pointing to the limb which hung down.

"It's the rheumatics. Damp days it's something cruel, but this weather suits me all right, guv'nor."

"What's your business?"

"Gas-fitter. I'm a good tradesman, but this" (propping the left arm with the right) "does me."

He had had a month in hospital. How had he lived since his discharge? Well, he had "had a bit here and there."

"Any friends?"

"I've a sister, guv'nor, if I knew erzackly where to put my 'and on 'er." He waved his free arm cheerfully in the direction of North London. Some twenty years ago, it appeared, his sister had lived there. He seemed quite sure of finding her, if he wanted her.

"Are you a Socialist?" I asked, having nothing else to say.

"I'm a bit of a Socialist," and he spoke as a man who had reasoned things out, "but they ain't consistent enough fur me. I heerd one in the park. No more workhouses, says he. Then where's the poor man to go to? Not that I always hold with the rich—there's good and there's bad. I s'pose you can't always make your money honest, guv'nor; you've to say something. But they don't 'ave it all their own way. Now, there's Rothschild. 'E wanted a gold gate to 'is 'ouse in 'Ide Park, and a sentry with fixed bay'net to walk in front. But Guvm't wouldn't allow it. It's a cert, guv'nor." And his face beamed; all was right with the world.

"Do you know of a lodging-house?" I said.

"There's a 'ouse in Vauxhall," he replied. (Vauxhall was three miles off.)

He swung into his quick step again, like a little French soldier in a regimental march. I gazed after him. He turned and smiled, and his face wore the same expression of mysterious, incommunicable joy.

THE RUSH FOR THE SUN.

The cynic may deny the existence of the sun, or, at any rate, that it has been lately in evidence. It does not follow, however, that because the human observer cannot find one spot in the clouds more illumined than another or a darker shadow of himself on one side than on any other that there are not X-rays and Y-rays and Z-rays of very real import darting here and there throughout the animal and vegetable kingdom. If we will lower the umbrella and condescend to look at the trees or the annual flowers of the earth, we shall be struck by the fact that this gloomy season of wet, varied with false promises of what we call fine, is very good growing weather. The horse chestnut has lifted its drooping fans and spread them out, so that already there is more leaf than sky to be seen as we look up. The tiny leaves of the elm daily, almost hourly, look less babyish, and beneath them the thick fool's parsley comes to the knees. It is springing up with a verve that looks like an ambition to overtop the elms. But that cannot be done in one year, even by the fool's parsley, and the glance of a perfect stranger would be enough to show that it is but an annual. With hollow stalks for strength and lightness, of brittle material for cheapness and speed of construction, strengthened with angular ribs of tougher fibre for safety, the umbel-bearing plants of which this is the commonest representative, press up very efficiently for their brief annual revel in the sun. The multiplicity of their species, one of the chief bewilderments of the young botanist, shows how well the system has paid for millions and millions of generations.

Everything, from the lordliest tree to the humblest creeping plant (during its little period of flowering) presses heavenward—that is, straight for the zenith. This though the sun is scarcely ever in that quarter of the sky, and only for an hour or two in the whole middle month of the year. The household plant usually, though not always, strives to get out of the nearest window. We can understand that as a groping after light which is the essential stimulant of its green laboratory, but the attitude of the tree in the plain seems more like a spiritual aspiration—a desire to get, by the most direct way, out of this wicked world and into a better. It is not so, however. The grass and the fool's parsley and the trees are tip-toeing to look over one another's heads at the sun as he wanders round the horizon; fighting against the overshadowing of a neighbour that would cut off any ray, however early or however late; striving for the dominance that will enable the winner to spread his branches right over the sky space of the loser, kill him, and get his root area as well. Some are more cruel and selfish (in their probably blind way) than others; some less eager for battle, and with a more gentle or cunning way of getting their own. The snowdrop and the crocus avoid fuss and bitterness by coming very early. There is very little fighting for the sun of January and February, which, for the sake of peace, they consider good enough for them. Long ago they finished their summer, and the annual armageddon will rage above their tomb. Observe, on the other hand, the tactics of the daisy—one of the flowers most beloved by the poets. Disdaining the challenge of the grass to a fair and friendly race, it spends the bulk of its days in a spreading movement, a stifling of rival growth in babyhood under a rosette of flat, earth-clinging leaves, from which its "wee, crimson-tippit" flowers rise to a leisurely enjoyment of a solitude that serves it for peace.

More round-about, in several senses of the word, is the method by which the hop and many other climbing plants secure heaven. The climbing of a stick may seem an easy matter, when the stick has been obligingly put just in the right place by the self-interested farmer. The intelligence, or whatever it be, of the hop is better seen when there is no stick to remind it by a touch that heaven can be won by a spiral as well as by a straight line. You can then see the shoot of the plant set about finding the core of its spiral, if there be one, by methods similar to the finding of its way home by a carrier pigeon, the hunting of a hound for a lost trail, or the search of a man round a central spot for an object he thinks he has left thereabout. After rising just above the ground, the hop shoot bends at right angles, and then the horizontal portion sweeps a slow circle through all the points of the compass, growing as it revolves. The second circle has necessarily a longer radius than the first, and each of the others covers more ground than the last. At the height of its speed the circle is accomplished in a little over two hours, and at about the thirty-sixth revolution Darwin found that another plant of similar habits swept a circle sixteen feet in circumference at a speed, for the tip of the shoot, of thirty-three inches an hour. Such energy and such singleness of method is sure to be rewarded. A straight clamber towards the light might miss many uprights by a mere inch, so might semi-circular oscillations towards the south. But our hop secures vertical advantage by systematic horizontal gropings, gains the light by exploring the dark, goes north in order to come south.

A bramble bush in the first hill field was woven all over last summer with the graceful leaves and prettily coloured fruit of the mandrake. All that tapestry has long since disappeared, and now the bush is greening with its legitimate blackberry buds. But through the heart of it is rushing up again a sheaf of bryony shoots, racing neck and neck, each with its tendrils ready for a cast round any support that may be worth lassoing. Already there are tendrils that have caught something, and others that have outlived their capacity and caught nothing. Both have coiled themselves into spirals, the unsuccessful ones into long corkscrew ringlets, with coils all running one way, the others with a turn or two to the right, then a turn or two to the left. The support is thus drawn tight up to the plant, but not too tight. The bryony is anchored to the bush with spring cables that give and fetch when the wind shakes its world, and thus it rides out the fiercest gale. Again the bush and the pollard ash above it will be festooned with that exquisite pattern of vine-like leaves and round berries in green and lemon and crimson.

The bitter-sweet, also rushing up to the sun as a harmless parasite, is a sheer extemporiser by comparison with the bryony, yet it manages to ramble through the tallest hedge and take the best of the sun for the ripening of its egg-shaped fruit. When needs must, it will grow into a tolerable bush, but it very much prefers to lean and scramble on others. The hop can only wind from left to right, the bean only from right to left, but this arab of the bush is Jack of both twists though master of neither. It is without tendrils or leaves that can hold on, yet few flowers are more common than its poisonous looking potato-like blossoms. Higher in the scale of extempore climbers is the traveller's joy, now sprouting from its high woody tangles for fresh excursions through our English jungles. Either leaf of any of its pairs can curl its stalk round a twig. The thrill of the touch is communicated throughout the fathoms of wiry, dead-looking stem, and the community generously supplies the self-appointed grabber for empire with extra nourishment. The leaf-stalk swells and toughens as it strains to its new task, and is granted as its guerdon the immortality that belongs to a branch, for when in autumn the other leaves fall off, our friend who has grasped something remains at his post. The dependent life after all is a strenuous life. Of all woody plants, the honeysuckle is the first in leaf. The battle among the groundlings is now almost at its height, while the lordly self-supporting trees that fought their war long ago as saplings or seedlings among the lilliputian grass, open the leaves of their maturity very much at their leisure. Theirs is only the civil strife of leaf against leaf, and as the spoils in any case belong to the community, it is comparatively indifferent as to the period that the war shall cover.

Letters from Abroad.

THE TWO HEADS OF THE FREISINN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The May issue of the "Neue Rundschau" contains two articles from German progressive politicians of mark. On one page Dr. Friedrich Naumann tells the story of the passing of German Liberalism, with an outlook on its chances of regeneration; on another Dr. Theodore Barth, in a monthly review of political events, strikes the balance of the relationship between the Bülow bloc and the Freisinn.

There is some sort of symbolic significance in the juxtaposition of the two articles. THE NATION has already referred to the secession of Dr. Barth and his following from the Freisinnige-Vereinigung—I hesitate to translate "Freisinnige" into "Radical." Now, at the same congress where Dr. Barth resolved to take a back seat, if seat at all, in the movement of more or less advanced Liberalism, Dr. Naumann came forward as the defender of its present policy. There are not many years since Herr Naumann, with a small band of friends and followers, played the part of the political Ishmaelite, whilst Dr. Barth was one of the most energetic leaders of a small but active parliamentary group. Now Barth has deliberately taken the part of the Ishmaelite, and Naumann is quite visibly pushing or winding forward to the leadership of the new party now in formation—the Liberal Party that is to be as the result of the amalgamation of the three "advanced" groups, and perhaps their re-union with the National Liberals.

This displacement of the two named politicians is a very characteristic phenomenon in the present evolution of political parties in Germany. There is not much, if any, personal rivalry between Dr. Naumann and Dr. Barth. Their ambitions, as well as their ideas, tend in directions too widely different to occasion personal competition. They represent two opposite poles of political thought—the opposites between which German Liberalism of to-day oscillates without finding its centre of gravity.

Dr. Barth, the elder of the two, entered political life as a Liberal of the old Free Trade school, and a thoroughgoing Free Trader he has remained ever since. He is one of the few uncompromising adherents of free exchange between the nations still to be found in Germany. But the Manchestrian notions, once so intimately connected with the Free Trade theory, he has to a great extent given up. He is even now far from being a State Socialist. He approaches questions of industrial legislation with less prejudice than in former years, but his preferences are with "free" movements. "One overlooks too easily," I read in one of his writings, "that the labor movement of our day turns not on benefactions, but on rights." This seems to me the very gist of his position in regard to Socialism. His mind is, in a high degree, the mind of a lawyer; he argues in the clear and logical method of the legalist, but without the dryness of the professional man. There is a delightful freshness about his speeches, and very little oratorial trash. In Parliament he was the best debater I ever met, quick, always to the point, and full of striking and witty parallels.

Friedrich Naumann is something of a rhetorician. He has still vestiges of the parson. As a clergyman he was, at first, an adherent of Herr Stoecker, the Conservative anti-Semitic Christian Socialist, but took to more advanced views, and became one of the leaders of the Left, or the young section of the Christian Socialist movement, until, in 1895, he severed his connection with that movement, and founded, together with Professor Sohm, Paul Jöhne and others, the Nationalsoziale Partei. They were a band of gifted men, not unlike the British Fabians in their views, but with higher flights of ambition. Whilst the Fabians contented themselves with being a club of propagandists, they strove at once to build up a new political party of their own colour—socialistic in economics, democratic in most questions of home politics, and imperialistic, in the fashion of the Primrose League, in foreign politics and the questions of armaments and colonial acquisition. Now, unlike the Fabians, they found at their start a strong and well disciplined Social Democratic Party already in existence, a party hardened in the school of persecution, and with popular and experienced leaders at its head. Under these circumstances the fate of the Nationalsoziale Partei was sealed from the outset. It came to nought. Twice they tried their luck at general elections, in 1898 and in 1903, but on both occasions Herr Naumann was beaten, and after the second experience the party was dissolved. Naumann and the majority of his friends then entered into a compact with the Freisinnige Vereinigung. Some preferred to remain outside any political party, and a few of still more advanced views joined the Social Democratic Party.

In a book, "Kaisertum und Demokratie," Herr Naumann explained in 1900 the ideas underlying his nationalistic socialism. The book exhibits him as a very ingenious and powerful writer, but a fanciful and even dangerously utopian politician. Expansion, economical and political, was, for Germany, the task of the time, and the Kaiser its executor. William II. would go with those who were ready to grant him the means for the execution of this mission, for he was fully alive to the necessities of the time and burning to act accordingly. The democratic parties had only to grant the armaments the Kaiser demanded, and they would tear him from the embrace of the squires and the other reactionary elements that clung to the throne to make its possessor their ally and managing clerk.

To an English reader, who is not well acquainted with German matters, all this might not seem quite a baseless speculation, and, undoubtedly, it contained a fragment of truth. But the deduction was all the more dangerous. An alliance between the Kaiser and the democracy can, in Germany, only be a passing apparition, unless one of the two be prepared to change character and essence altogether. The Kaiser is head of the Empire by being King of Prussia, and, as King of Prussia, he is, for many more reasons than the necessity for armaments, tied to the semi-feudal squirarchy. In his dream of a democratic Emperor, Herr Naumann quite forgot that William II., as King of Prussia, had in 1894 solemnly declared "that the nobles in opposition are in Prussia an 'absurdity' unless they have the King at their head." (Königsberg, September 6th, 1894.) In spite of all the squabbles between the King or the King's Ministers and the nobles, King and nobles hang together in Prussia, and will always be ready to make peace and combine against democracy as soon as the latter insists on a really democratic policy.

To some extent Herr Naumann seems to be cured of his illusions of eight years ago, but his speeches at the recent congress of the Freisinnige betray a similar frame of mind. If in 1900 he was prepared to sacrifice anything for the purpose of winning the Kaiser over to democracy, he is now ready to sacrifice a good many fundamental principles of democracy for the purpose of getting all sorts of capitalistic and progressive Liberals together into a big united Liberal Party. To ease his conscience he says that the sacrifice is only to be temporary. Pro tempore, Liberals and Radicals must join the Bülow bloc and submit to its requirements in order to gain strength and unity. This result once obtained, they are to turn round, seek the alliance of the Social Democrats, and with them smash the reactionary parties. In other words, Herr Naumann proposes to fight to-day in conjunction with the reactionaries, and to tell the Social Democrats, with a twinkle in the eye, not to mind, for it will soon be the turn of the Junkers. The plan is a little too ingenuous, and Dr. Barth is justified in reminding Herr Naumann of the fate of men who are dupes of their own ingenuity.

This Dr. Barth does in a pamphlet just published under the title "Der Freisiern im Block"—literally translated, "Radicalism in the Stocks," for "Block" in the German would originally bear this meaning. According to Dr. Barth the experience of the last three months has fully shown that the Liberal unity, as a bye-product of the Bülow bloc, will not promote the interest of Reform, but must of necessity end in subserviency to Reaction. Herr Barth is not opposed to compromise under any conditions. He is a man of strong convictions, but he is not a political doctrinaire. He is one of those Radicals who, in 1893, in opposition to the late Eugene Richter and his friends, were ready to grant Count Caprivi an increase of the army, and by this did split up the Freisinnige Party into the Populist Wing and the Freisinnige Union. But, he says, at that time the demanded increase was a part of a scheme of reform that reduced military service from three to two years, and to refuse it meant to do the work of the Junkers and the Bismarckians, who hated Caprivi because of his Liberal commercial policy, his opposition to the coercion of the Socialists, and his endeavours to reconcile the Poles. Indeed, if one turns back to the years of the Chancellorship of Caprivi, one will find that this straightforward soldier was overthrown because he was not enough of a jingo. The same Herr Harden who now poses as a saviour of his country because he has delivered some aristocrats, already fallen into disfavour, into the hands of the public prosecutor, this same man, as a scribe of the Bismarckian intriguers, denounced the conciliatory policy of Count Caprivi towards the Poles as a danger for Germany because it might offend the Tsar. He has good reason for jubilation. The Polish policy of Prince Bülow will nowhere be greeted with greater delight than in St. Petersburg.

You have already stated the fact that the refusal to censure the Parliamentary Members of the Freisinnige for voting the language clause of the Associations was the step that led Dr. Barth to resign his membership of the party. That policy is even more stupid than it is infamous. It will do the Poles, against whom it is directed, scarcely any harm; it will rather drive people into their political associations, and thus greatly assist the nationalistic propaganda. But whatever its political effects, its constitutional character is a violation of the principle of equal rights, and in acceding to it the Freisinnige have thrown over one of the fundamental principles of Liberalism. This, says Dr. Barth, shows a mental disposition equal to any further betrayal, and it must end in failure and disgrace. Naumann's policy, he continues, presumes an unscrupulousness of which he is incapable, and, consequently, can only end in bankruptcy.

In his turn Herr Naumann accuses Barth of being too much of a Liberal and too little of a Democrat; that is to say, too much of an individualist and too little of a disciplinarian. "His standpoint," he writes in a clever and politely worded article, "is not that of Rousseau, but that of the English Puritans and the first founders of the New England States. Unity is, in its essence, a democratic principle, a system based on the creation of a common will." There is some truth in this, but it is well known that if from Rousseau one road leads to Socialism, another leads, and has repeatedly in history led, to Bonapartism.

Strange, and even childish, as Herr Naumann's plan must appear to the English reader, it is but the national outcome of the confused state of political life in Germany. I have said that in Herr Naumann there is still a good deal of the ex-parson; but, at the same time, there is also a good deal of the student of Karl Marx and Friedrich Nietzsche. He is very firm in Marxian economics, and from Nietzsche, if not also from Marx, he has imbibed the "desire for power." In England he would be a strong Tory Democrat; in Germany there is no room for such a being in practical politics. Of Naumann's plan his new partisans only accept the fight against Socialists, and the Socialists, in their turn, judge it solely from this point of view. Herr Naumann believes himself more of a Socialist than Herr Barth, and would, perhaps, accept Socialist measures which the former may refuse. And yet, if to-day you could take a vote amongst German Social Democrats as to whom they prefer, Naumann or Barth, the overwhelming majority would poll for the latter.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

May 5th, 1908.

The Drama.

"THE GAY LORD QUEX."

IT is sometimes said in Mr. Pinero's praise that he can write anything. And that, in a sense, is quite true. His gifts are as various as the tangled show in a "curio" dealer's shop, where you may observe things in all styles, of all periods, of all countries, and by all sorts of artificers. So with Mr. Pinero. He will give you farce, extravaganza, comedy drama, comedy of manners, comedy of dress and fashion, problem play, what you will, and perform all, or nearly all, these feats of dexterity very well. But then, if you consider the subject of literary production, you discover that the faculty of insight which we call genius is by no means allied to this diversity of production, that the man who reflects to some purpose about the world does not possess it. Unity, rather than multiplicity, of form and conception is his characteristic.

Another characteristic of the great writer is seriousness. He is prepossessed about life. All that he studies, all that he even adapts from the forms of literature with which he is most familiar, or which he most admires, suggests some new light for his own meditations. Now, it is quite impossible to discern what Mr. Pinero thinks about anything, what, indeed, he is. He takes his subjects, the temperaments that he thinks suitable for treatment on the modern stage, and sets them off with the kind of furniture amid which he conceives that they move with ease and plausibility. And that seems enough for him. He is not concerned, or is not sufficiently concerned, with the men and women themselves. He does not seem to have made the discovery that human beings, at all times and in all dresses, are alike—that life is made in one grand piece, and that the pattern, with its infinite diversity of detail, has a key which he who looks closely enough (provided he has the right kind of eyes) is well able to discern. For this reason his types are mostly mechanical models, dressed to the mode, the literary or stage fancy of the hour. They are very amusingly constructed, artfully endowed, like an automatic chess-player, with motion and the semblance of reason. But they lack the essential qualities of flesh and blood.

Take, for example, his notorious and now rather faded "macaroni" play, "The Gay Lord Quex," which has just been revived as part of a series that will enable Sir John Hare to present the British public with some last dissolving views of his delightful art. Quex is a study of a rake—that time-honored stage subject—let me say, of a reformed or a reforming rake. Most great writers have treated it—Shakespeare in "Measure for Measure," Balzac in "La Cousine Bette," Maupassant in "Bel-Ami," Dickens in "David Copperfield," Tolstoy in "The Power of Darkness," Echagaray in "Don Juan," Stevenson in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." All handle it, are compelled by their natures and their knowledge of life to handle it, with seriousness—that is to say, for the instruction of the thoughtful and the warning of the light-minded, rather than for the entertainment of the curious. And all come to the conclusion about it which Burns records when he says that the deliberate and continuous pursuit of women makes men callous, as well as slavish, that > "it hardens a' within

> And petrifies the feeling."

What view does Mr. Pinero take of this kind of vanity in civilised existence? Does he agree with his and our teachers and predecessors? It is impossible to say, for he does not treat his "gay lord" as a problem in morals at all. Quex is first painted with some care as a man with a particularly lurid reputation. He is not even an average "man about town"; he has his nickname, his eminence. His young fiancée knows all about him. His hairs have grown grey in the service of pleasure; like a powdered footman, he wears his master's livery. But in speech, in action, and especially in Sir John Hare's bodily presentment of him, Lord Quex is set before us as a carefully schooled, exceptionally refined, well poised, diplomatic, phlegmatic Englishman. So far as I remember, Mr. Pinero has eliminated some passages in the earlier exchanges between Quex and his old companion in arms which did give some plausibility to the suggestion of Quex's career. But nothing in the actual evolution of the play suggests that anything that he has done or has been has the smallest concern with what he is. When Don Juan braves heaven and hell, and invokes the "joies profanes de mes sultanes," against the ruin that hangs over his head, he is at least "verifiable;" he is in one stage of the rake's progress. But what is Quex? He is, it is true, beset with half real complications, which though a moment's resolution would brush them away, seem to interfere with his unpleasant design of marrying the lady whom his friend describes as a "creamy English girl." But in himself, no pains are spared to represent him as heart-whole, mind-whole, body-whole. He has parted from the under-world in which he has lived the greater part of his man's existence, unscathed and unsmirched by it. Nay, so fanciful is Mr. Pinero's art that, looking, as I have said, at Quex through the medium of Sir John Hare's dry, trim, composed little figure, it is impossible to conceive what satisfaction this old prodigal can ever have had in his diet of husks, served and sauced, though it may have been, chez Maxim. If the author had really thought out a poignant drama, no theme could have given him more striking material than that which he stumbled on in Lord Quex—namely, the false notion that a man set on one course of habit and self-satisfaction could settle down with ease and appropriateness into another. But this moral truth Mr. Pinero has either not perceived or has evaded.

The truth is, of course, that the play is unreal throughout, and hinges, not on character, not on any end that can be called moral or intellectual, but on a powerfully executed stage device. There lies Mr. Pinero's talent; there his mind works with nimbleness and success. To that end three-quarters of the play itself are sacrificed, and we have to put up with a first Act, a second Act, and a fourth Act, which are nullities, in order that a masterly third Act may come into being. The self-contained Quex, completely disillusioned about the sentimental Duchess, who was once his mistress, must commit the aimless folly of visiting her in her room at midnight, in the house that also shelters the girl whom he is to marry, and to whom he is devoted. There he must be confronted with another impossible character, the lying, prying, mischief-making, but really noble manicurist (who, if Mr. Pinero's art had been a little subtler, might conceivably have been made to live). Put these two individuals together in a series of tight corners, arising out of a risky, thrillingly prolonged, scene in a woman's bedchamber, when the house is asleep, and you have a situation well adapted for manipulation by so deft a hand as Mr. Pinero's.

And yet it is precisely in such a mechanical complication that the weakness of his characterisation comes out. Not realising his subject, he has been at pains to draw Quex as a specially chivalrous, self-controlled person. But when he is cornered by the girl, Fullgarney, he has three devices—first, to bribe her, secondly, to scare her, thirdly, to ruin her. Here for a moment the "tone" of the picture is right; Quex does what the "man of the world" would do; that is to say, his inevitable resort is to try everything but the truth. But as the queer, false bent of the play is to represent him as a preux chevalier, we have a quick rebound to nobility, both in him and in the manicuring minx. It is all clever and entertaining enough to those whose mind is set on ingenuities of the stage as ends in themselves rather than on a representation of life. And there are hints in the play, cynical as it is, that if its author's mind dwelt on the secrets of existence more than on the manipulation of theatrical puppets, he might, with his skill in stage-craft, achieve something of value. In the last scene, Quex, bitterly contrasting himself with his younger rival, who fails in the test of self-control that he passes, confesses that no more virtue resides in him than in this brainless light-minded soldier. There sounds a deeper note; a note that Mr. Pinero cannot preserve.

H. W. M.

Art.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—I.

"The audacities of impressionism," wrote Professor Muther of English painting, "are excluded, because painting which starts from a masterly seizure of total effect would seem too sketchy for English taste, which has been formed by Ruskin. Painting must be highly finished and highly elaborated." At the time these lines were written they were probably true of English art in general, and of Academy art in particular, but they certainly do not apply to present conditions. The current exhibition at Burlington House is a striking witness to this. Here, in the very stronghold of artistic conservatism, we find the most emphatic refutation of the statement that English painting is highly finished and highly elaborated. Here, honoured and exploited by the body which asserted that Whistler shirked the difficulties of painting, we have ocular demonstration that impressionism, if not exactly its "audacities," is no longer excluded. The emancipation of English art from too much Englishness has been in progress for some time, and modernity has slowly been leavening an institution that is as tenacious of its old ideals as it is of its material privileges. The exhibition of 1908 marks a further stage in the change that is taking place; and so far as it is possible to judge the vast and characteristically incoherent collection of pictures now on view, the new element is a good deal more conspicuous than it was last year. It is true that the process is still far from complete, but it is sufficiently well advanced to prove beyond doubt that Academy art is in a state of transition, that new forces have established themselves in the old order, and that a hitherto unbending conservatism is now yielding to progress.

This, however, is the only definite conclusion one can arrive at in respect of the exhibition regarded as an entity. One cannot say that the intrinsic merit of the work, whatever school it may belong to, is greater or less than that of last year. One cannot pronounce the landscape section to be superior to the figure-painting, or vice versâ; it would be hazardous even to prophesy that the exhibition will be memorable for any one work that it contains. Its principal feature is an almost total absence of features that stamp themselves indelibly on the mind. Last year there was a Sargent which, whatever its claim to greatness, could claim to be discussed; this time the master-painter, for countless critics, is merely marking time with five quite ordinary portraits and no landscapes. In 1907 a youthful triumvirate, consisting of Messrs. F. Cadogan Cowper, Charles Sims, and L. Campbell Taylor, asserted their presence in a fashion that led to the enrolment of the first two as Associates; but the public anticipation aroused by their work is unlikely to be satisfied by what the present Academy contains of it. Mr. Cowper does not exhibit at all. Mr. Sims shows two canvases which, delightful as they are in many ways, indicate no greater power and considerably less ambition than did "The Island Festival." "The Little Faun" is the more complete of the two. Its idea is pretty enough and its colour dainty; but the picture consists of the idea suggested nebulously, rather than executed, and shows no development in the artist's sense of design. Mr. Campbell Taylor scores a greater success with his "Practice for the Ballet in 1830," a Degas subject treated with a faculty for cool and exquisite colour, which, if less imposing than "The Rehearsal," is proof of an increasing talent. But the work of the triumvirate is not, on the whole, a prominent feature. The exhibition is as clamorous as usual, but individual pictures that clamour are really difficult to find. Indeed, after one has suppressed the smile provoked by an Academician's "Androcles and the Lion" in the first room, and endeavoured to fathom the precise intention of Mr. J. J. Shannon's "Infant Bacchus" in the second; when one has admired decorously Mr. Sargent's decorous portraits of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught in the third, and appreciated the virtues and vices of Mr. S. J. Solomon's "Eve" and of Mr. Clausen's "The Boy and the Man"; when one has tried to get sufficiently far back for a view of Mr. Brangwyn's "The Return," more truly interpretative of the spirit of the wine-god than Mr. Shannon's "Bacchus," and of Professor Herkomer's huge "Council" picture, and has marvelled—with memories of Charles Furse—at the largeness of Mr. Bacon's "Riding Lesson" and the smallness of its painting; when one has looked at these one has seen nearly everything that absolutely insists on being seen. We are not taking into consideration the royal and official portraits and so forth, which, as usual, occupy a certain amount of wall space. These are outside the scope of criticism; so, too, is Mr. Bacon's portrait of the late Prime Minister, which has been done for the Reform Club. Again, there are certain types of picture which the Academy welcomes in deference to a public which has been taught to expect them and, if denied, would be annoyed. The "problem" picture is among these, and the Hon. John Collier, the chief purveyor of this class of goods, provides a very creditable specimen in the "Sentence of Death," which, however, is not nearly as sensational as its title might lead one to suppose. Sensationalism, we are glad to record, appears to have been kept out of this year's exhibition. Mr. Sigismund Goetze's one contribution is a harmless portrait of a harmless little girl.

Discussion of some of the pictures we have mentioned must be reserved for a future occasion. Meanwhile, the new influence in the Academy is typified by the important positions given to one or two members of the New English Art Club; Mr. Walter Russell, for instance, has line space for his picture, "The Letter," in Gallery I., and Mr. W. Orpen is similarly honored in the Gem Room. "The Letter" is only impressionist in so far that the boudoir interior is studied mainly from the standpoint of its lighting, subtly diffused, with a view to its perfect reconciliation with the figure seated within; in its care for textures and drawing no work could conform more closely with Academic ideas. Whether the relationship betwixt figure and surroundings has been quite established, is open to some doubt, but the difficulty of the problem attempted, the freshness of the colour, and the genuine beauty and crispness of the painting, combine to render the picture's presence very welcome. While these leaders of the New English Art Club are to the fore, the Scottish School is rather less in evidence, so far, at any rate, as line space is concerned. Mr. Hornel has a picture in the last gallery—a "Ceylon Idyll," very similar to his New Gallery work, though containing fewer and younger figures; but Mr. J. H. Lorimer, whose refined art has generally provided an annual treat for Academy visitors, sends nothing this year. Mr. George Henry, who must now be regarded as a naturalised Englishman in art owing to his election as an Associate, contents himself with four pictures, none of which, however, display quite the same power as his work of last year and the year before. His full-length portrait study, "Silk and Ermine," is, perhaps, the most engrossing of his exhibits. Plainly, however, its attraction is for the painter and not for the public; it is a tone problem in black and white and grey; no interest that may be felt in the subject—we may assume from the growing popularity among artists of Victorian costume and accessories that the public have a predilection for this period and style—can disguise the fact that the chief question in Mr. Henry's mind was the question of values. As such, the work is a learned and subtle exposition which in less able hands would have resulted in a rather tiresome arrangement of black and white stripes. Finally, as an instance of the new art feeling that is penetrating the soul even of the Academy itself, Mr. Frank Bramley's "Helen Graham Chalmers and her Mother" may be quoted. This large work illustrates not merely a style in portrait painting that Velasquez initiated with "Las Meninas," a style in which the balance of interest is maintained between the sitters and their surroundings; it boldly preaches the doctrine of plein air, of diffused lighting, of direct handling, of everything that spells modernity. That the effect is a trifle jerky is, perhaps, due to a certain clumsiness in arrangement and to the endeavour to key the scheme by passages of strong colour; but there is pluck in the effort to break away from tradition, and, contrary to what we find in Mr. Bacon's equestrian group, the actual painting is to scale. What strikes one most, however, is the single-mindedness underlying the work. Mr. Bramley has remembered that a painter's business is to paint. His motive is different, immeasurably different, from the literary one that dictated the accomplishment of his "Hopeless Dawn." He has definitely cast in his lot with the moderns.

Conspicuous in the sculpture section is the model of the memorial to the late Lord Salisbury, by Mr. W. Goscombe John, which will be executed in bronze and black marble, and placed by Parliament in Westminster Abbey. One may note also that last year's group of "The Death of Dirce," by Sir Charles Lawes-Wittewronge, has been cast in bronze and occupies a commanding position in the Lecture Room. The interest, however, of this section is not excessive, though the standard of craftsmanship appears to be fairly high, and a good deal of talented work in relief may be discovered among the statuary. Like the picture exhibit, the sculpture is not enlivened by much that is of self-assertive originality or merit.

Letters to the Editor.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF OSMAN DIGNA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In view of Mr. Brailsford's article on this subject, you may be interested in hearing of the attention which the subject has excited here. In default of an official statement by the Egyptian Government—in Egypt at any rate, for it happens occasionally that Governmental explanations are telegraphed to England, for one purpose or another, without being published here—the most authentic information regarding Osman Digna and the release of the Sudan Emirs continues to be that supplied by the correspondence in the "Egyptian Gazette" between several Anglo-Egyptians and Anglo-Sudanese, whose identity is hidden under pseudonyms. In a letter by one of the latter it was suggested that "Osman Digna is so 'cute that he very probably thought it would be an excellent stroke of business to feign madness on the offchance of getting his situation ameliorated," as a consequence of Mr. Brailsford's visit. "Osman," the Anglo-Sudanese continued, "has been responsible for the deaths of so many English officers and men that, in short, he is capable of this in order to attract sympathy." "Is he?" retorts a military correspondent, who signs himself "Miles," in the course of a protest against "the un-English attitude of mind displayed by the Anglo-Sudanese. "I should say," "Miles" proceeds, "that after two years' solitary confinement the probability is that Osman Digna is really and truly insane." As a soldier, "Miles" protests against the assumption that it is right to condemn prisoners of war to perpetual imprisonment or to the torture of solitary confinement. The matter can, however, he suggests, be easily set at rest. Are there any records of Osman Digna having been medically examined during the nine years of his incarceration? Let these be produced, or let the prisoner be examined now. A third correspondent enquires, with regard to the report that the twenty-four Sudanese prisoners and Emirs were released "on condition of good behaviour"—this being the verbal statement made by Stack Bey, Sudan Agent in Cairo—what distinction is being drawn by the authorities between prisoners of war and common criminals? It appears that the order for liberation was in the form of confidential orders, and it was given to the Governor of the prison with some suddenness. The correspondent considers that one conclusion may be drawn, without fear of error. "Anyone who knows Damietta and its prison must be aware that by reason of dampness and exposure to the north it is the most unsuitable spot in Egypt for the incarceration of men born and bred in the Sudan." "Another conclusion," he states, "about which there is, unfortunately, little room for doubt is that Sir Edward Grey, when he informed the House of Commons recently that the prisoners had expressed contentment, was speaking from information which was not only erroneous but was supplied with an evident intention to mislead."—Yours, &c.,

AN EGYPTIAN CORRESPONDENT.

Alexandria, April 16th, 1908.

WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Massie, M.P., some time since, writing somewhere against the Woman's Suffrage movement, quoted Mr. Goldwin Smith as saying that "the bed-rock of law is force, and force is male." Now I venture to assert that this should be an exploded idea for the twentieth century. Law and force should be superseded by a more advanced and complex machinery of the State—that of preventive measures and persuasiveness; and this could chiefly and best be carried out by the gentle, resourceful feminine mind, so used, as it is, to such measures in home life. Some people argue that the world is well managed, yet it would seem that vice, poverty, misery reign still; that prisons, workhouses, asylums, roads are full of the miserable, worthless, vile, poverty, disease-stricken people; hospitals crammed with those who are afflicted with preventible diseases and victims of preventible accidents; towns full of drunken babes, tortured animals, burglaries, suicide—every kind of elementary wickedness, in fact, is rampant.

Mr. Massie refers to women's physical disabilities, but who has not observed a powerful mind overcoming physical disabilities; for instances, the blind Fawcett, the armless and legless Kavanagh, late M.P., a man who was full of infinite physical ability; and though these are men, there are, and have been, also women of like persistent effort and determination, such as Laura Bridgman, Joan of Arc, and others. A human being with brains, though handicapped, is able to be active according to his, or her, temperament, natural ability, and circumstances; indeed, the Nietzsche theories, if carried out in their ruthless cruelty and folly, would be fatal to a community or nation, eliminating some of the bravest brains which are able to serve their centuries. It is a remarkable fact that the weak and afflicted often do what is apparently the most difficult work for them. Men who consider force the only power with which to rule should at least remember the power of thought which alone rules in the beginning, and in the end of all things! The physically strong find it easier to rule by force than thought, but this era is full of strong thoughts leading effectively to great issues, in women as well as in men. At present even the word virility is an insult to an active, intellectual feminine mind, as all words of the kind, which cast the woman on one side, proceeding from the pride of the male. Such words are untrue as denoting perfection to be an attribute of the masculine intellect, for a good deal that is carried out as original and finished work has been suggested, and often completely thought out, by a woman, though never so acknowledged. The truth of the matter is that a man who has something of the feminine nature in him is a more perfectly rational being than one who is without it, though men who are not possessed of this supreme quality pour contempt on such rare ones as have it; and the reverse holds good, but in a less degree. Sport, of course, spoils the fineness of a woman's temperament; but with the qualities of endurance, concentration, courage added to intellect, she also is a more perfect creature than one who relies entirely on her "womanhood," for that phase has passed, and both sexes must progress together, emerging from barbarism at the same era to perfection. The "vote for women" movement is a high pyramidal step towards this end, and to this end must she struggle through ploughed difficulties to the summer of her content. The ancient tale of Hercules and Omphale is in direct allusion to this fact; many instances occur in history of this dual nature, comprising strong intellect and firmness with exquisite tenderness in a man, and courage, high and determined, with all the best masculine qualities, in a woman; and without this duality of nature though with intellect many have failed in their careers or suffered damage. Man's pride and woman's forced subjection and crushed condition have hitherto prevented acceptance of the necessity of this completed nature in a world of two sexes but the same humanity. The peaceful and right government of the world can only be carried on by both, though the distinct work of each can still be carried out separately, such as home duties for women, and for men heavy labor, science, naval and military affairs, preaching, anything in which they are supreme; but never henceforth should there be permitted a right of government to one sex alone. The time is ripe, women are capable, and their demands of momentous interest and importance. Their energetic actions for immediate recognition of this before all other Government business, including that of education and licensing, are of highest and strictest necessity, and more so on acccount of these debated subjects, with no woman's voice to be heard. Silently, humble to abjectness, she is to wait for the men's decision on what concerns her and the children vitally. Their participation in government is not to supersede men's rule but to share it, standing on the same platform with equal rights. Men cannot continue to hinder this progressive movement or lay down laws for the women of to-day, who must, will, and shall take their place in all councils of the nation—ay! and every nation as the world rolls on. Sex prejudice dominates young men ludicrously, especially in those just emerged from "infancy."

Women have been sacrificed for ages to men. The absurd idea kept up by them, and hitherto humbly accepted by women, that their manhood is a much higher state for a human being than a woman's womanhood, is allied with tyranny and a fearful calculation as to the real capabilities of women, who are abashed and crushed by their treatment, and obliged hitherto to cringe to the idea of the superiority of the male, whose praise has seldom been for a good woman except safely on a tombstone.—Yours, &c.,

EMMA HARDY.

Maxgate, Dorchester, Dorset,
May 6th, 1908.

"ARE WILD ANIMALS BORN WILD?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Bound up with the interesting question raised by your contributor is another, which might be briefly stated: "Are wild animals really terrible?" The question chiefly propounds itself in connection with snakes, of which most people claim to have an "instinctive horror." A few years ago I introduced a very young child to some slow worms, and she showed no aversion to them, playing with them as though they had been strings of beads. That was at two years old. A year or two later she met a grass snake. Still there was no horror, only an intention like that ascribed by your correspondent to natural wild animals—not to let it come nearer than within a foot or so.—Yours, &c.,

G. G. Desmond.

4, Pump Court, Temple, E.C.,
May 6th, 1908.

WHAT A COLONIST THINKS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The news of the defeat of Mr. Winston Churchill at Manchester has just reached us, and, to one who follows the politics of the Old Country closely, is received with regret, if, as undoubtedly it is, a blow to the present Government.

In a speech delivered at your Guildhall in London, on the return from his colonial tour, the Prince of Wales made a statement, which has since often been quoted, to the effect that the Colonies were of the unanimous opinion that England must wake up, and in this sentence he certainly uttered the views of Canada.

One reads so much in certain of your English papers about the cries of the Colonies for Imperial Preference, and the dismemberment of the Empire as a natural consequence unless it is adopted by your fellow countrymen, that a person reading these exaggerated statements would be led to think that every Colonist was as enthusiastic over the matter as the "inspired" writers themselves. However, such is not the case, for we Colonists are not so void of common reason as to think that what might be a beneficial fiscal policy for a growing Colony would also have the same result for a country like Britain. Indeed, many of us hesitate to contemplate the effect a tariff war would have on your mercantile marine, the envy of all nations, and which forms a bond between the Mother Country and her Colonies stronger than any tariff. It is therefore not because the people of England reject Tariff Reform, or because we are anxious that they should adopt it, that we want to see England awake from her lethargy, but because we think she is being chloroformed by too great an awe for her "ancient institutions." We breathe the exhilarating breezes of a democracy, free from class and privilege, and know its power as a progressive force. It is on these grounds we shout across the seas, "Wake up England! Will you remain stagnant while your Colonies advance along the road to national greatness in the sense that Ruskin defined a great nation: 'A great multitude of men who are true to each other, and strong, and of worth'"?

Your present Government shows signs of being actuated by an honest endeavour to right the wrong, and to remove the drag from the wheel of social progress. Will the people of England remain firm?—Yours, &c.,

Thomas Yorath.

Hamilton, Ont., Canada,
April 25th, 1908.

BEER AND THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—With regard to the causes of the disgrace which has come upon Manchester, Mr. Masterman (in your issue of the 2nd inst.) was quite right in ignoring the Tariff-Reformers and the Suffragists, but when he concludes "North-West Manchester was actually lost on the protest of the Roman Catholics of Lancashire against the Education Bill," his explanation is incomplete. The statement is probably true, inasmuch as the transfer of 250 votes would have turned the election, and, no doubt, the Catholics were good for that number; but there is also no doubt that a still larger number of votes were lost to Mr. Winston Churchill owing to the old but unholy alliance between the Church of England and the drink trade.

I can remember the great election of 1868, when the walls were plastered with "Vote for Beer and the Bible," and these two great "causes" are still running in double harness. It is true that several of the Bishops have declared in favour of the Licensing Bill—though the chorus of genuine astonishment with which this simple fact was received by the Press, both Tory and Radical, cannot have been very gratifying to them. But the Bishop of Manchester is not one of these, and even if he were, I suppose his clergy need not follow his lead. At all events, they worked most energetically for their friends, even allowing St. Ann's Church (the most important Church in the constituency) to support, and be supported by, sundry boards on which was a scurrilous placard about the "Robbery Bill" (the same that was adorning the beer-houses of the city), of course, with the words underneath, "Vote for Joynson-Hicks." There were other placards with various statements, absolutely false, as to what the Government intended to do with the schools, but the drink placards were the most glaring and offensive in every way.

It is a very long time now since the Anglican Church abandoned the interests of the people, and gave its whole support to vested interests, privilege, and monopolies; but I notice that its leaders still have the insolence to speak of it as the "National Church" when it suits their purposes so to do. For my own part, however, I have no use at all for any church of this sort.—Yours, &c.,

A Manchester Man.

May 4th, 1908.

RUSSIAN HORRORS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read with great interest the letter entitled "The Stifling of Freedom," by "Ixe," in your current issue. To use common parlance, it has made my blood boil. Here we have these frightful and diabolical persecutions going on in Russia—let alone her treatment of that brave little nation, the Finns—and no word of protest is raised by any of the "free peoples of the earth."

There have been times when the British nation have let their voice be heard, and in no unmistakable manner, about such affairs. Are we to acknowledge that, through luxury and prosperity, our moral sense has become blurred, and that right gives way to some miserable expediency? What do some of your readers think? Cannot our people in high places do something?—Yours, &c.,

P. M. G.

Birmingham, May 4th, 1908.

A SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Since reading your note on the proposed Shakespeare Memorial in The Nation for April 25th, I have come across two passages which seem to me strikingly apposite to the subject.

The first is from Dr. F. G. Kenyon's new edition of Mrs. Sutherland Orr's "Life and Letters of Robert Browning." On page 258 of this book we read:—

"The conversation (at a dinner given by F. Palgrave to Tennyson, Gladstone, Sir F. H. Doyle, Browning, and others) having turned on the celebration of the Shakespeare ter-centenary he (Browning) remarked: "Here we are called upon to acknowledge Shakespeare, we who have him in our very bones and blood, our very selves. The very recognition of Shakespeare's merits by the Committee reminds me of nothing so apt as an illustration, as the decree of the Directoire that men might acknowledge God.'"

The next passage is from a letter by Wordsworth addressed to a friend on "Monuments to Literary Men," a letter which is found on pages 225-228 of a volume called "Wordsworth's Literary Criticism," published by Mr. Frowde. In this weighty letter, Wordsworth maintains that while the gallant defenders of our country should be liberally rewarded with monuments because their noble actions cannot speak for themselves, "eminent poets appear to me to be a class of men, who less than any others stand in need of such marks of distinction," and, speaking of Burns, he writes, in words which will apply with even greater force to Shakespeare: "he has raised for himself a monument so conspicuous, and of such imperishable materials, as to render a local fabric of stone superfluous, and, therefore, comparatively insignificant."

Whatever may be thought—and I express no opinion—as to the merits of the proposal now made to commemorate Shakespeare it must be acknowledged that none can speak with more commanding authority than Wordsworth and Browning on such a subject.—Yours, &c.,

L. J. Roberts.

Tegvan, Rhyl, May 2nd, 1908.

THE RESEARCH DEFENCE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I do not know whether Lord Cromer's appeal to the public for support of the Research Defence Society will meet with response. If it does, I doubt whether it will be from those who have considered most carefully the subject of vivisection. In this day the exact sciences are conceded an almost autocratic right to control those who are incompetent to answer the expert, but the question may one day arise whether intellect armoured by scholastic training shall always dominate the gentler feelings that lie fundamental in our humanity. It is, indeed, not unlike that question, long ago answered, when brute force, privilege of pedigree, and material possessions claimed an inalienable right to control the simple and poor. And many, though they have not knowledge enough to distinguish between the rival claims of the men of science and the anti-vivisectionists, both of which classes are honest, yet neither altogether scrupulous in their arguments, yet hold to their aboriginal feelings; they remain suspicious of the physiologists' privileges and unassailable secrecies. Nor will such be comforted by any cant praise of the physiologists' devotion to suffering humanity, nor by protests against the absurdity of questioning a scientist's goodness of heart. They may, perhaps, admit that all Lord Cromer's statements are correct, and yet not feel justified in supporting the Research Defence Society.

Sir, I am no anti-vivisectionist in the ordinary sense of the word. Indeed, I grant that the physiologists have a good case. I admit even that the anti-vivisectionists spoil their own by inaccuracies and exaggerations. Nevertheless, I sympathise most deeply with that man who doubts; because, better even than he, I recognise the intolerable danger of allowing the physiologist the free hand that practically is accorded to him. It is no good shutting our eyes to the fact that quite unutterable barbarities have been, again and again, perpetrated in the cause of science, nor that there is little to prevent in our own country the horrors that are tacitly sanctioned in some Continental laboratories. Moreover, I see no reason for regarding men of science as more humane, or less liable to deceive themselves as to the suffering they inflict, than any other class of men. The habitual witnessing of suffering inevitably and always blunts the finer feelings, unless, as in medical practitioners and nurses, suffering is studied solely for the sake of relieving it. It is not now questioned that in slave owners, in jailors, in asylum proprietors, at one time, the daily witnessing of injustice and torture blunted the feelings and distorted the judgment of the interested parties. Yet the aboriginal feelings of the people in each of these cases have overcome privilege and wealth and authority. Slavery is abolished, prisons are reformed, asylums are inspected; and the people no longer suspect either prison or asylum administration, because the law has adjudicated between a native passion for justice, and the doom of the criminal and the lunatic.

And some of us, in our anxiety to ensure that no unnecessary suffering be inflicted upon the creatures we love, do demand that the law shall look after the dogs in the same spirit as it has protected the jailbird and the madman from the callousness of authority. We want thorough inspection—as thorough and frequent and disinterested at least as that forced upon the private asylum. If we get this and a more stringent application of the existing law, many at least will cease to vilify the physiological laboratory as entirely as they have forgotten their hatred of the asylum doctor. Granted a more conscientious use of anæsthetics, the prohibition of curare, the discontinuing of experiments upon living animals for teaching students, and all need for the Research Defence Society will vanish.

But, Sir, there is another aspect to this appeal of Lord Cromer's. The medical profession are fully convinced that the less the public mind is concerned with medical matters, the better for its health. The converse is equally true of purely sanitary affairs, though, perhaps, no hard and fast line can be drawn between. The study of disease plants fear in the heart, while the pursuit of health makes it fearless. The making of the public familiar with disorders of the flesh, which misfortune the daily Press and such appeals as this now before us are unwittingly enforcing, finds some sort of antidote, no doubt, in Christian science and other new religions; anything may be welcomed that will counteract the public fear. Some may deny the increase of this fear. But physicians know of it only too well. And that society conversation nowadays finds in the appendix vermiformis, premature burial, and Christian Science, its chief pièces de résistance, entirely justifies the claim that the fear of disease and the pursuit of quack remedies are undermining the decency and sanity of life. It is for such reason that I think Lord Cromer's appeal ought never to have been made. The physiologists have always proved their ability to look after themselves, and should be too proud to seek public support, especially when they realise full well the hunger of the public after unwholesome food. For God's sake, let us reform vivisection if only that we may forget it.—Yours, &c.,

April 28th, 1908. GREVILLE MACDONALD.

THE "CRUX" IN "THE TEMPEST."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed to reply to Pastor Lummis's letter under this heading? I regret that I am unable to refer to the copy of THE NATION in which the original discussion of the line in question arose, so that what I am about to say may have already been explained in the same way.

I do not think a study of the punctuation of the Folios gives us any cause for treating it with the respect, or for putting the grammatical strain upon it, that is warranted by your correspondent, but whether the disputed line read

"Most busie, lest when I doe it,"

or—

"Most busie lest, when I doe it," may it not bear the interpretation of the words as they stand without any ingenious emendation? The meaning of the line, closely packed with thought as is so often the case in the later plays, seems to be simply this: "I am forgetting my labor, but these sweet thoughts do even refresh it and are most busy when I work least." This, after all, is the experience of most of us, viz., that agreeable thoughts interfere considerably with the execution of any imposed task, but it is the very reverse of the explanation offered by your correspondent. I do not wish to appear wilfully blind to another's interpretation, but it is always worth while to make the best of the text as it stands.—Yours, &c., VIOLET CHURCHILL.

May 4th, 1908.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I call your attention to a mistake in this week's NATION, in the paragraph on page 143 re the Additional Act to the Sugar Convention? The provision requiring a certificate for sugar refined in the United Kingdom exported to territories of contracting States is there said to apply to all articles containing sugar, such as biscuits, preserves, mineral waters, &c.

This is not the case; the certificate can be required in the case of refined sugar only, as stated in the text of the Clause, and it was, in fact, a special point of our diplomacy in the matter that no certificates should be required in case of sugared products. The position of sugared products in relation to Continental tariffs has really been one of the reasons for prolonging the Convention of 1902, which secured for them the lowest rates of duty on importation into the contracting States; and we have always been afraid that if the Convention were denounced, these countries would take advantage of the opportunity to raise their duties against our export trade in those commodities.—Yours, &c.,

SPECTATOR.

London, May 5th, 1908.

THE PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It must surely have occurred to many of your readers, who have waded through the numerous discussions, letters, and articles published in the daily, weekly, and monthly journals during the past two or three years, that there is some factor—some important element in the combination—required to solve the problem of unemployment which has been overlooked. Take, for instance, the remedy now advocated by the Tory Party—Tariff Reform. Could any discussion be more futile than this—"Whether Protection is a remedy for unemployment"?

Anyone who will take the trouble to read the Parliamentary debates during the Corn Law agitation, or those in Congress whenever a Tariff Bill has been introduced, will be struck by the fact that the present discussions are merely repetitions of what has been said again and again both for and against a tariff for the protection of home industries. But what avail are theories in the face of facts? Fifty years of Protection in the United States has demonstrated that, far from being a guarantee against unemployment, no country in the world has experienced more or greater industrial crises during the same period than America. To-day, with a population of less than twenty-five to the square mile, she has nearly five millions of people seeking employment. England, with a population fourteen times denser, has certainly not more than one-fifth that number of unemployed. But the same period of fifty years of so-called Free Trade in Great Britain has likewise demonstrated that neither is this system, per se, a guarantee against this terrible evil.

Unemployment is known in all lands, and under all systems of trade—Free Trade, low tariff, moderate tariff, and high Protection. Discussions of this problem confined to the question of tariff or no tariff are, therefore, a mere waste of time and temper. Your correspondent, Mr. Forrest Hewit, says: "Employment in any country depends ultimately upon the national income, for it is from the national income that the wages fund and the power to consume are derived." Now this is obviously but a half-truth; otherwise employment would be much steadier than it is. Everything depends upon how the national income is distributed and how employed. Demand, which is the determining factor in creating employment, comes from the masses, but if the bulk of the national income goes into few hands, how can the great demand for commodities on the part of the masses become effective? Given two nations with the same population, it would be possible for one with half the national income of the other to have fewer unemployed. What, then, is the missing factor? Surely it is not difficult to see.

The national income is distributed by means of certain counters which we call money. Thanks to custom, superstition, and Acts of Parliament, we, in common with all other nations, demand that these counters shall be made of a very scarce and, therefore, valuable metal, of which there is so little in proportion to the demand that there is not nearly sufficient to go around, and hence millions must go short. Now, only those actually possessing enough of these or of something which will exchange for them, are permitted to buy, so that demand is confined exclusively to those possessing money. Millions may be dying for need of bread, starving for want of clothes, but this demand gives employment to not one agriculturist, baker, spinner, or tailor more. This condition is analogous to that which would exist if railway companies agreed only to issue passenger tickets made of platinum instead of paper. Of course, it would mean bankruptcy for the railway companies, just as our present expensive system of counters means bankruptcy and poverty for myriads. But I shall be told that credit is now used to such an extent that probably less than two per cent. of all our trade is transacted upon a cash basis. True, and this is the reason that trade is such an uncertain thing. For our cash is so insignificant in proportion to the load it has to bear that, as Walter Bagehot once said, a bystander may well tremble when he contemplates the slender foundation upon which our trade and commerce is reared. Credit disappears, often momentarily, from the mere rumour of war, from speculations, from the results of Parliamentary elections, from the enterprise of foreign nations, and so forth.

It is exasperating to anyone who takes the slightest interest in the welfare of his own country to see how the speculations of a few greedy American financiers are allowed to spread havoc among industrial populations of other nations. Was there ever in the history of mankind a more dangerous or a stupider contrivance than a monetary system which enables a group of individuals in one country to shut up the workshops and factories and exchanges of many others? A few years since, a New York syndicate drew from the Bank of England in the course of a few weeks £10,000,000 in gold. The result was a fall in listed securities in London alone of £110,000,000! Every business man knows what that means. And what becomes of credit under these circumstances? The truth is we have built our trade upon a basis we do not now control, and which may be overturned at any time by foreign groups, and no tariff system can help us. The problem of unemployment cannot be practically and satisfactorily solved so long as our monetary and banking laws remain as they are. This is the real disturbing factor in all such problems.

Again, the use of a valuable metal, such as gold, as a basis for currency, results in usury, by which the bulk of the national income necessarily falls into few hands. The system may be likened to a game of roulette in which only certain counters lent by the bank are allowed to be used. Inevitably the counters are won by the bank, and the game must cease until a fresh deal is made. This, on a much larger scale, is the game that is being played under the name of "finance" and "banking" the world over, the bank being represented by the great financial houses, and the players by the industrial world. The game has been exposed again and again, but it is unlikely that any change will occur until the world has gone through one or more terrible crises, which must come sooner or later, and which the writer trusts he may not live to see.

Free Trade is impossible so long as the mechanism of exchange—the tool of trade—is monopolised—as it is at present. Our trade to-day is governed and controlled by finance. Good trade does not depend so much upon good harvests, or fertile mines, or the industry of the people, as it does upon the presence of gold. The real problem that has to be solved is this:—Why, with an abundance of the three factors of production—land, labour and capital—wealth production is so uncertain? When this question is satisfactorily answered, the problem of unemployment will also be solved.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR KITSON.

9, St. Mary Abbotts Place, Kensington, W.
April 27th.

PECKHAM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is rather surprising to find Mr. Masterman, in his article entitled "From Mid Devon to Manchester," reviving the statement that "Peckham was lost in a carnival of drink and excitement." Perhaps it would not be asking too much to suggest that he might bring forward some evidence in support of his remarks.

If he should fail to do so, I fear that many of your readers will see in his accusation against the people of Peckham only such another playful "inexactitude" as his allusion to the "good-tempered excitement" of the Liberal crowds in Newton Abbott, which found vent in attempts to wreck the Constitutional Club and to kill the Suffragettes. —Yours, &c.,

HENRY LYGON.

41, Eaton Square, May 4th, 1908.

THE EXPLANATION OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I write as a constant reader of your excellent paper, as I was also of "The Speaker."

If you will allow me to do so, I feel impelled to urge through your columns the vital importance to the country, which will so largely gain if the Licensing Bill becomes law, of getting the main essential provisions of the latter made known promptly, clearly, and effectively to the individual electors, working-class ones especially, in every constituency. Nor can it, I think, be too plainly laid down that the supplying of such information to the electors may easily make just all the difference to the fortunes of the Liberal Party in many coming contests.

As a matter of fact, the big "robbery," &c., placards issued by the brewers on the introduction of the Bill have for weeks past been saturating, with utterly false and infinitely injurious notions, the minds of very many of the working-men electors, and this without any access to the latter of any at all adequate or clear contradiction of the false statements.

There have been numerous public meetings at which the principles of the Bill have been earnestly and eloquently set forth by its supporters, but the men who read and absorb the very discreditable and totally misleading statements issued by the brewers, and who chiefly frequent public-houses, are not as a body the men who attend meetings held to support or to explain the Bill. Even if they were so, it may be doubted whether there has been at those meetings sufficient definite and detailed refutation of the misleading placards in question, or of the verbal explanations, equally unfair and untrue, by which the active agents of the brewers have supplemented the placards.

What is required is to carry home to the minds of the individual working-class electors, by street-corner and other talk at every opportunity, and by short, clear leaflets placed in their hands and left at their houses, the salient facts of the case, say:—

1. That the Bill, if passed, will leave two out of every three public-houses untouched.

2. That the owners and licensees of the houses closed will be fairly and fully compensated; and

3. That nothing of the nature of robbery or of the wholesale closing of houses will take place.

When the Liberal Party brings in a Licensing Bill it seems always to fail to realise that, from the moment the Bill was published, its opponents were hard at work poisoning against it the minds of individual electors, not merely by flooding the polling districts with intensely hostile literature, but by personal appeals to individual electors, urged by hosts of emissaries of the brewing interest in public-houses, and in all places where they can come face to face with the voters in question. Weeks go by before any real advocacy of the Bill is heard by the electorate, and even then its main details are not forcibly pressed home by concentrated effort to reach the individual electors, of whom such large numbers are neither regular readers of newspapers nor frequenters of public meetings.

From all I can gather, Mr. Churchill would at this moment have been member for North-West Manchester if the brewers' policy had been vigorously tackled in detail from the first introduction of the Bill, up to and including polling day. We cannot afford to lose other seats from the same cause, whether at bye-elections or at the General Election, and it is to be earnestly hoped that our leaders will henceforth see to it that very few electors in any part of the country are left in ignorance of the main clauses of the Licensing Bill.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. Swanwick.

34, Croxteth Road, Liverpool,
April 27th, 1908.

COUNTRY LIFE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Fordham's letter to you leads me to write on a collateral subject.

For centuries good work has been done in our country towns and villages by the grammar and other endowed schools, but of late years the Charity Commissioners and (now) the Board of Education, have set themselves persistently to do away with these, and to divert the funds—which are, in reality, the property of each locality—to provide scholarships in the towns.

The money was left for the inhabitants of the districts generally, and it is more than doubtful whether it be right to use them exclusively for the very few children who have a special facility for passing examinations.

Here, in Charlbury, for many years, under not very favourable circumstances, very useful work was done by a small grammar school, and, in my judgment, those educated there will bear comparison with those sent out by town schools, to which the boys have had to go to and fro by rail.

When the last master resigned there were others, if they might have had the use of the buildings and the small endowment, who would have carried on such a school as the town wished. But, no! The Board of Education say we may not do what we will with our own, but must either spend a prohibitory sum of money on a technical school—which we neither ask for nor require—or have none at all! Why should the founder's intentions be so thwarted when they exactly correspond with the wishes of these, to whom the money belongs.

The Small Holdings Act ought largely to increase the number of parents in the country above the wage-earning class, and it ought, in my judgment, to be the aim of the Government to maintain and increase the number of small secondary schools in our small towns and villages, rather than to send the children to the large towns where comparative attractions are already too great for the national good.—Yours, &c.,

J. Marshall Sturge.

Evencroft, Charlbury, Oxon.
May 2nd, 1908.

Poetry.

A CONNACHT FOLK SONG.*

A hundred men think I am theirs when with them I drink ale,
But their presence dies away from me, and their high spirits fail,
When I think upon your converse kind by meadow and by linn,
O form smoother than the silk on the mountains of O'Flynn!

And, Paddy, is it pain for you that I'm wasting night and day?
And, Paddy, is it grief for you that I'll soon be in the clay?
O first love of the winning mouth, my treasure you'll abide
Till the narrow coffin closes me, and the grass grows through my side!

The man that strains to mount the wall we think him foolish still,
When to his hand is the easy ditch that he can vault at will;
The rowan tree stands high and fair, but its berries bitter grow,
While blackberries and raspberries are on shrubs that blossom low!

Farewell, farewell, for ever to yon town amongst the trees!
Farewell, the town that draws me on mornings and on eves!
Ah! many's the dirty morass, and wet the crooked road,
That henceforth go between me and where my heart's bestowed!

And, Mary, ever virgin, where will I turn my head?
I have no knowledge of his stacks, nor where he reaps his bread!
Ah, faithful was the warning that my kindred gave to me,
"The hundred twists are in his heart, and the thousand tricks has he."

Padraic Colum.

* This is a rendering of "An Drinaun Donn," the most widely known of the Connacht love songs. Almost every Irish speaker in Connacht has some version of "An Drinaun Donn." The above is based on the text given by Dr. Douglas Hyde in his valuable collection, "The Love Songs of Connacht." It is in the measure of Irish folk song in English, and the peasant idiom and the peasant vocabulary have been used.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. WILLIAM WATSON has written a poem of marked beauty for the Jubilee number of the "New York World." It is in blank verse, and draws, with singular power and refinement, a picture of the growth and present aspects of American civilisation.

* * *

THE English edition of "The Life and Letters of George Bancroft" is to be issued by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. It should prove a work of unusual interest, for Bancroft's long life (1800-1891) almost covered the nineteenth century, and his full and varied career as historian, statesman, and diplomatist brought him into contact with many of the most notable figures of his time. In early life he met and corresponded with Goethe, Humboldt, Hegel, Schleirmacher, and Niebuhr. His position as Minister to England in 1846 introduced him to the foremost statesmen and writers of this country, and during the two following years he visited Paris and met Guizot, Lamartine, Benjamin Constant, and Louis Philippe. Of these, and of a crowd of others, there are characteristic letters or anecdotes in the biography. From 1867 to 1874 Bancroft was Minister to Germany, and lived on terms of intimacy with Moltke, Bismarck, and the Emperor William. An interesting fact, showing the regard in which Bancroft was held by three very different writers, is that in the Lenox Library, New York, may be seen a small duodecimo edition of "Don Juan" with the inscription, "Mr. George Bancroft. From the Author, Noel Byron, May 22nd, 1822." On one side of the book is a presentation copy of "American Notes," to "George Bancroft from his friend Charles Dickens"; on the other, an original edition of "Evangeline," "with the kind regards of the author."

* * *

ANOTHER biography of great literary interest is "The Life of Alexander Macmillan," on which Mr. C. L. Graves is at present engaged. The life of Daniel Macmillan, Alexander's elder brother and joint-founder with him of the publishing firm, has, of course, been written by the author of "Tom Brown's Schooldays." Mr. Graves should, however, have at his disposal plenty of unpublished material concerning the literary celebrities with whom the brothers had business relations—an intercourse which in their case often gave rise to warm friendships. When one thinks of the mass of correspondence that must be accumulated by great publishing houses like those of Murray, Longmans, Blackwood, and Macmillan, it is surprising that publishers have not more frequently been tempted to write the histories of their firms. A delightful work of this type is Charles Knight's "Passages of a Working Life."

* * *

A BOOK which is sure to prove a most valuable contribution to Irish history will be published early in June by Messrs. Macmillan. This is Mrs. J. R. Green's "Studies in Irish History"—a work mainly occupied with the Tudor period. It treats of the commerce, the industries, and the education native to Ireland, and the causes that wrought their destruction. We are prone to take a superficial view of Irish history, and have come to believe that it is a wearisome record of clan feuds and cattle raids. Mrs. Green's book will help us to understand the native civilisation of Ireland and to realise the ideal of Gaelic culture. Among other subjects brought prominently forward is the union between the Gaels of Scotland and of Ireland, their single law and their single literature. We are glad to see that a second edition of Mrs. Green's admirable work, "Town Life in the Fifteenth Century," will also be issued by the same firm.

* * *

THE announcement that Mr. Rudolph Lehmann is to write a volume of reminiscences under the title of "Memories of Fifty Years," is enticing. Mr. Lehmann's memories must have started early, for he is only fifty-two, but his life exhibits a singularly varied play of literary and public interests. He has edited at least two papers, "The Granta," and "The Daily News"; he has contributed to very many more, and no man has led a fuller or happier life. He has fought several Parliamentary battles, and he has delivered at least one speech in the House of remarkable excellence. We imagine that his best work for "Punch" is in verse, in which his ease of expression just spoils him for the most complete kind of literary success.

* * *

Two books dealing with very different aspects of Russian life may be expected during the present season. Mr. E. A. Brayley Hodgetts, who has lived in Russia for many years, will issue, through Messrs. Methuen, "The Russian Court in the Nineteenth Century." Its aim is to give a series of pictures of the Emperors of Russia, and the leading personages in their reigns, from the birth of Alexander I. to the early years of Nicholas II. The other book is an account of life in Russian prisons by M. T. Youvatshev, a young naval officer who was suspected of complicity in the Revolutionary movement, and condemned to death. His sentence was afterwards commuted into one of penal servitude, and, after serving two years' solitary confinement in the fortress of Schluesselburg, he was sent to Sakhalin for thirteen years. "The Russian Bastille," the title given to his book, is the Schluesselburg fortress, of which the author paints a lurid picture. Madness or suicide is the fate of the majority of prisoners, and M. Youvatshev says that life in Sakhalin was paradise compared to what he endured at Schluesselburg. The book has been translated by Dr. A. S. Rappoport, and will be published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

* * *

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press "A History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England," by the Rev. G. R. Balleine. It is surprising that a connected history of the Evangelicals has not been written before, especially when one remembers Sir James Stephens' brilliant essays on "The Evangelical Succession" and "The Clapham Sect" included in "Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography." In the meantime a history of the Broad Church movement—including, as it does, names so inspiring as Maurice, Kingsley, Thirlwall, the Hares, Mark Pattison, Jowett, and Temple—still remains to be written.

* * *

WITH the increase of travel in our days, the guide-book is rapidly taking a position in the world of letters that would have surprised our grandfathers. Such books as Ford's on Spain, Mr. Augustus Hare's "Walks in Florence," and Canon Rawnsley's on the English Lakes can be read and enjoyed even by those who have no thought of visiting the places described. A promising work to be published this month by the Domenican Press at Florence is "Walks and People in Tuscany," by Captain Francis Fletcher-Vane. The aim is to give English visitors an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with the Italian peasants, and most of the excursions described are well off the beaten track. At the end of each walk there is an appendix, which gives all information necessary about the roads, hotels, and so forth, and the book will also contain a short biographical dictionary of all the historical characters it mentions.

* * *

A LIFE of Lord Kelvin has been written by Professor Andrew Gray, his close friend and successor in the Chair of Natural Philosophy at Glasgow University. It will form a volume in the "English Men of Science Series," published by Messrs. Dent.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Jerusalem: The Topography, Economics, and History, from the Earliest Times to A.D. 70." By Professor George Adam Smith, D.D., LL.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"German Education, Past and Present." By Friedrich Paulsen, Ph.D. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"Home Life in Germany." By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Poems of T. E. Brown." Selected and arranged, with an Introduction and Notes, by H. F. B. and H. G. D. Golden Treasury Series. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)

"Anglican Liberalism." By Twelve Churchmen. Crown Theological Library. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)

"Ashes." By Grazia Deledda. (Lane. 6s.)

"La Morale des Sports." Par Paul Adam. (Paris: Michel. 3fr. 50.)

"Histoire du Dogme de la Papauté des Origines à la Fin du Quatrième Siècle." Par l'Abbé Joseph Turmel. (Paris: Picard. 4fr.)

"Voltaire Philosophe." Par Georges Pellissier. (Paris: Colin. 3fr. 50.)

"Rêve de Lumière." Roman. Par Jean Blaze. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

OUT OF TUNE.*

To his last volume the Poet Laureate appends, or his publisher appends for him, extracts from a recent criticism which, in this place, may be taken to present his own view of his art. From this we learn that he accounts himself an objective poet with a conscious philosophy of life and a consistent desire to deliver a message to the world. He would seem, or at least his critic seems, to deprecate a judgment on any one of his poems apart from its place in the order and system of his work. In this regard a double claim is made. Mr. Austin is asserted to have an intense love of his own land, a passion redeemed from insularity by his sympathy with the local genius of Italy and Greece. It is further said that his preference of the country to the town is based upon a higher principle than, let us say, Wordsworth's, because he knows the right use of riches. The full purse is not to be an occasion of luxury or self-indulgence but an incentive to public service and a means to a stately life. We might almost say that in this light his poems are to be regarded as an amplification of Bacon's Essay of Riches and of the authorities whom Bacon quotes. Like Lucretius in fact, and Virgil in desire, we hardly venture to add like Mr. Squeers by his own word, he is a philosopher first and a poet afterwards. This is a lofty claim, and much must be made good before it can be justified for any poet. The patriotism must be something more than the banal assertion of "my country right or wrong." There must be the sublimity of thought which begets sublimity of diction and without which the grand style is but a simulation and a wraith. And in his love of nature the poet must give us that which every man of feeling can receive from the creative genius, but cannot, if he be not a poet, create for himself. Such a man is not unconscious of beauty, but he lacks words to give reality to his thought. The primrose is to him more than a primrose, but he cannot say, and, therefore, he cannot know, how much more, until the hand of the master throws upon the flower—

> "the gleam,
> The light that never was on sea or land."

We fear that only a strong prepossession can find much trace of the requisite qualities in Mr. Austin's latest efforts.

The poem which gives its title to the volume seems to show a touch of autobiography. The subject is suggested by Titian's misnamed picture. To an English youth resting by the Claudian Aqueduct in the Campagna there appear—

> "two shapes,
> Material embodiment of those
> The great Venetian in resplendent hues
> Upon the canvas lastingly portrayed."

One offers him worldly success, money or power, the other the life of a poet or, as the author puts it, the literary career in its highest aspect. It is an inferior version of the "Choice of Hercules," and the Laureate must have been aware that his antithesis was false, alike in design and in execution. The design is false because the young man's choice does not really lie between Mr. Austin's alternatives. If he chooses to be a politician, it is not necessary that his aims should be selfish, that he should yearn for notoriety, that he should, as he is here told he may, cajole, convert, or overawe the platform or the Senate. A young man of generous heart would have reflected that he need not be a Rigby or a Sandwich, but might take his pattern from a Burke, a Gladstone, or a Morley. If the design is thus false, the execution is even worse. When Pleasure tempted Hercules, she drew an alluring picture of the land to which she invited him. There was a snake in the grass, but it was not her cue to disclose the reptile. Mr. Austin's temptress is a frank and guileless personage who holds it her duty to set forth all the drawbacks of the career which she offers. She tells the youth that what he will get will be not fame but notoriety, that even this will not last, that, however strong his desire for office, he will often have to languish in the cold shades of opposition, and that, to get back to power, he must—

> "with invectives fume and rage
> All through the land, denouncing evil times,
> With histrionic passion; 'tis a stage
> For mountebanks and mimes."

It is clear that Profane Love did not know the elements of her business as a temptress. If "the spirited sly snake" had been equally frank with Mother Eve, the world had wanted a certain epic. Common gratitude for such unselfish veracity should have made the young man commend to the lady a careful study of the ninth book of "Paradise Lost." A few lessons from Satan might so far improve her blandishments that there would be some credit in resisting them.

Though Mr. Austin has thus given all the attractive arguments to the right side, we cannot say that he has always been successful in giving them poetical form. His Sacred Love is detailed enough in her instructions. She is careful to point out that visits to Italy are very necessary, and further, are incomplete without what Mr. Cook or Dr. Lunn would call an "extension to Athens." A further extension to Jerusalem is recommended. It is of the bene esse, though not of the esse, of life. For fear the youth in his globe-trotting should become too cosmopolitan, he is reminded of the duty of patriotism.

> "But while from futile feuds you dwell apart,
> Never forget to render what is due,
> In hour of need, from manly hand and heart,
> To the male Land, whose soil engendered you."

The intention is excellent and the moral sound, but is it poetry?

The poem called "The Wind Speaks" would seem to have been suggested by Shelley's "The Cloud." We will not say that it is an imitation, if only because Shelley's poem is truthful, exact, imaginative, and musical, epithets not precisely applicable to Mr. Austin's. Of Shelley's it has been said by a man of science that a man of science might have written it. What the Cloud says of itself is scientifically true, but the Wind in his two first stanzas involves himself in a contradiction.

> "In the depth of Night, on the heights of Day,
> Would you know where I rest or roam?
> In vain will you search, for I nowhere stay,
> And the Universe is my home.
>
> When you think to descry, on the craggy steep,
> My skirts as I mount and flee,
> From the wrecks I have wrought, I am sound asleep
> In the cradles rocked by the sea."

Nor are the Wind's last words more happy than his first:—

> "Like the Soul of Man, like God's Word and Will,
> Whence I come and whither I go,
> And where I abide when my voice is still,
> You know not, and never shall know."

As he has already told us that he abides nowhere, we might acquiesce in our ignorance, the more that we do not understand how a Will can come anywhere or anywhither. Still, we had supposed that the Word of God came from God, and we fear that the Wind in regard to his own provenance under-estimates the inquisitive powers of science.

Since the Laureate has thus failed to think out the subjects of his poems, it is little wonder that his imagery, his diction, and his rhythm fail to support the claim that is made for him. We know not what perversity made him call a woman's corset a

> "Compressing beaker for her brimming breast."

Some of his phrases are unintelligible apart from their context. Thus a "luxurious tear" might be supposed to have some affinity to Laura Matilda's "billowy ecstasy of woe," but in Mr. Austin's verse it seems to refer to the sorrows of the wealthy. We know that "who drives fat oxen should himself be fat," but Mr. Austin's phrase would make a partridge suffer from a feathered wound. For his sounds the Laureate seems to trust his eye rather than his ear, or he could scarcely have indited so painful a sibilance as "her soft voice sank to silence." Indifference to formal grammar is no vice in a poet, but some errors imply a confusion of thought, and it seems that Mr. Austin's "thou who opposeth" is one of them. A truly classical poet would have allowed Ephyra its right quantities, and would not have put into the mouth of Sisyphus so poor a boast as that he had > "made the name of Corinth glorious from > Peloponnesus unto Attica,"

a passing narrow space for the wings of fame.

We do not say that there is no poetry in this volume,

* "Sacred and Profane Love and Other Poems." By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate. Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.

but what there is is nowhere sustained, and is marred by many faults. In no way does it justify the claim that Mr. Austin should be ranked with Wordsworth or with Keats. A love of the country is not the same thing as an imaginative insight into the secrets of nature.

THE SOUL OF BUDDHISM.*

A book entitled "The Inward Light" would in England be taken to be a presentment of the central teaching of the Society of Friends. Those, however, who know the earlier works of the author, will not be surprised to find that it is a book about Buddhism and the other religions of the East which existed before Gautama, and on which he founded his faith. Mr. Fielding Hall has in fact now completed a trilogy on the Burmese, of which "The Soul of a People" and "A People at School" were the earlier volumes. The author was a British judge in Burmah at the time of the invasion of the country, and during the years of dacoity or irregular violence which followed its nominal conquest. He has set himself the task of interpreting to his own people, with rare and delicate sympathy, the Eastern folk whom he came to know so well. His first volume, now widely read, described Buddhism as it is popularly practised; his second the upheaval of ancient landmarks caused by the British conquest; and in this volume he gives us in furthest abstraction the innermost doctrine, the purest significance of the Buddhist religion. This book might indeed be known, far more fitly than Mr. Sinnett's fantastic volume of conjuring marvels, by the title of "Esoteric Buddhism."

The author's style is still charming, more poetical even than in his earlier work, and with his old pungency of descriptive touch. It becomes rhapsodical at times; but those who do not like rhapsody would in any case find it extremely difficult to understand the secret of Buddha—or, for that matter, the secret of Jesus either. Even the sanest religious teaching cannot always express its full meaning without getting on fire. The sentences are generally short, and nothing is commonplace. It is regrettable that so much literary power is marred by not unfrequent carelessness of workmanship; there are "sentences," three or four lines long, which possess no predicate; single verbs follow plural nouns—a page could be filled with small syntactical errors. Readers who mind these things will be a little worried by them.

A formal treatise on Karma and Reincarnation, on the Single Stream of Life, on Nirvana, on the evil of Desire, would be sure to be hard reading, and could hardly escape obscurity, if not tedium. Instead, each of the short chapters of this book has a picturesque outward setting. It hangs on an incident;—a famine, a lovers' interview, an open air play, a Christian convert, and it is all immersed in the atmosphere of the great river valley of the Irrawaddy, its sunsets, its majestic nights, its hot noontides. The whole book reflects the experience of a wounded Englishman nursed to health in a Burmese Monastery. The Englishman is even a fainter hero than Marius the Epicurean, but he serves his purpose of giving a concrete base, vividly realised, to each doctrine built up; so that truth embodied in a tale may enter in at lowly doors.

It appears, then, that Buddhism and Christianity, when they become again pure and primitive, strip off their armour of dogma, speak without their ecclesiastical machinery and their popular forms in the way of bell, book, and candle, both finally speak of the Inward Light, and stop there. This is the absolute religion common to man. Quakerism believed itself to be—and the claim is broadly allowed—"primitive Christianity revived"; and here a writer on Eastern religions, who aims at the same primitive absoluteness, finds the Inward Light in the Upanishads earlier than Buddha, apparently without knowing that any Christian body had appropriated the term here.

The author's terminology would not fit correctly into any strict philosophical categories of the West, which can ill interpret such phrases as "the soul is made of knowledge and will," "religion is knowledge." These things darken philosophical counsel. The central teaching of the Buddhism of this book is that all life is one; that the soul is not an isolated kernel of spiritual substance, definitely and rigidly personal to its bodily home of flesh, born separately for the first time when the body is born, and never inhabiting another form again; but, on the contrary, it is a ripple in an ever-flowing stream, finding its proper vehicle in a body provided by the parenthood of earth, bearing its sheaves with it, reaping in each incarnation what it has sown in that which went before, and ever sowing afresh the character-harvest of the future. As the race evolves it appropriates increasingly more of the inherent faculties of the life stream, previously only potential. To expound this Mr. Hall uses that fine metaphor of the white light broken by the spectrum into coloured rays which we gradually absorb, a similitude which has already been used in another sense, and with such wealth of application, by F. W. H. Myers in the literature of physical research. One had thought that he had made that metaphor his for ever; it has become more like a doctrine than a metaphor in the study of the subliminal self. Curiously enough, the very chapter preceding Mr. Hall's elaborate use of this metaphor tells how Buddhism will have nothing to say to dreams, visions, psychical marvels of any kind; it is plain, prosaic, universal, or nothing. Herein it has grievously limited its explanation of human nature; it has stopped one of the possible gates of light, fitful and beyond immediate control as that opening may be. This limitation of outlook is one reason of the pessimism that lies at the heart of Buddhism. Buddhists wish to make an end of life and desire, both of them being evils; but what they really mean, as Mr. Hall points out, is a rebellion against the limitations of life, and the unrest and disappointment that dogs desire. Now a career that ends here, or only repeats itself unrecognisably in another career bound to it by no link of memory, may indeed be counted a disappointing and limited affair; man may be born to trouble as the sparks fly upward, and not to desire or admire, if a man would learn it, might be better than all our gardens of spice; but surely life is larger, and experience more significant, more immediately splendid, if the eye of the man is not closed to dream and truth-telling vision, to healing, prophecy, and inspiration?

In the light of this central doctrine of the ever-flowing life, the author proceeds to work out its application to the treatment of Prayer, of Sex, of Perfection, of Charity, and so forth. Every chapter is pleasant reading, even to a hardened reviewer. We may be thankful that an English Civil Servant in Burmah was no alien in spirit to the gentle brown race among whom he lived. Every religiously gifted man, one might say everyone with religious perceptions, may learn much from the treatment of Prayer, of Faith and Free Will based on the story of a famine, of the different religions of women and men, and of the popular Hell and Heaven. The whole makes a contribution not to be ignored to a synthesis of religious forms, and an abstraction of religious essence. Though much of its substance may be familiar to a few in the East, every one of these subjects is treated with what, to an Englishman, is freshness and originality.

* "The Inward Light." By H. Fielding Hall. Macmillan. 10s. net.

ONE YEAR'S LIFE.*

It must be strange to live year after year till seventy-eight and know that the great achievement of one's life was over and done with at thirty-one—to feel the one conspicuous performance slipping back into the distance till it belongs to the history of almost half a century ago. It must be almost equally difficult to refer to that glorious time with dignity and not to let others forget it. In some minds a peculiar feeling of spite grows against the old self for the splendour of a triumph never repeated. "You will be jealous of your past," said Johnson to a literary man, but in the case of soldiers that jealousy is even harder to bear. More than the ordinary man's, a soldier's greatness depends on his opportunity, and his own power of creating an opportunity is much more limited. But for the Mutiny who would have heard of Outram or John Nicholson? Of course, it is not the fame that matters. For a soldier,

* "Memoirs of Field-Marshal Sir Henry Wylie Norman. By Sir William Lee-Warner. Smith, Elder & Co. 14s. net.

A. & C. BLACK'S

SECOND SPRING LIST.

EARLY LONDON (Survey of London).
By SIR WALTER BESANT. Containing 137 illustrations. Demy 4to, cloth, gilt top. Price 30/- net.

THE SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY OF THE ORGANISM.
The Gifford Lectures delivered before the University of Aberdeen in the year 1907. By DR. HANS DRIESCH. Demy 8vo, cloth. Price 10/6 net.

STUDIES IN JUDAISM.
By DR. SOLOMON SCHECHTER. Second Series. Price 7/6 net.

CANCER: Relief of Pain and Possible Cure.
By SKENE KEITH, M.B., F.R.C.S. (Edin.), and GEORGE E. KEITH, M.B., C.M. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 2/6 net.

HOME NURSING AND HYGIENE.
By FLORANCE HUFTON-WINDUST. Crown 8vo, limp cloth. Price 1/- net.

BANKING AND NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.
A Manual of Practical Law. By F. TILLYARD, M.A. Third Edition. Large crown 8vo, cloth. Price 5/- net.

A HISTORY OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.
Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern Schools. By JOHN K. INGRAM, LL.D. Second Edition. Post 8vo, cloth. Price 6/-.

THE NATIONALIZATION OF RAILWAYS.
By A. EMIL DAVIES. Crown 8vo, cloth limp. Price 1/- net.

YORKSHIRE.
The Vales and Wolds of the East and West Ridings. Painted and described by GORDON HOME. Containing 20 full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 7/6 net.

THE PEAK COUNTRY.
Painted by W. BISCOMBE GARDNER. Described by A. R. HOPE MONCRIEFF. Containing 24 full-page illustrations in colour. Large Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 6/- net.

THE COTSWOLDS.
Painted by G. F. NICHOLLS. Described by FRANCIS DUCKWORTH. Containing 24 full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 6/- net.

KEW GARDENS.
Painted by T. MOWER MARTIN, R.C.A. Described by A. R. HOPE MONCRIEFF. Containing 24 full-page illustrations in colour. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 6/- net.

A. &. C. BLACK, Soho Sq., LONDON, W.

MODERN EGYPT
By the EARL OF CROMER.
With Portrait and Map. Two Vols. 8vo. 24s. net.

African Nature Notes and Reminiscences.
By F. C. SELOUS, F.Z.S. With Illustrations. 8vo. 10s. net.

1908 ISSUE READY NEXT TUESDAY.
The Statesman's Year-Book.
Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World for the Year 1908. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL. D. With Maps. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

2nd Impression.
The Story of the Guides. By Col. C. J. YOUNGHUSBAND, C.B. With Illustrations, 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
A concise record of the busy career of service—the Mutiny, Kabul, Afghan War, 1878-80, Chitral, the Malakand, and minor wars—seen by the corps since, some sixty years ago, it was originated by Sir Henry Lawrence and raised by Sir Harry Lumsden.

Autobiography of Montagu Burrows, Captain R.N., Chichele Professor of Modern History, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. Edited by His Son, STEPHEN M. BURROWS. With Portraits. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.

National and Social Problems.
By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
A volume of great and varied interest. These collected papers deal with European political problems of the highest moment and with questions of Labour, Unionism and Socialism.

Civil War and Rebellion in the Roman Empire, A.D. 69-70.
A Companion to the "Histories" of Tacitus. By BERNARD W. HENDERSON, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.

Highways & Byways in Hampshire.
By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. CONNOR. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Diary of John Evelyn. With Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3s. 6d. Or Limp Leather. 5s. net. [Globe Library.

Poems of T. E. Brown. Selected and Arranged with an Introduction and Notes by H.F.B. and H.G.D. 2s. 6d. net. [Golden Treasury Series.

Mr. Crewe's Career. By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Coniston," etc. Illustrated. 6s. [Tuesday.

OLD AGE PENSIONS
The Case against Old Age Pension Schemes. A Collection of Short Papers. (By Members of a Committee appointed in connection with the Charity Organisation Society.) 2s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Books as wedding presents—this is the subject of an interesting article in the May "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net. Another article is on "What Glasgow reads," and the number contains all the news of bookland, with many illustrations.

Order from your bookseller, or write for a specimen copy to the publishers, Simpkin Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

as for everyone else, it is only the exercise of faculty that matters. But how many fine soldiers have rotted in obscurity because no call for their faculty came—no opportunity that revealed the full measure of themselves!

Excellent soldier and administrator as Sir Henry Norman was, the events of only one year saved him from average insignificance. He lived for nearly fifty years afterwards, occupied with useful positions on Councils, Colonial Governornships, and this and that, but always looking back to the days when he was thirty-one as the great epoch of his life. To that one year out of seventy-eight his biographer devotes nearly two-thirds of his book; and he is perfectly right, unless one thinks he ought to have devoted nine-tenths. "Delhi was my greatest service to my country," the old man used to say, and, indeed, his other services were all very well, but Delhi was magnificent. Without irony or surprise, his biographer tells us that, on settling in Onslow Gardens, the General took a prominent part in parish affairs. That was very public-spirited and modest of him, but it was not in parish affairs that he took a prominent part when, on that scorching Ridge outside the walls of Delhi, the handful of besiegers found themselves almost besieged, and for more than three months, amid cholera, treachery, and tropical rains, they clung to those well-known rocks from the flagstaff to Crow's battery.

Almost by accident, the young officer had to act as adjutant-general nearly all that time, and his position allowed him to watch the course of war with a wider horizon than others. Of all the accounts written about the Delhi Field Force, none could be clearer and more instructive than the story here made up from his letters to his wife, and his notes in later years. Many points that stirred bitter controversy in their day are here settled once for all, as it seems to us. On the whole, his evidence is strongly in favour of General Archdale Wilson, who commanded the force. The General's message to Sir John Lawrence that "unless speedily reinforced, his force would soon be so reduced by casualties and sickness that nothing would be left but a retreat to Karnal," reminds one, in a kind of reverse way, of General Buller's famous "spatchcocked" message to Sir George White about surrender in another siege. But Norman went to the General in person, and showed him how impossible any thought of retirement must be:—

> "After a short conversation, General Wilson admitted this," Norman tells us, in a much later document, "and I believe he never really contemplated anything of the kind, but gave way to the temptation of holding it out as an incitement to Sir J. Lawrence to aid us generously."

Wilson was evidently of a reserved and rather chilly nature, not the man to inspire devoted enthusiasm, but the familiar myth about his "Council of War" just before the final assault in September, and how Nicholson and other officers barely succeeded in driving him to a decision, is effectively contradicted by Norman, who had every means of knowing. So is the myth that, even when the Kashmir gate had been blown out and the storming party had poured into the city over the Water Bastion breach, the General still meditated a withdrawal outside the walls again rather than face the street fighting. If evidence counts for anything in those burning moments when every hour is crowded with historic events and blinding emotion, Norman's evidence must count. There were no war correspondents to give an onlooker's account of what probably occurred. As Sir William Lee-Warner says:—

> "There were no war correspondents in the Delhi camp, but in the true spirit of Homer's heroes, while 'the Greeks had none to hearten them, their hearts rose with the war.'"

This implies that war correspondents, when they are present, really do something to hearten the men. It is undoubtedly true, and now that their occupation is threatened, all correspondents will be grateful for the praise.

About Hodson and the notorious act best remembered in his dubious but stirring career, Norman took the view that is now fairly general. Having mentioned how he shot the princes who had escaped from Delhi with his own hand, and how the excuse had been made that he was hard-pressed by a threatening crowd, he continues:—

> "I never heard of this crowd at the time, and I do not believe it. . . . I believe Hodson shot them because he believed they deserved death, and was apprehensive if he brought them in alive their lives might be spared. In doing this he did what I think was in the highest degree wrong. I am bound to say, however, that many officers thought he did right, and had displayed commendable vigour and resolution."

On another disputed point the General's evidence is even more definite. When he was Governor of Queensland, he was suddenly offered the Viceroyalty of India. He accepted by telegram, and almost immediately telegraphed to refuse. Many rumours flew, and we learn now there was no real reason for the refusal beyond the hesitation of an ageing man. That was not his way when, on the Ridge of Delhi, Edwin Johnson wrote of him, "Norman is the life and soul of the force." Or when, a little later on in that campaign, another officer wrote, "Old Norman is the same as ever, only fighting fattens him." (Norman was always grotesquely thin.) "He is all in all to Sir Colin, and is worth his weight in gold." But when the Field-Marshal died, conspicuous in honour and dignified place, those glorious days were nearly fifty years behind him.

MODERNISM IN ENGLISH EYES.*

For some years past Mr. A. L. Lilley has been before the public as the leading Anglican exponent of the movement in the Roman Catholic Church known as "Modernism," and in this handsome volume he has reprinted his chief contributions on the subject to the "Guardian," the "Commonwealth," and The Nation. There is some new matter, not previously published, but it fills comparatively few pages (90 out of 300); and this is not mentioned by way of disparagement, but to inform intending purchasers of the fact. For, indeed, it will be a satisfaction to a large number of readers to have in a collected form articles which they have already read with much interest and appreciation as they appeared. Eight years ago few of us had any idea that it was possible for a movement of this kind to obtain any hold over French or Italian Catholics, and it is largely to Mr. Lilley that we owe our present knowledge. Perhaps he somewhat exaggerates its strength; certainly he writes in rather depreciatory terms of the corresponding agitation in the Church of England, and in more definite Protestant churches. But no other book contains so clear and readable an account of the progress of the movement in France. As an Irishman, Mr. Lilley has done well to put on record the claims of a fellow-countryman, Father Hogan, for many years the guide, philosopher and friend of the seminarists at St. Sulpice, to have been the precursor of the movement, so far as France is concerned. He was suspected of Liberalism a quarter of a century before anyone spoke of "Modernism."

> "That revival, which seems to the foreign observer to have come with such astonishing suddenness, was, after all, being prepared in the silent but far-reaching influence of teachers like Father Hogan."

In the chapter on "The Church of England and the Church of France," originally a lecture delivered before the "Guild of St. Matthew," the author traces some interesting points of comparison, and he shows that the generally prevalent indifference to religious observances in both countries has drawn the two Churches more closely together than would have been thought possible in the middle of the last century. A cynic might add the inference that the two Churches will be one when they have ceased to have any influence at all. But he points out a difference, which is perhaps more national than ecclesiastical:—

> "In England, religious feeling has been so trained in the habit of independence, that, when it finds itself out of sympathy with the Church, it finds or makes for itself a new home. . . . And when no existing form of dissent is able to satisfy certain sections of our people, they do not cease to be religious, nor are they willing to forego the benefits which association offers to the religious life. On the contrary, they forthwith form 'Labour Churches,' or league themselves together in some such loose religious brotherhood. But in France there is no such outlet for the dissatisfaction of the religiously-inclined with the traditional Christian society. As a great French Arch-

---

* "Modernism, a Record and Review." By A. Leslie Lilley, Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington. Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons. 6s. net.

A NOVEL QUARTETTE

¶ In introducing my NOVEL QUARTETTE I have in mind the general verdict passed upon THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND. The chorus of praise that these four volumes received far exceeded my most sanguine hopes, and from the appearance of the first reviews the success of each and every book was assured. I have no doubt that a NOVEL QUARTETTE will prove as acceptable as THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND.

A GREAT ENGLISH NOVEL

¶ "Such books are worth keeping on the shelves, even by the classics," was the opinion of the Times upon THE WINGLESS VICTORY. The numerous readers of Miss Willcocks's previous book will not, I venture to think, be disappointed in A MAN OF GENIUS. It will be remembered that the critics received her last book with acclamation, which resounded in America, and is vibrating in Germany and Scandinavia, where the book has been translated. A MAN OF GENIUS, the scene of which is laid amid the wildest scenery of the North Devon Coast, shows a profound knowledge of art, love, passion, and the elemental things of life. It will convince the reader of the danger incurred by the children of earth in playing with fire. There will be ten illustrations by W. STORY.

A GREAT AUSTRALIAN NOVEL

¶ There are two things that a publisher is always anxious to discover, a Great Australian Novelist and a Great Irish Novelist. When I received my reader's report upon THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT, by T. B. CLEGG, I felt that perhaps one of these discoveries was about to be made. The following quotation will perhaps justify me to some degree: "In my opinion Mr. CLEGG is a novelist who will at no very distant date achieve one of those successes which make a big reputation. Perhaps THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT will be that book. It is instinct that makes a novelist, and Mr. CLEGG has that instinct. He tells only what is necessary to the development of his story; he concentrates; and, above all, he convinces both as regards description of places and the drawing of character. The Bishop of Capricornia is a fine figure of a man who accepts his punishment without murmur. I can with some amount of reason look forward to a real success for this novel."

A GREAT GERMAN NOVEL

¶ On the publication of CLARA VIEBIG'S remarkable book ABSOLUTION in Germany last autumn, a two-column review appeared in the Westminster Gazette, from which the following passages are selected: "In Germany, this book of the sombre purple cover and the design of a halo surrounding the strange title is everywhere. It is on train and steamer, in little odd bookshops of sleepy country towns, and (often in strange company) among the best displayed wares in the shop windows of the main streets of great cities. 'It is a terrible book,' people say, as they sit poring over its pages, but we doubt whether any one, having taken it up, lays it aside as too 'terrible' before he has reached the abrupt, dramatic end. . . . . The face of a woman, young and proud, and very beautiful, haunts the pages of the new novel by the most powerful of the woman writers of Germany. In the pale face burn the dark, unfathomable eyes, in which, by turn, the passion of heavenly and earthly love flares up and does battle against the childlike simplicity and innocence of heart that makes the woman a danger to every man who crosses her path."

A GREAT FRENCH NOVEL

¶ If ABSOLUTION created a sensation in Germany, THE CHILD OF CHANCE (Le Semeur) had no less a vogue in France. It was the book of the season, and as such immensely discussed in Paris. The heroine of ABSOLUTION is a woman to whom man is the Lover, to Marie-Cecile in MAXIME FORMONT'S NOVEL man is essentially the Father. The justification of illicit love has formed the subject of many plays and novels, but the rights of maternity have been grievously overlooked. Can the maternal instinct in a woman blot out her "shame," and justify her for a, to her, necessary and inevitable act of disobedience to conventional standards? The portrait of Marie-Cecile offers a partial solution to the problem. The audacity of the book is equalled only by its restraint. M. FORMONT knows that he is dealing with a delicate subject, but he deals with it as a man, one who not only recognises the cry for motherhood, but knows what it portends.

ABSOLUTION	By Clara Viebig	6/-	Ready May 12
A MAN OF GENIUS	By M. P. Willcocks	6/-	Ready May 15
THE CHILD OF CHANCE	By Maxime Formont	6/-	Ready May 19
THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT	By T. B. Clegg	6/-	Ready May 22

In addition to A Novel Quartette, I have the following important books almost ready:—

(I) THE LIFE OF SIR HALLIDAY MACARTNEY, K.C.M.G., Commander of Li Hung Chang's trained force in the Taeping Rebellion, founder of the first Chinese Arsenal, Secretary to the first Chinese Embassy to Europe, Secretary and Councillor to the Chinese Legation in London for thirty years. By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, with a Foreword by Sir JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, and numerous illustrations. Demy 8vo, price 24s. net. (II) PLEASURE AND PROBLEM IN SOUTH AFRICA. By CECIL HARMSWORTH, M.P. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. Mr. Harmsworth gives his impressions of travel at the Cape, and discusses, open-mindedly, some of the more pressing questions, such as the invasion of Asiatics. (III) THE SHAKESPEARE PROBLEM RESTATED. By GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P. Demy 8vo, price 21s. net. Scholars admit that a large portion of the dramas contained in the First Folio of 1623 did not emanate from the pen of Shakespeare. Was the author of these plays really William Shakespeare? In the present work the author restates the arguments for the negative case, viz., that the Stratford player was not the real Shakespeare. No attempt is made to uphold the Baconian, or any other theory of authorship, or to arrive at any positive solution of "The Shakespeare Problem." (IV) THE CREED OF BUDDHA. By the Author of "The Creed of Christ." Crown 8vo, 5s. net. The Author of "The Creed of Christ" here makes an attempt to ascertain the inner faith of the Founder of Buddhism, and reaches conclusions diametrically opposed to the views about "Buddha" which have long been current in the West. He believes that Buddhism, as taught by its founder, was identical, in the last resort, with the teaching of Christ, and that the teaching of both these is that of the Spiritual Idealism of Ancient India.

THE BODLEY HEAD,
LONDON AND NEW YORK.

JOHN LANE.

bishop is reported to have said recently, in reply to the question whether the Separation Law was likely to lead to a schism: 'There is not religion enough in France to make a schism.'"

Time alone can show whether the modernists are right in claiming that they are "Catholics in the best and truest sense"' or whether the Pope is justified in declaring that by their attitude towards authority they have ceased to be Catholics at all. In either case Mr. Lilley's volume will be an interesting record of a movement which at one time seemed to have a great future before it. There is also a valuable bibliography at the end, chiefly naming books published during the present century, but not on that account of less value, since in the rapidity of the output the general reader easily forgets what has appeared. Perhaps the text, or the dominant sentences of the text, of the Papal documents constantly referred to might with advantage have been included in the volume.

ART AND ARTLESS.*

The effect of Mr. Howells' subtle art in "Fennel and Rue" will probably prove disconcerting to the English reader who will be likely to ask "Why do you devote so much fine-spun analysis to the transitory relations of your hero and heroine? Haven't you lost your sense of proportion?" From this standpoint the book may be likened to a picture in a gallery, the glass of which reflects back the spectator's figure, till he shifts his own position to view it. This shifting of one's mental position in judging a work of art is often an essential step to enjoying it, and Mr. Howells' technique is so extremely delicate that it is doubly necessary for his audience to sacrifice their own prepossessions, and stand before his pictures of life attentive and carefully watching.

The story is slight, but charged with meaning. Verrian, a clever young novelist who has lately "arrived," has received a letter of delicate flattery from a girl, entreating him to send her privately the last portions of his serial story, of which everybody is talking, as the doctors have told her that though she may live for months there are chances that she may die before the finish appears. Verrian is touched, but having probed the matter with his editor, he receives a contrite letter of confession in which his correspondent owns that her dying was "meant as a joke," and her real motive was her curiosity about his "fascinating" story. Verrian, much mortified, writes a brutally severe letter "to get her and her letters out of his mind finally," but when he receives no answer, he regrets it, and begins to perceive that "he had kept a secret place in his soul where the sinner could find a refuge from his justice." His mother and he discuss the incident up and down, and speculate about her character, on the lines of "You don't think we've been too severe, do you?"

In going to pay a week-end visit to Mrs. Westangle, a society woman, with "a liquid glitter in her sweet, small eyes," Verrian travels down with the "smart" Miss Macroy, and he drives to "Seasands" in the company of a nervous and agitated young lady, Miss Shirley, who confides to him that she has been engaged by Mrs. Westangle as "a sort of mistress of the revels," to furnish clever suggestions for the house party's entertainment, but that she herself is to keep out of sight of the guests. Miss Shirley is forced to work for her living, so she will have "no recognition in Mrs. Westangle's hospitalities."

Arrived at "Seasands," Miss Shirley, "with her sick eyes and look of delicate exhaustion," disappears quickly, and nobody but Verrian is aware that the hostess keeps a "ghost" on the premises, to inspire her in the delicate art of social entertainment. Now the keeping of Miss Shirley's suggestive and pathetic personality in the background is a most subtle piece of art, for the girl affects the reader's imagination, all the time that he is witnessing the effects of her hidden manipulations. We divine from some delicate foreshadowings that she is Verrian's unknown correspondent, and we are left to wait and wonder what Verrian's relation to her will be when he, subtly anxious for her success with Mrs. Westangle in the "revels," and subtly snobbish over her "position" in the household, has also discovered it. Miss Shirley serves, in fact, as the mental background which shows up the characters of the people in the foreground; the socially ambitious Mrs. Westangle, and the smart and rather heartless Miss Macroyd, and Verrian, as sensitively alive to getting "copy" as he is to his own ideal of himself, and Bushwick, the young city broker, all declare what is in them simply by their guarded attitude to the fugitive figure of the elusive Miss Shirley. It seems very simple this art, and "not to come to anything much" to the inexperienced eye, but, in fact, it is a lesson in precision of touch, this flawless art of Mr. Howells. For in it, as in all really first-rate work, however "slight" it may appear, the ultimate effect is that of disclosing new secrets of human individuality, and of opening unforeseen vistas in human relationship. Behind the "slight" story of "Fennel and Rue" is a most subtle study of the semi-conscious ruses of the eternal feminine, ruses so subtle that the reader is left pondering them, but quite alive to the significant depth—which may be read in the author's words "But when did a woman ever mean business, except in the one great business?"

To know what "these poor islanders" owe to Mr. Howells it is necessary to put his work side by side with a fair specimen of our popular fiction pleasantly written by a person of some intelligence. If we single out "Dan Riach, Socialist," for comparison, it is because the book is a favourable example of its class, in its tone and outlook; an honest piece of work, and one that is free from obvious falsity. But it is no exaggeration to say that every artistic touch in "Dan Riach, Socialist," is cloudy, weak, indecisive, while every touch in "Fennel and Rue" is exact, clean, precise. The English reader who rarely grasps what art is and is not, may, however, here be helped by a concrete example. Take a tree, and let us imagine that the leaves are not quite leaves, the bark and branches, the trunk and roots, are not precisely bark, branches, trunk and roots. It follows, then, that the whole effect of such a tree on us will not be quite natural, will not have the living force and charm and mystery of nature, and that we should turn from it, saying, "This tree cannot last in nature, or bear comparison with nature: it is already dropping to pieces." This is the difference between "Fennel and Rue" and "Dan Riach, Socialist": the first is a very close study of human nature, artistically sincere and inevitable; the second resembles a weak but well-intentioned water-colour drawing done by a hand that cannot render the form or atmosphere or structure of the living thing. Dan Riach, for example, is not a Socialist, nor, indeed, an individual; he is the embodiment of a middle-class person's view of what a Socialist might be. Similarly Austin Wyatt, the factory owner, who in his enthusiastic youth imbibes Dan Riach's creed, lives in "free love" with Dan's niece, Isabel, and then disavows his Utopian ideals and becomes a model employer of labor, is as obviously a figment of fancy constructed "to point a moral and adorn a tale." The situation developed, twelve years later, of a strike at the glass works, with Dan as agitator, denouncing Austin's desertion of Isabel, is as picturesque as Austin's counter-move to shield Isabel's name by offering her marriage. But both are patently fabricated by the sentimentalism dear to the English idealist. It is not, however, the class bias in the novel that we criticise so much as the fluffiness of the figures. Isabel herself is fairly natural, but Rogers, the trusted foreman, passionately in love with her, who leads the fight against poor Austin, is a caricature of a working man; and none of the relations between any of the characters, Austin's and Theresa Ferard's excepted, have a meaning truthfulness. The author, as an artist, in short, has no fine rectitude of vision. She is kindly and not devoid of insight, but her novel, which will no doubt seem excellent to the majority, is but a freshly struck example from the well-worn die of our middle-class coinage. It is an amalgam of the moral, the sentimental, and the common-sense points of view, and however admirably such qualities may serve one in the conduct of life, they are no equipment for the artist's business of scrutinising nature finely, and representing human life with delicate exactitude.

---

* "Fennel and Rue." By W. D. Howells. Harper. 6s.
"Dan Riach, Socialist." By the Author of "Miss Molly." Smith, Elder. 6s.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

A new Monthly Magazine dealing with the Philosophy, Religions, Politics, Literature, Art, &c., of the East.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

is the only Monthly Review in Europe exclusively devoted to the Eastern World.

ON SALE AT BOOKSTALLS AND NEWSAGENTS.

Subscription rates, inclusive of postage—

14s. for 12 months; 7s. for 6 months.

If any difficulty in obtaining a copy send to

"THE ORIENT REVIEW,"

Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Publishing Office: 27, Chancery Lane, E.C.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.

Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED.
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

So much has been written about the siege of Port Arthur that most people will consider any further books upon the subject as superfluous. M. E. K. Nojine's "The Truth About Port Arthur" (Murray, 15s. net), which has been translated in an abridged form by Captain A. B. Lindsay, and edited by Major E. D. Swinton, sets forth the views of a Russian war correspondent who went through the greater part of the siege, and had a good opportunity of seeing what took place. The facts he brings forward have been confirmed by the recent court martial at which General Stössel was convicted of incompetency and gross disobedience to orders. General Smirnoff is the hero of M. Nojine's narrative, and if that general had been independent of Stössel and Fock, the siege might have ended differently. The quarrels between the different officers, and the entire want of concerted action which resulted from their rivalry, as revealed in these pages, are an ample explanation of the Russian disasters. This book, which was written before Stössel's trial, but not published until after the verdict was given, contains a full and clear account of what took place within the fortress. The author shows some animus against General Stössel, upon whom is thrown the full responsibility for the premature surrender of Port Arthur, but the statements urged in support of this view are supported by so great a weight of evidence that they must be regarded as established. The book is illustrated by a large number of photographs.

* * *

The late Professor John K. Paine's "History of Music to the Death of Schubert" (Ginn, 8s. 6d.) is a short but interesting and trustworthy account of the development of musical art to the end of the second decade of the nineteenth century. Professor Paine introduced music as a subject in the regular course of study at Harvard University, and his book is composed of lectures given there, and prepared for the press shortly before his death. They possess in a high degree the great merit of clearness, and even such difficult subjects as ancient Greek and Roman music, and the first steps in the evolution of polyphony and musical notation, are presented in a simpler manner than is usual in such treatises. Of the composers dealt with, Bach and Beethoven come in for the highest praise, and though Professor Paine wrote from a conservative standpoint, nearly all of those who have been touched by Beethoven's influence will agree that he has stood the test of time better than most other composers. "In the Pantheon of art," says Professor Paine, "Beethoven holds a foremost place beside the greatest poets and artists of all time, besides Æschylus and Dante, Michael Angelo and Shakespeare. Like these inspired men, he has widened and ennobled the mind and soul of humanity." Schubert, the author pronounces to be supreme as a song composer, and as an inspired poet of the symphony second only to Beethoven, but this praise does not preclude the admission that the greater part of Schubert's eleven hundred works are interesting only as the product of a genius who wrote too much in his short lifetime. The scheme of the book prevents any treatment of Liszt, Berlioz, and the more recent developments of romantic music. Within its limits it can be recommended as an admirable handling of the subject in brief compass.

* * *

Twenty-six essays on the peoples and places of Central Italy, Magna Graecia, Sicily, and Sardinia, which have been translated by an American author, Mr. C. Densmore Curtis, from the Italian of Signor Ettore Pais, are contained within the volume entitled "Ancient Italy" (T. Fisher Unwin, 21s. net). They are the result of investigations made by the author during the preparation of his histories of Magna Graecia and of Rome, and they include material unpublished hitherto. Sound, if rather soulless, scholarship is their distinguishing note; Signor Pais has nothing of the picturesqueness of style that we find in a great deal of the literature by contemporary Italian writers; whatever his theme, he is always quietly erudite and logically argumentative. Belonging as it does to the higher criticism, the book is hardly one for the general public. Students of the classics, however, will discover much to interest them in the contentions put forward in these pages. Strabo, for instance, is among the authorities whom Signor Pais relies on, and one of his essays controverts the generally accepted theory that the Greek writer's historical geography was compiled about 18 A.D, and produces evidence to prove that it was written between 22 B.C. and 11 B.C. Signor Pais argues that it was merely retouched at the later date; also, that it was not written in Rome, but probably in Strabo's native city of Amasia in Asia Minor. A valuable sidelight on a famous period in the world's history is shed by the chapter on the expedition of Alexander of Epirus, the uncle of Alexander the Great, to Southern Italy. Praise is also due to the admirable photographic illustrations to this volume.

* * *

Under the title of "St. George for Merrie England" (George Allen, 5s. net), Miss Margaret H. Bulley has written an interesting and well-informed essay on the legend of our patron saint, or rather on the many legends that have gathered about his name. He is, probably, the most cosmopolitan saint in the Calendar; but what interests us most, of course, is the development of his cult in England. His popularity received a great impetus in the reign of Richard I., and reached its culminating point under the third Edward, when the Order of the Garter was founded "in the honour of God, our Lady, and St. George," and the Chapel was built at Windsor. After that the vogue declined, until the prayers for St. George's Day were struck out of the Prayer-Book of Edward VI.; his memory, however, is still kept green by the Royal Society of St. George and the Society of Antiquaries. Unfortunately for our pride of possession, the honour paid to St. George in this country does not establish his English origin, though Richard Johnstone in the seventeenth century stoutly claimed him as an Englishman; there is even less authority for believing this than for crediting him with the dragon fight. If he ever existed in the flesh—Calvin and Dr. Reynolds of Norwich were misguided enough to deny that he did—he was in all likelihood the Cappadocian of whom the Golden Legend tells us, and there is some doubt whether he ever set foot in England. George the Saint has been rather cruelly confused with George, the Arian Archbishop of Cappadocia, who was an unmitigated rogue, and Miss Bulley explains how the mistake arose; indeed, her book is a mine of information on the legend and its variants. The half-tone plates at the end of this volume are after pictures and sculptures dating from the Middle Ages, and including moderns such as Burne Jones and Rossetti, and, as the authoress claims, they tell the story of St. George, "some with delicious quaintness and sly humour, some with the dignity and the gravity that are worthy of its splendid romance."

* * *

It is pleasant to have these two well-known books now issued in a single cheap volume—"Romantic Tales from the Panjab with Indian Nights' Entertainment." By Charles Swynnerton (Constable, 6s. net). Our only regret is that the author's valuable introduction and appendix in his previous edition of "Romantic Tales" is not included. A reader wants more direction in reading the ancient stories than can be given in the short preface here, interesting though that is. Most of the tales, as he tells us, were gathered from the country people far up in the north of the Panjab, at Ghazi on the Indus, and though some of them have been obviously invented or retold within Mohammedan times, the majority date back to a very early age in man's history—early, we mean, as compared to other records of mankind. To us the most interesting thing about them is the proof they give of man's never-ending delight in mere story-telling, even when it is without art or purpose or charm. It must be consoling to our worst novelists to reflect that people like them appear to have been essential to the human race, almost from the anthropoid stage onward. Of course, there is much else to be learnt as well—the history of manners, of primitive beliefs, and primitive intimacy with animals when it seemed quite natural that animals should talk. The comparison with the "Arabian Nights" is obvious, and with "Uncle Remus" too, though we have found stories much more closely resembling his in Central Africa, as was natural. As in most Indian stories, there is a good deal of mockery and humour in the tone. We select a short one, very characteristic of

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOKS WANTED.—£20 each offered. Guy Mannering, 1st edit., 3 vols. 1815, in boards uncut. Thackeray's Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48. Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols., Salisbury, 1766. Walton's Angler, 1653. Paradise Lost, 1667. Lamb's Shakespeare Tales, 2 vols., boards, 1827, 30/- each offered for. Scrope's Salmon Fishing, 1843. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Ireland's Napoleon, 4 vols., coloured plates. Jesse's George Selwyn, 4 vols., 1843. Books with inscriptions written inside by Carlyle, Meredith, Keats, Lamb, &c. All books with coloured plates by Ackerman, &c. Special list of wants free, high prices paid. Please let us know your wants. We can supply everything.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Experts, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham. [Bargain, Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 10 vols., 25/- cost £2 16s. net.]

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRIVATE ACCOUNT BOOK. For Country or City Gentlemen. Guaranteed to fulfil every requirement. Post free 10/6, or Particulars free, McQueen & Co., 1a, Moat Rd., Leicester.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD

(Via NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the {PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,

London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.; City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.; And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—

Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

AN AUSTRALIAN VIEW OF "PUBLIC OPINION."

Here is an Australian estimate of PUBLIC OPINION, from the Sydney Stock and Station Journal, published in Sydney, N.S. Wales:—

"This week there came to hand the very sort of paper that a busy man wants, and that is PUBLIC OPINION. I remember having seen it years ago in England, but somehow amid the multitude of things I saw at home, it failed to grasp my imagination. But it's an all right paper. You would think it was the idea on which Stead modelled his Review of Reviews.

"It is simply what it professes to be, public opinion. It gives you the opinions of leading men and leading papers in regard to the current events of the day. No man out here has either the time or the inclination to read all that is going on in the great British world, and this paper boils it all down, and gives it as purely as possible. What I like about it is the fact that the editor does not appear to have an axe to grind or fad to illuminate. That is what we need. We all have fads of our own here, because I think we are more intelligent than the stay-at-home people. If we're not, we probably think we are, so it's all the same. 'Cogito ergo sum.'"

PUBLIC OPINION A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.

Every Friday Twopence

EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION.

Mohammedan humour in the East. As Wordsworth wrote a "Lesson for Fathers," we might head this a "Lesson for Sermonisers:—

> "A Mohammedan priest, seated in his mosque, was once holding forth to some villagers on the torments of the life to come. When in the full flow of his eloquence, he observed one of his auditors, a poor farmer, weeping profusely.
>
> "'Ah, you sinner!' cried the preacher, interrupting his discourse, 'you are crying, are you? You begin to think of your sins, do you?'
>
> "'No, no,' answered the man; 'I was not thinking of my sins I was thinking of my old he-goat, that grew sick and died a year ago. Never was a beard so like the beard of my old he-goat as yours.'"

* * *

Mr. E. Walter Maunder's purpose in "The Astronomy of the Bible" (Sealey, Clarke & Co., 5s. net) is not to reconstruct the astronomy of the Hebrews, but "to make an astronomical commentary on the Bible." His book is free from technical terms, and many passages, especially in the Psalms, are made more easily intelligible and the force and beauty of their allusions explained. There is a full discussion of the three astronomical miracles—the lengthening of the day on the occasion of Joshua's victory over the Amorites, the turning back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz, and the star of Bethlehem. Of the first of these Mr. Maunder takes the sensible view that the words of the narrative simply state that the length of the march made by the Israelites between noon and sunset was equal to an ordinary march taking the whole of the day. The calculations necessary for determining the dates on which the Jewish feasts fell are also dealt with at length. The book should prove useful to those who require a popular account of the influence of the heavenly bodies upon Hebrew thought and customs.

* * *

Under the title "Irish and English: Portraits and Impressions" (Francis Griffiths, 5s. net), Mr. Robert Lynd has collected together a number of essays contributed to different weekly journals. They are written in a pleasant and graceful style, and are marked by a tolerance of outlook and an understanding of opposing views which is rare enough in books dealing with Ireland. Mr. Lynd is apparently a Sinn-Feiner, but as his early life was passed in the North of Ireland, where "The Boyne Water" and "The Protestant Boys" are the favourite songs, and King William is worshipped on the twelfth of July—not without the spilling of Papist blood and the breaking of Orange heads—he is able to look with tolerance on "the Orange idealist," who holds that the maintenance of Protestant ascendency is essential to "civil and religious liberty." This hopeful and tolerant outlook gives a great charm to the essays, which, besides being entertaining reading, give a good impression of the new forces at work in Ireland to-day.

* * *

"The Passing of Morocco" (Smith, Elder, 5s. net), by Mr. Frederick Moore, is a book of impressions of the country and its people by an American journalist who acted as correspondent to "The Westminster Gazette" during the recent troubles. Mr. Moore witnessed the shooting of prisoners in cold blood by the French, and hints that although this and similar affairs were reported to the London papers by their correspondents, the news was either suppressed or accorded but the briefest notice. About half the book is taken up by a description of the French occupation. The remainder gives a sketchy but readable account of persons and things seen by the author during his visit.

* * *

In the series of "Notable Scottish Trials" "The Trial of A. J. Monson," edited by John W. More, B.A. (Oxon), Advocate (William Hodge & Co., 5s. net), gives verbatim the proceedings of the most important criminal trial in Scotland during the last fifty years—that of Alfred John Monson of murdering his pupil, Lieut. Hambrough, at Ardlamont, Argyleshire, in 1893. The volume is edited by Mr. J. M. More, Advocate, who contributes a terse but lucid introduction. The verdict of "not proven" given by the jury was much criticised at the time, but most students of criminology will, we think, be satisfied, after careful consideration, that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction.

A Novel Reader's Guide:—"Three Girls and a Hermit," by Dorothea Conyers (Hutchinson, 6s.), is an amusing story of modern hunting life in Ireland. The plot is improbable, but the humour is fresh and unforced.—"The Isle of Maids," by M. T. Hainsselin (Lane, 6s.). A novel of adventure. The scene is laid in the Greek archipelago.—"Leroux," by the Hon. Mrs. Walter R. D. Forbes (Greening, 6s.). A good historical novel of the time of the French Revolution. The plot is well constructed, and the reader's interest cleverly retained.—"Follow Up!" by Archibald Douglas Fox (Brown, Langham, 6s.). A story of Harrow School, with plenty of incident and much school-boy slang (date, 1908).—"The Missioner," by E. Phillips Oppenheim (Ward, Lock, 6s.). A simple love story well told, marked from Mr. Oppenheim's usual method by an absence of thrills.

The Week in the City.

The markets have again shown considerable weakness and depression, but as these were owing to special causes it may be hoped they will prove to be only temporary. The threatened strike on the North Eastern railway and the actual lock-out in the shipbuilding industry had a very adverse effect on Home Rails, and on the shares of numerous industrial companies whose fortunes are more or less closely identified with the shipbuilding and shipping. It remains to be seen whether Mr. Winston Churchill's intervention will be equally successful with the efforts of his predecessor in preventing any prolonged labor struggle. The other causes of depression were the bomb-throwing outrage in India, and the renewed fighting on the North-West Frontier. Probably both contributed in about an equal degree to weakness in Consols, Eastern banks, and Indian railways. In neither case does there seem much ground for the extreme pessimism that is being exhibited in some quarters. Among the millions of India there will always be agitation and unrest at some point or other, and because one group has adopted modern anarchist methods there is no reason to fear that a second Mutiny is brewing. The trouble in the North-West which, according to some cheerful prognostications, was going to land us in another Afghan war, is already being stamped out by the prompt military action of the authorities, and satisfactory assurances of his peaceful intentions have been given by the Ameer. The money market is easy, and we look for a revival in markets when the effect of these temporary disturbances passes away.

Financial Difficulties in Natal.

The commercial depression in South Africa is exercising a disastrous effect on the finances of the Colony of Natal, whose revenue is largely dependent on the forwarding of imports for the Transvaal from the Port of Durban over the State railways. The report of the Auditor-General recently presented showed that at the end of 1906-7 there was a deficiency on revenue account of £691,200, of which £198,300 was incurred during that year, and the balance consisted of accumulated deficits brought forward from previous years. The Colony has not been able to raise a loan, and the deficiency has been met by the use of money placed in the hands of the Public Debt Commissioners for loan and railway fund purposes. It is calculated that by the end of the current financial year on June 30th next the deficit will amount to £816,000. Natal Ministries are afraid to propose new taxation because of the unpopularity they would certainly incur, and the only suggestion at present made is that certain wharf, transit, and railway dues that were remitted some years ago should be re-imposed. That, however, would entail delicate negotiations with neighbouring colonies, and the best hope appears to be in a revival of trade such as would increase the yield of existing revenues to a point sufficient to produce an equilibrium. In the meantime, there seems little temptation for British investors, if they are asked to do so, to supply money to a small colony with a very small white population already overburdened with debt.

Lucellum.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's
Navy Cut
Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute 0487.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.
NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING.
TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE
RED WHITE & BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

MAPLE & CO
ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE
CLUB & LOUNGE
CHAIRS & SETTEES
Inspection invited, or Illustrated Catalogue of Chairs sent free
LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD
LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Liver troubles
are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or, if unable to obtain, send direct to MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.
CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Beware of spurious imitations.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.
(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

RUGBY SCHOOL.

THE EXAMINATION FOR SCHOLARSHIPS
Will Begin MONDAY, JUNE 1st.

Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.
BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.
LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.
YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE
UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room. Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

MALVERN COLLEGE.
Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.
The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.
Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.
Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class: Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

ST. GEORGE'S PUBLIC CO-EDUCATIONAL SCHOOL,
HARPENDEN, HERTS.
Headmaster—The REV. CECIL GRANT, M.A.
The next Term begins on Thursday, May 7th.
For prospectus and full particulars apply to The CO-EDUCATIONAL PUBLIC SCHOOLS TRUST, LTD., 41, Moorgate Street, E.C.

MILL HILL SCHOOL,
LONDON, N.W.
The Next Examination for Entrance Scholarships (value 15 guineas to 60 guineas) will be held on Thursday, July 2nd, and two following days. For further particulars apply to the Bursar.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.
Examination for Scholarships (£60-£20) begins on June 10th at Giggleswick, in London, or under conditions, at Preparatory Schools. Apply Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle, Yorks.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.
An Examination will be held on June 24th, 25th, and 26th to fill up not less than 5 residential and 3 non-residential Scholarships and also some Exhibitions. For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, S.W.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.
Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields: gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.
NEW TERM BEGAN MAY 1st.

"PYRENO"
(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Car Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Will be ready in a few days.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

THE SHAKESPEARE APOCRYPHA.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net. On India Paper, 7s. 6d. net.

Being a collection of fourteen plays, which have been ascribed to Shakespeare. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Bibliography by C. F. TUCKER-BROOKE. With 13 facsimile title pages. [Immediately

CRITICAL ESSAYS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net each.

Edited with Introduction and Notes, by J. E. SPINGARN. Vol. I. 1605-1650. Vol. II. 1650-1685.

Outlook.—"Mr. Spingarn's long and learned introduction discusses with brilliancy the tendencies and characteristics of the literature of the time. His texts are selected with judgment, and edited with the minimum of interference between us and the original."

COLERIDGE'S BIOGRAPHIA LITERARIA AND AESTHETICAL ESSAYS.

Crown 8vo. 8s. net.

By J. SHAWCROSS. 2 vols.

Nation.—"The 'Biographia Literaria' cannot be neglected by any student of literature. . . . Mr. Shawcross is to be congratulated on the production of this sound and workmanlike edition. It contains everything that is necessary to a profitable study of the text."

COLERIDGE'S LITERARY CRITICISM.

Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

With an Introduction by J. W. MACKAIL. Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.

Westminster Gazette.—"This little volume is delightful to handle, to read, and to contemplate on the bookshelf. It contains the bulk of Coleridge's best, or at any rate best-known critical work."

TACITUS DIALOGUS AGRICOLA AND GERMANIA.

Extra fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Translated by W. HAMILTON FYFE. [New volume Oxford Library of Translations.

THE WORKS OF ARISTOTLE.

8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Translated into English under the Editorship of J. A. SMITH and W. D. ROSS.

Part I. THE PARVA NATURALIA. By J. S. BEARE and G. R. T. ROSS.

Cambridge Review.—"In the 'Parva Naturalia' there is much to stimulate curiosity. The new version is everywhere readable, and the pains taken to ensure accuracy are very evident."

8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Part II. DE LINEIS INSECABILIBUS. By H. H. JOACHIM.

Athenæum.—"Mr. Joachim shows a sound independent judgment, and makes a number of valuable contributions to the study of the text."

Part III. METAPHYSICS. By W. D. ROSS. [Immediately.

BONAPARTISM.

8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Six Lectures delivered in the University of London. By H. A. L. FISHER.

Nation.—"For suggestiveness of utterance, aptness of illustration, and a condensation which makes it impossible to realise that this is but 120 pages of normal print, it would be difficult to overpraise this little volume. There is here set out in a form more lucid and eloquent than in many voluminous monographs and histories, a masterly analysis of the principles and bed-rock powers and weaknesses of the Napoleonic Empires."

THE MIRROUR OF THE BLESSED LYF OF JESU CHRIST.

Small 4to, 21s. net.

Translated out of Latin by NICHOLAS LOVE. Edited by LAWRENCE F. POWELL.

THE GREEK VERSION OF THE TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS.

8vo, 18s. net.

Edited from nine MSS., together with the variants of the Armenian and Slavonic Versions and some Hebrew Fragments. By R. H. CHARLES.

Manchester Guardian.—"For scholars, the Greek text is essential, and here it is with an apparatus criticus so complete that every other word is starred or numbered for reference to a textual note."

CATALOGUE OF THE COINS IN THE INDIAN MUSEUM, CALCUTTA.

Including the Cabinet of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

Royal 8vo, 40s. net.

Vol. III. MUGHAL EMPERORS OF INDIA. By H. NELSON WRIGHT. [Immediately.

Previously Published: Vol. I. By VINCENT A. SMITH. 30s. net.; or separately, Part I. THE EARLY FOREIGN DYNASTIES AND THE GUPTAS, 15s. net. Part II. ANCIENT COINS OF INDIAN TYPES, 6s. net. Part III. PERSIAN, MEDIAEVAL, SOUTH INDIAN, AND MISCELLANEOUS COINS, 10s. 6d. net. Vol. II. Part I. THE SULTANS OF DELHI. Part II. CONTEMPORARY DYNASTIES IN INDIA, by H. NELSON WRIGHT, with 25 plates, 30s. net. (The first section of Part II. by Sir JAMES BOURDILLON.) (Published for the Trustees of the Indian Museum.)

Academy: (Vol. II.).—"Will be of great value to seekers after first-hand data, whether for the study of Indian history or of Indian metrology. For the latter especially, this cabinet, with its large number of good specimens showing but little wear, is especially useful, and the simplicity of arrangement, together with the thoroughness of Mr. Wright's brief introduction to each section, makes this volume easy to handle, and far more attractive than we should have thought a catalogue of such monotonous coins could be. . . . In all points of real importance the catalogue is all a catalogue should be."

THE ENGLISH FACTORIES IN INDIA, VOL. II., 1622-1623.

[Immediately.

8vo, 12s. 6d. net each.

A Calendar of Documents in the India Office and British Museum. By W. FOSTER. With a Map. Published under the Patronage of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council.

Previously Published: Vol. I. 1618-1621.

Nation: (Vol. I.).—"This volume is something more than a mere calendar of State papers, and the raciness of the letters appears startling to anyone accustomed to the dry commercial phraseology of the present day. . . . This volume is a romance, with the additional and inestimable advantage of being true, and, therefore, full of human interest."

THE EARLY HISTORY OF INDIA.

From 600 B.C. to the Muhammadan Conquest. Including the Invasion of Alexander the Great.

8vo, 14s. net.

By V. A. SMITH. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With Maps, Plans, and other Illustrations.

Nation.—"We heartily welcome a revised and enlarged edition of Mr. Vincent Smith's 'Early History of India.' . . . The work has already become the recognised text-book for all students of Indian History, and is one of the most remarkable productions of Anglo-Indian scholarship. The extreme difficulty makes Mr. Vincent Smith's success all the more notable."

A HISTORY OF THE PENINSULAR WAR.

8vo, 14s. net each.

By CHARLES OMAN.

Vol. III. (Sept. 1809—Dec. 1810); OCANA—CADIZ—BUSSACO—TORRES VEDRAS. With 14 Maps and 5 Photogravures and other Illustrations.

Already Published: Vol. I. 1807-1809, to CORUNNA. Vol. II. 1809, to TALAVERA.

Athenæum.—Mr. Oman's work is marked with a thoroughness of detail that is unhappily far from common in the days of text-books and popular compendiums. . . . This work is marked by a scholarly eagerness to make use of every available source."

A SURVEY OF LONDON.

By JOHN STOW. Reprinted from the Text of 1603, with Introduction and Notes by C. L. KINGSFORD. 2 vols. [Shortly.

TYPES OF FLORAL MECHANISM.

Royal 4to, 21s. net.

A Selection of Diagrams and Descriptions of Common Flowers, Arranged as an Introduction to the Systematic Study of Angiosperms. By A. H. CHURCH. Part I., Types I.-XII. (Jan.-April). With 39 Coloured Plates and numerous other Figures.

KNUTH'S HANDBOOK OF FLORAL POLLINATION.

Based upon Hermann Müller's work, "The Fertilization of Flowers by Insects."

Royal 8vo, 31s. 6d. net.

Translated by J. R. AINSWORTH DAVIS.

Vol. II. OBSERVATIONS ON FLOWER POLLINATION MADE IN EUROPE AND THE ARCTIC REGIONS ON SPECIES BELONGING TO THE NATURAL ORDERS. RANUNCULACEAE TO STYLIDIEAE. With 210 Figures in the Text.

Royal 8vo, 18s. net.

Previously Published: Vol. I. INTRODUCTION AND LITERATURE. With 81 Figures in the Text.

Journal of the Royal Horticultural Society.—"Everyone who studies the subject will not fail to provide himself with this most important and exhaustive work."

PROSPECTUSES ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 7.] SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
Poverty and Pauperism ... 212
Back to the Lords 213
The Strenuous Peace 215
Natal and the Native Question 216
The late Prime Minister and Home Rule. By John Redmond, M.P. 217

LIFE AND LETTERS:—
Hope. By John Galsworthy 218
The Faith of Free Thought... 219
The Tramp World 220

SHORT STORY:—
Paka the Cat. Translated from Swahili. By Captain C. H. Stigand 221

THE DRAMA:—
A Dramatic "Conversation." By H. W. M. 222

ART:—
The Sorolla Exhibition ... 223

POETRY:—
A Song. By Herbert Trench 223

COMMUNICATIONS:—
The Territorial Artillery. By E. Crawshay - Williams (late Lieut. R.F.A.) 224

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
The Sugar Convention. By Anti-Convention 225
The Justice of the Licensing Bill. By Country Brewer 225
The British Sunday and the Exhibition. By Yves Guyot 226
Life of Delane. By Arthur Irwin Dasent 226
The Trade in Fiction. By Clement Shorter 226
Pensions and the Sinking Fund. By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P. 227

PAGE

The Dundee Election. By F. Hubert Jones 227

THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 228
Books to be Read 228

REVIEWS:—
The Decay of Divine Right 230
Lemaitre on Racine 230
A Tale of the South 232

BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
William Clarke 234
The Poetical Works of George Darley 236
From Pekin to Sikkim ... 236
A Novel Reader's Guide ... 236

THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 236

SUPPLEMENT:—
The Strategy of Pitt. By Dr. J. Holland Rose 243
The Riddle of the Bacchae. By Professor Gilbert Murray 244
An Agnostic Establishment. By G. K. Chesterton... .. 245
The Decay of German Drama 245
The History of Folk Lore. By Edward Clodd 247
The Arab in Architecture. By L. March-Philipps ... 247
The Board School—and After 248
A Modern Song Writer ... 250
The Land of the Wallaby ... 250
An English Squire 252
A Budget of Novels:—
An Engagement of Convenience 254
Roses and Rue... 254
The Alien Sisters 254
The New Galatea 254
The New Dominion 254
A Tale of To-morrow's Wars 254
A House of Cards 254
A Daughter of Belial ... 254

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The tide of political reaction has been vigorously stemmed during the week. Mr. Churchill has been returned for Dundee by a majority of 2,709 votes against the popular Protectionist candidate, and of 3,065 over the not very strong representative of Labor, whose candidature was disapproved by many leaders of the movement. Mr. Churchill probably secured the full normal strength of the Liberal vote in Dundee, and as he expounded Free Trade with extreme brilliancy and knowledge to all sections of the community, it is worth noting that the cumulative majority against Protection is enormous. A similar result has been obtained in the Montrose Burghs, where Mr. Robert Harcourt, younger son of the statesman, has been elected by a majority of 1,146 votes over Mr. Burgess, the labor candidate, and of 1,507 over the Protectionists. The Conservative vote, insignificant as it was at the General Election, has actually dwindled, and it is clear that both urban and rural Scotland stands fast to the Government, to Free Trade, and to the Scottish Land Bill. But the multiplicity of candidates suggests the necessity of some more accurate means of defining the mind of the electorate. For example, we ought to know, especially with such an issue as Free Trade, whether the workmen would prefer, failing the election of their special champion, to be represented by a Liberal or a Radical, or by a Tory-Protectionist. The same width of choice ought to be allowed to the Conservative Free Traders, if any members of this dwindling tribe are left at the time of the General Election. It seems to us that the machinery of the alternative or transferable vote is quite simple enough to answer such a purpose. Unless some such plan is adopted, many candidates will be returned by minorities of voters.

* * *

The Government is forging steadily ahead with its uncontentious, or partly contentious, bills. On Tuesday the Irish Universities Bill was read a second time by 344 votes to 31. The insignificant minority included 8 Liberals, but its main strength came from Unionists. The general assent of the Opposition, however, was conveyed by Sir Edward Carson in a speech which Mr. Birrell described as "making him a happy man." Mr. Balfour, who is highly favourable, has doubtless guaranteed the passage of the measure through the Lords. The considered protest came through a Nonconformist amendment moved by Mr. Hutton and seconded by Mr. Hazel. Both these gentlemen prefer Mr. Bryce's Bill, and their objection to its substitute was a dual one: first, that in spirit, if not in form, the measure was a State endowment of denominationalism; and, secondly, that it fixed the Protestant and Catholic youth of Ireland in separate educational "pens." In answer, Mr. Haldane was able to show that the action of Trinity College had destroyed the only possible alternative, and that the Government must either give Mr. Birrell's Bill or nothing. Mr. Birrell insisted on the democratic and self-governing sides of his scheme, and on the openness of the new Universities. He claimed the support of the Irish Bishops, in spite of Dr. O'Dwyer's doubtful words, and also strong academic backing for the Belfast University. The vote in the House makes the Bill secure.

* * *

The second reading of the Housing Bill was moved by Mr. Burns on Tuesday in a speech full of optimism and of vivacious, highly coloured phrasing. Little party opposition exists, and the second reading was carried without a division. But the criticism on both sides was free, and on the point of the spirit and method of the officials of the Local Government Board, extremely severe. Nothing, indeed, was clearer than that the Board had completely lost the confidence of the House as a progressive or initiative force in local life. The chief points of criticism were the inadequacy of the District Council as a housing authority, and the superior claim of the County Council, a plea for loans on terms at least as generous as the Irish Laborers' Bill provides, a demand that local authorities should have larger powers of town planning, including a limit to the number of houses built per acre, and a call for a regular survey and register of black spots in each housing area. Both Mr. Burns's and Mr. Masterman's speeches were conciliatory, and it is clear that the House will require an enlargement of powers on the one hand and more generous handling by the Local Government Board on the other. We are afraid the lack both of money and power may cripple the local authorities, and that even the reorganised Housing Department, which Mr. Burns promises will not be free from the hard routine methods of the Board. Mr. Lyttelton, who just now is speaking very wisely in the House, represented a friendly, if critical, Opposition.

* * *

The House of Lords, on the thin excuse that the Government had failed to explain the meaning and intention of the Scottish Valuation Bill, has again destroyed it by two amendments to Clause I. The first amendment, which was carried by 119 votes to 32, made the assessment of the capital land value dependent on the will of any local authority. The plea was that such valuation was only necessary in urban centres. The second amendment, which has staggered even the "Morning Post," took away the liberty which the first change pretended to grant. It refused to allow the local authority to discover the capital or selling value of the land in its area, and allowed them to disclose only the yearly value. This, of course, stops the fair rating of land "held up" by the owner against the needs of a growing town community. This was carried, against the protest of the Lord Chancellor, by 84 to 22. The Bill is now dead.

* * *

The Afghan Mohmands have withdrawn across the Durand line, and the Amir has forbidden any of his subjects to preach a Jehad under penalty of losing his tongue, or to take up arms on pain of losing his feet. Nevertheless, a military expedition, three brigades strong, entered the Mohmand country on Wednesday, following along the Gaudao Valley the route General Elles took in 1897. The tribes were summoned to attend a Jirgah to discuss terms of peace, but few complied. The moment is ill-chosen for military operations; the tribes have had time to get in their crops, the weather is very hot, and cholera has broken out among the British troops, all of whom, except one regiment, have had to be left behind. Officially nothing has transpired as the cause of the present trouble, and the House of Commons is a good deal more amiably acquiescent than befits the "Grand Inquest of the nation."

* * *

The Duma has been insulted and has apologised. The railway estimates were laid before it, it found the accounts inadequate, contradictory, and obscure, and the Budget Committee proposed the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee of investigation. The Government preferred a Departmental Committee, and M. Kokovtsof, the Minister of Finance, put the Duma in its place by saying, "Thank God, we have no Parliament in Russia." The next day some members of the Duma protested, but the President cut short the discussion on the Minister's "ill-considered" phrase. M. Kokovtsof, however, now had his grievance; he insisted on an apology for the word "ill-considered," and "to avert a conflict" the President gave it. In justice to the Duma, however, it must be added that it pressed the Parliamentary Committee and cut down the railway estimates. Its pride, its dignity, its efficiency, and its Liberalism are not high, but it does perform some of the work of the grand inquest of the nation. Even to that little, however, the Government is not resigned.

* * *

The Kaiser and all the German sovereigns went to Vienna last week to congratulate the Emperor Francis Joseph on attaining the sixtieth year of his reign. Perhaps "Simplicissimus" represented the Emperor's feelings not unfaithfully in a cartoon depicting him brushing away a swarm of crowned flies, but the ceremony passed off very amiably, and a host of decorations was distributed. Politically, no doubt, the Kaiser's idea was to demonstrate the closeness of the union between these two members of the Triple Alliance, and for a parallel of a gathering of all the German rulers round a Hapsburg prince one must go back to the Frankfurt Diet of Princes of 1863, which heralded the expulsion of Austria from the German brotherhood. Last week's ceremony was heavily dashed with melodramatic artifice. Nevertheless, it did symbolise the success which Prussia has met with in conciliating her beaten rival, and it was a tribute to the skill and the insight of this part of Bismarck's foreign policy.

* * *

The second ballots for the municipal elections, which took place on Sunday (writes our Paris correspondent), showed a more definite tendency than was apparent from the results of the first ballots on May 3rd. The first ballots, which were decisive in about two-thirds of the French Communes, scarcely altered the political situation. It is true that the Republicans of various shades had a net gain of 851 Communes, but that is merely the ordinary rate of progression, and the changes were mostly in the rural districts for the simple reason that the towns were already solidly Republican. Of the 359 chefs-lieux of Departments and arrondissements the results of the first ballot were decisive in 241, and the Right had a majority in only thirty-two, a net loss of fifteen. It will be seen that there is not much room for Republican gains in the important towns. Indeed, as I have said before, the issue in French politics is no longer between Republican and anti-Republican, nor between clerical and anti-clerical; the new dividing line is the social question, as the municipal elections have clearly demonstrated. The exceptions to that rule are those districts, particularly Brittany, where the stage of political evolution is at least ten years behind that of the rest of France.

* * *

But although the elections show that the clerical reaction is further off than ever, there are distinct symptoms of a reaction against Socialism. The Socialists have lost three seats to the Radicals in Paris, and have been deprived of their majority at Brest, Dijon, Saint-Etienne, Toulouse, and Marseilles (where the Council is now equally divided between Socialists and Moderates). There are certain gains in less important places to set off against these losses, and it would seem that the purely Socialist vote has considerably increased in the country as a whole. Nevertheless, the "Humanité" admits a distinct set-back to the Unified-Socialist Party. The Independent Socialists have held their own everywhere but at Saint-Etienne, where their defeat was due entirely to the division in the Socialist ranks. It must be admitted, therefore, that the "Temps" has some justification for its claim that the municipal elections are a triumph for the policy of "La Conservation Sociale," though that triumph is much less decisive than the opponents of Socialism would like to believe. The chief cause of this result is, of course, the break up of the old Bloc. The breach between the Socialists and the old-fashioned Radicals was inevitable so soon as the Church question was disposed of, but it must be admitted that both M. Clemenceau and M. Jaurès have helped to widen it.

On Monday Mr. Roosevelt laid the foundation-stone of the building presented by Mr. Carnegie to the Bureau of American Republics, established twenty years ago, to bring Latin and Teutonic America into closer relations. He greeted the Latin Republics as elder sisters, predicted for them in the twentieth century a greater expansion than for the United States, and took occasion to call Mr. Root the greatest of Secretaries of State because of his tour through South America. But one may well doubt whether Mr. Roosevelt's soft words or Mr. Root's diplomacy will charm those for whom they were intended. The Monroe doctrine has kept Europe's hands off Latin America, but it has left the United States free, and they have used their licence to the full. Mr. Roosevelt's exploits in Cuba, his disruption with Colombia, and the threatened war with Venezuela have not dissipated the fear that the United States are the real source of danger to Latin American liberties. The bigger Republics, however, like Argentina and Brazil, have for the moment reasons to be friendly with the United States, so that the smaller cannot speak freely, though some of them during the Hague Conference did not throw away the chance of uttering home truths.

* * *

Last week the South African Intercolonial Conference met to discuss customs and railway rates, questions with regard to which the interests of the internal colonies conflict with those of the colonies that have a sea coast, adopted the principle of closer union, and the delegates undertook to ask their respective Parliaments to appoint members of a national convention to draft a constitution. All parties and colonies have made up their minds that union is the only permanent cure for sectional differences, but opinion is divided between federation and amalgamation. The Dutch generally are for amalgamation, as making for economy and welding closely the members of the Africander nation; the Progressives incline to federation. A difficulty in the way of any form of union is the native franchise, which exists in the Cape and Natal, and which neither party is likely to sanction in a United South Africa. On the other hand, the natives, with or without a franchise, will benefit under the rule of a South Africa big enough to evolve a rational policy, and too big to be subject to wild gusts of "color" panic.

* * *

The "protecting" European Powers have decided to withdraw their troops from Crete within a year's time, the conditions of internal order, tranquillity, and protection for the Mussulmans having all been fulfilled. This is, of course, a first step to reunion with the Motherland. Greece and Crete will soon be one, and the war will not have been without fruit.

* * *

The Franco-British Exhibition—or the "Ententeries," as it is dreadfully nicknamed—was opened on Thursday by the Prince of Wales. It is at once a huge and a brilliant show, and we hope that all sight-seeing England and a good part of the French nation will visit it. It revives the era of international exhibitions, with the messages of mutual understanding and knowledge which all such shows convey. It should especially help our people to realise the brilliancy and lightness of modern French city architecture, such as that which has carved a new and splendid vista out of the beautiful Alexander bridge in Paris and the two new art palaces which guard its approaches. A decision, which we regret, has been taken to close the Exhibition entirely on Sundays. A proposal to open all its parts would have been too repugnant both to the religious feeling of our people and to their social and industrial habits. On the other hand, complete closure seems ungracious to our French guests, and out of harmony with our own Sunday opening of picture galleries. Surely the grounds and art-galleries of the Exhibition might have been kept open without a great burden of Sunday labor. Meanwhile we strongly support the suggestion of the "Westminster Gazette" that some pains should be taken to provide for the entertainment of the hundreds of thousands of French people who will visit London, and that the Government will do its part in this agreeable business. London, as a rule, is a bad hostess.

* * *

"The Times" has been heavily mulcted as the result of its libel on Mr. John Murray, the famous publisher. The jury gave a verdict for Mr. Murray of £7,500 damages. The amount is in dispute, and may be reduced on appeal, but it is difficult to understand why the case was defended at all. Mr. Murray was able to show that he had not made the extravagant profits on the sale of "The Letters of Queen Victoria," as "The Times" suggested, and the charge of ill-conduct made against a man and a firm of such unblemished honor was singularly unfortunate. The most curious revelation of the trial was the disclosure of the way in which "The Times" had mixed up its literary judgments with its quarrel with the publishers. A sentence objecting to the high price—three guineas—of the work was inserted, at the instance of the manager, Mr. Moberly Bell, in a review of its literary merits, while Mr. Hooper, the manager of the Book Club, arranged for the writing and insertion of the libellous letter signed "Artifex," which "The Times" printed in its largest type, as if it came from an important outsider. The Editor of "The Times" appears to have had nothing to say to either of these transactions. Journals, like individuals, have their moments of madness. Those who are interested in "The Times" may well pray for its speedy recovery.

* * *

It is wise to trust the counsels of a friend, and we suggest that the "suffragettes," who have already drawn away from Miss Maloney's performance at Dundee with a muffin bell, should take to heart Mr. Jerome's criticisms of their general tactics. We are sure that it is sound. Mr. Jerome says truly that the time is coming (it has already come) when the suffragists are ceasing to be a nuisance and becoming a mere "comic relief."

> "If you are fighting for fighting's sake, then" (continues Mr. Jerome), "your conduct of the campaign is above criticism. But if you are fighting for Votes for Women—for the admittance of woman into the very serious business of national politics—then you must consider the effect of your tactics, not upon the editor of the 'Tariff Reform Journal,' on whose support you can depend for just so long as you are helping him in his endeavour to tax the people's bread; not upon the publican and brewer, who I can quite understand being willing to carry you shoulder high; not upon that hooligan element in politics that cheers Mrs. Pankhurst and Mr. Hunnable with like impartial anticipation, and that would accord precisely the same welcome to the appearance upon the political platform of Raisuli's warriors or 'Little Tich'—but the effect you are producing upon the mind of the average educated thoughtful elector, with whom the solution of the problem ultimately rests."

After all, it was hardly necessary to start a great propaganda for Woman Suffrage in order to show that women can behave at election times quite as foolishly as men.

Politics and Affairs.

POVERTY AND PAUPERISM.

We spoke of the Budget last week as the triumph of Free Trade finance. We would say a word of it now as the inauguration of a new principle in the dealings of the State with poverty. The system of Old Age Pensions which it creates is admittedly but a beginning. It has certain defects of detail of which we shall speak presently, and it has the great limitation that it will touch but a fraction of the urban workmen who, to the shame of our industrial conditions, too often die before the age at which its benefits begin. These limitations will, we trust, be removed at no distant period, not perhaps in the first instance by a general lowering of the age, but rather on the French plan, by the inclusion of those of sixty-five and upwards who are certified as unable to work. But however this may be, whatever extensions of the principle may hereafter be thought best, the principle itself is a new one. Let us consider for a moment in what the novelty consists. The Poor Law of Elizabeth made it the duty of a public authority to secure the destitute against actual starvation at the cost of public funds. This was in substance, if not in strict law, to secure to all members of the community the right to bare maintenance. But this right only came into operation under conditions. The applicant must be destitute, and he must be willing to undergo such restrictions of liberty, and to accept such conditions of life, as it pleased the powers to impose upon him. Relief was given, in a word, not to the poor but to paupers, and involved in it the loss of caste attendant upon pauperism. In this lowering of status, the thriftless and the unfortunate, the wastrel and the laborer whose only fault was that he had failed to raise himself above the average level of a class whose income never sufficed to provide for his old age, were confounded in one heap. In so far as taxation fell upon the laborer, and directly and indirectly a good deal of taxation generally does fall upon him, the system made the man who was just keeping his head above water bear his part in bringing up to the surface his fellow who had allowed himself to sink. No help was given to the independent poor, because help and independence were held to be mutually exclusive. Every man was supposed to be properly capable of standing on his own feet. If he fell he was to be saved from utter destruction, but it was to be known that he had fallen. As long as he stood he stood alone. The State did not concern itself with the poor, but only with the pauper.

The new system of which the present Budget is the first legislative outcome starts from the same conception of the right to maintenance which underlies the Poor Law, but joins with it a new conception of the problems of poverty and pauperism on the one hand and of the social basis of property on the other. To confine ourselves here to the first point, it is felt that a civilised community so wealthy in the aggregate as ours ought to be able to assure to all decently conducted citizens a fair provision for a civilised existence throughout life. It is recognised that where this provision fails the causes may be grouped not all under one head, but under two very different heads. The cause, that is to say, may be failure in the individual, idleness, wastefulness, immorality, or crime. If so, the case is a case of pauperism, and the treatment required is restrictive and semi-penal. But the cause may also be a failure in the economic organisation of society. In a society which has long since lost all touch with primitive communism the majority, in our country the very great majority, are wholly without means of livelihood save what they can earn for themselves with their own brains and their own hands. It might be so that the ordinary man could earn by his labour a sufficiency for all the purposes of life, health, and efficiency for himself and his children. It might be so, but it is not. Analysis of our economic conditions shows that after all the undoubted improvement in the general welfare of the working class during the last century, it remains true that competitive industry secures something like half of the entire wealth of the nation for a very small minority of the population, leaving to the remainder a wage which never amounts to superfluity, and is for some 25 to 30 per cent. of the entire population barely sufficient for the mere physical maintenance of an average family, leaving no margin for sickness, old age, and bad times. It is this fact, established on a scientific basis by the researches of Mr. Charles Booth and Mr. Rowntree, which constitutes the problem of Poverty.

The problem of poverty and the problem of pauperism, thus understood, become two quite distinct questions. They are not, of course, disconnected. Acute and prolonged poverty is a cause of the moral deterioration that gives rise to pauperism. But in themselves they are distinct phenomena and require separate treatment. The new departure that we are now taking consists essentially in this, that we seek to remedy the evils of poverty before they have ripened into the worse evils of pauperism. We are recognising that the poorer classes have a claim on the State organisation, a claim which is not met by the economic forces that govern the higgling of the market, and is to be met by the direct provision of certain definite needs. We hold it possible, by exercising due care, to make this provision in such a way as not to diminish the incentives to independent exertion, but rather to stimulate and nourish them by the added sense of security and the opened outlook of hope. One of such needs is provision for the years when the strength is spent and labor is no longer possible. Others which will ultimately come upon us with equal force are the medical attendance of the sick, and, in some cases, the provision of prime necessaries for children. The comprehensive reform of the Poor Law, which will be the main work of Parliament next year, will, we take it, be based on the separation of this State-function from that of the semi-penal treatment of the regular pauper. The more liberal treatment of honourable poverty and the more drastic severity with pauperism will, we can readily see, go hand in hand. The more we have done to secure the means of honest independence to everyone who chooses to have it, the more rigidly we can mark off for separate treatment those who will not have it. At present the sheep and the goats are too often confounded, and the idleness and incompetence of the parent is too often visited on the child, who, ill-nourished and ill-tended from the beginning, grows up in his turn incapable of filling a place in the industrial organism, and fitted only to recruit the pauper class from which he sprang. We have to recognise that between low wages and the fluctuations of trade the system of modern industry does not afford to large classes such a share in the great wealth which they help to produce as enables them to provide for some things that are essential. We have to see that these things are provided, and we have to punish only those who do not on their side make adequate efforts towards their provision.

The first step in this direction is to deal with the aged and remove them, as far as possible, from the sphere of the Poor Law. In this Mr. Asquith's Budget makes a noteworthy beginning. It is, as its author acknowledges, only a beginning, and, as such, we do not look at it too critically. But there is one point of detail on which criticism is fastening, and to which we referred last week. The principle of the income limit is introduced from motives of economy, and we agree that it is better to retain the limit than further raise the age. But the recognition of the limit detracts something from the principles of the measure. The ideal in this matter is to make the State provision a minimum available for all who do not forfeit it by some act of their own, to which each may freely add what he can by his own exertions and his own thrift. This ideal cannot be fully met by any scheme which excludes all people with incomes exceeding ten shillings a week. But we think it might with little, if any, extra cost be better met than it is in Mr. Asquith's proposal. In rejecting a sliding scale the Government have exposed their scheme to the very serious objection that it makes it a positive disadvantage to a man to have an income of anything from ten to fifteen shillings a week. The man with precisely ten shillings a week and no more will get his five shillings from the State. The unlucky owner of 10s. 6d. or eleven shillings will get nothing at all. We would lay it down as an axiom of any pension scheme that it is not at any point to penalise thrift. A great part of the object of the scheme is to help those who have helped themselves and not confine all relief to the destitute.

Now, in this respect the introduction of the income limit creates a difficulty, because it must mark a point at which the benefit of the pension is to cease. But obviously the drawbacks are much diminished if the pension is not snuffed out at once but diminished gradually as the limit is approached, that is to say, if there is a sliding scale in accordance with which the pension diminishes to zero as the income increases beyond a given figure. The scale should be arranged to meet two conditions. There must be no point at which a man would lose by having added to his independent income; and as far as possible he ought to gain something for every addition that he has made to his savings. He cannot, under the conditions, gain the whole amount, but he ought to gain something. Both ends can be achieved if his pension diminishes more slowly than the income increases—if, for example, for every additional penny of income the pension be diminished by a halfpenny. But without carrying the matter as far as pennies and halfpennies, we can roughly secure what we want by grading the pension by shillings. Thus, for example, if every one receives the full five shillings a week up to the ten shilling income limit, people with incomes of more than ten shillings but less than twelve shillings would be required to state their incomes and might receive the sum necessary to bring their incomes to fifteen shillings. This would at least prevent them from being losers as compared with the possessors of ten shillings only. But, further, if the independent income exceeded twelve shillings and were under fourteen shillings, the total to be realised might be increased, say to sixteen shillings. It would thus remain worth while for a man who could command eleven shillings a week to add another shilling to his income if possible. The whole scale would work out thus:—

Incomes of	10s. to 12s.	would be made up to	15s.	0d.
,,	12s. to 14s.	,, ,,	16s.	0d.
,,	14s. to 16s.	,, ,,	17s.	0d.
,,	16s. to 17s. 6d.	,, ,,	17s.	6d.

At no point would any one lose by an addition to his own income. It is true that within limits incomes would be equalised, but these limits would be narrow, and there would always be a motive for over-stepping them. The figures given are, of course, chosen merely for purposes of illustration. They show that a sliding scale which would obviate the one serious objection of detail to Mr. Asquith's plan would be quite a simple affair, involving no more than a declaration of income from the pensioner. The figures we have given would, of course, increase the cost, but so far as the principle of the sliding scale is concerned there is nothing to prevent the Government from beginning the reductions at 8s. and so balancing matters.* The essential principle is surely that the pension should diminish more slowly than the independent income, so that the combined income should be stationary for short stages only and then should increase. The device of this income limit is at best awkward, but it is possible to overcome the most serious objections to it by this plan, and we confess that we see no other.

BACK TO THE LORDS.

The later batch of bye-elections shows a steady recovery of Ministerial strength, which the first series of contests seemed likely to undermine. Clearly the North stands firm, and there should be nothing in the situation in the Midlands which is not recoverable. Manchester, though it was a loss, was better than Peckham or Mid Devon, or even than Wolverhampton; Dewsbury was better than Manchester; and Kincardineshire, Dundee, and Montrose leave little or nothing to be desired. The standing difficulty of Progressive Governments is to carry London and the South of England on their backs. Lancashire does not long desert them, Yorkshire and the northerly counties are nearly always steady. Scotland and Wales,

* By way of further illustration, we may show the effect of a sliding scale starting with 8s. incomes and reducing the amount of pension by sixpences instead of shillings:—

Incomes between	8s. and 9s.	would be made up to	13s.	0d.
,, ,,	9s. and 10s.	,, ,,	13s.	6d.
,, ,,	10s. and 11s.	,, ,,	14s.	0d.
,, ,,	11s. and 12s.	,, ,,	14s.	6d.

and so on. The final limit would be 16s. 6d.

possessing a sounder and a more widely diffused educational basis, and far more intellectual stability than the Southern English, maintain a continuous Radical tradition. Mr. Churchill's genius for oratory and exposition has revived the intellectual credit of the Government, which, indeed, never stood low, and some of the worst features of the Parliamentary situation are being modified. Large projects of reforms, like the Universities Bill and the Housing Bill, are moving steadily forward. The Budget reveals, in a dramatic form, the meaning and end of its social policy, and fortifies the sound constructive schemes in industrial statesmanship which Mr. Lloyd George has initiated. Moreover, there is a rebound from the maddened onslaught of the brewers on the Licensing Bill, which enables the people to perceive the great social value of its main line of advance, and the way in which a thoroughly just and acceptable measure can be developed from it. It is clear that there will be no rush to Protection, if only Free Trade is properly guarded and its true meaning to the mass of the British people explained. Even in the Capital, in spite of the loose-lipped vulgarity of its popular Press, and of the lightness of its outlook on serious questions, the workmen and the middle-class traders cannot easily be duped into abandoning the system of free imports on which her life and that of her great waterway depend. Let the Government stand firm; the country will, in the end, stand to it.

Nevertheless, this week's events remind us of where the main peril to Liberalism resides, and where, also, its capital opportunity arises. The House of Lords, utterly rejecting and despising the clear evidence of the Scottish elections, has for the second time smashed up the whole fabric of the Ministry's Scottish legislation. Both the Land Bill and the Valuation Bill have been destroyed. Not only cannot the Government take any step to reapportion the land of Scotland between her workers and her pleasure-seekers, but it is not even allowed to discover the capital value of the soil, and to place such knowledge at the disposal of statesmen and municipal administrators. This action is of deep significance, for it is most probable that on the action of the landlords in the three countries and their representatives in the Upper Chamber the entire land programme of the Ministry may go to wreck. Already it is an open question whether the English Land Bill will not be a dead letter owing to the slackness of the County Councils and the difficulty of getting land appropriated to small holdings. "Why should my land be taken?" each landowner and large farmer asks in turn, and as yet no effective pressure seems likely to come from the Councils. Equally serious is the prospect of the Housing Bill, if no means be found of opening up land on the outskirts of our towns in order to relieve the pressure at the centre. The House of Lords consists in the main of obstinate and deeply prejudiced men, who are not even amenable to such temperate counsels as the late Duke of Devonshire, and, on occasions, even Lord Salisbury, were willing to tender them. With them every Bill in which they scent a determination to open up land to the people or to appropriate to them some portion of the land values which they create in the mere process of living, working, building, and trading, is anathema. There is no pretence here of any regulative, supervising, constitutional function. Lord Rosebery's campaign against the Scottish Land Bill has utterly failed, and the Government's hold on the country has, if anything, been strengthened by it. But this does not affect the Peers, who, indeed, in this matter of the land, act not on constitutional theory, or even by political calculation, but purely by prejudice and self-interest, using the power of veto which has slipped into their hands to preserve their half-feudal status against the community. The constitutional figment will, of course, be revived when it is useful to Mr. Balfour and the Tory Party, for example, should it seem to be generally expedient to the joint concern to destroy the Licensing Bill. But the mainspring of action on the land question by the House of Lords is seen when selfishness and timidity stand nakedly up, stripped of their political drapery.

The question of the House of Lords, therefore, continually revives itself, and rebuts the easy calculation that a Liberal Government can enjoy a normal term of activity, going to the electors when it suits its purpose. Even the proclamation of such an aim defeats it, for the Lords take it to mean that they can work their will on the Government's measures, reducing or rejecting them, and thus sapping the prestige of the Administration, without danger of a direct electoral appeal on their own existence. It seems to us that this menace calls for a double line of attack. Wherever the Commons can direct the course of legislation by itself, where the Government can work by taxation—as, if the worst comes to the worst, it can work in the case of the Licensing Bill, and as it can certainly work in the case of the assessment of land values—it should do the country and itself the double service of asserting the superior constitutional power of the Commons, and of obtaining a definite, concrete victory over the Lords. Beyond this it can, after achieving its task of reorganising the poor-law, set itself to work out and present to the people this problem of land and land taxation in the clearest and most conspicuous outline, and to join to it the question of the veto of the Peers. On both these issues the Liberal Party is on familiar and historic ground. Both are uniting issues, and it is essential that all sections of the Progressive army should, as far as possible, be combined at the next election. All progressive paths—Home Rule, the land question, the labor question, taxation, Free Trade—lead sooner or later to the House of Lords. That is again the immediate tendency of politics, and while it is most important to convince the public that Liberalism is a force of amelioration, of construction, of practical energy and progress in the commercial and industrial life of a modern State, it is not less urgent to remove the standing obstacle to democracy. No other country in the world, no British State within the Empire, has got such an institution as the House of Lords, or would tolerate it for a year. But we, in England, move slowly, and move, as a rule, for practical reasons rather than in obedience to theory. The House of Lords will fall in the end because its existence will be seen to be incompatible with the working out of modern political life, with the revival of the country side, with the improvement of the town, and because all democratic forces, all truly amending movements, must, sooner or later, come into sharp and violent contact with it.

THE STRENUOUS PEACE.

Politicians, as Anatole France once put it, are divided into those who desire peace simply and those who will it superbly. Mr. Roosevelt belongs emphatically to the latter class, and his appearance this week at the stone-laying of Mr. Carnegie's Bureau of American Republics was typical of his attitude. His speech opened with a sounding tribute to international ideals, to the growing solidarity of the American Republics, and to the kindly bonds of mutual justice, goodwill, and sympathetic comprehension. It meandered before its close, through mazes of compliment and platitude, to a more concrete and congenial theme—the cruise of the United States battle fleet. The whole man lay in this unconscious juxtaposition. Mr. Roosevelt's politics are like a poem by Walt Whitman. The world for him is full of a number of things, and to his boyish empirical temperament the need for selection is not apparent. If he wrote verse he would sing the glory of tables and chairs, cannons and four-poster beds, cathedrals and skyscrapers. In the world of action this essentially American temperament rushes with equal joy to Cuban battlefields and Hague Conferences. It receives the Nobel Prize for services to the cause of peace, and proceeds without a sense of incongruity to beseech Congress to double the American fleet. It one day defines the relation of the Northern Republic to the more wayward communities of the South in terms of the "policeman" and the "big stick." It throbs a year later at the touch of Mr. Carnegie's munificence, with words about brotherhood, solidarity, and sympathy. There is in all this no insincerity. It is not the catholicity which tries to be all things to all men. It is the catholicity which strives to be all things in itself.

The pity of it is that this crude, unreflective temperament should find itself, thanks to its own energy and the mass of human forces behind it, in a position of leadership over a collection of societies which has developed of recent years an idea of right far in advance of the ethics of the strenuous life. The basis of the strenuous life is muscle, and its ethics are those of the straight sportsman. It sees a wrong in the world, and proceeds instinctively to apply its big stick to the back of the wrong-doer. Its conceptions of international right rest on a foundation of lynch law. The idea of legality is still feebly developed in Anglo-Saxon civilisation. Its law is a thing of precedent and custom, and moral categories dominate all its thinking upon human relations. The Spanish-Americans, on the other hand, like all the Latin peoples, are at once less muscular, less moral, and more inclined to view the world in the light of pure reason. Their law is a Roman product, based on definite principles of right which have won a real ascendency over their thinking, though not necessarily over their conduct. In the crudest phases of South American evolution there was always an ancient University somewhere behind the dust and clouds of civil strife, and even a Castro can quibble over the niceties of the theory of jurisprudence. At its best, this Latin passion for law produces jurists of real eminence. It was the representatives of Brazil and Argentina who gave such intellectual distinction as they could boast to the recent debates at the Hague. It was Señor Drago, whose "doctrine," modified to meet the practical needs of creditor States, prohibits the use of force in the collection of international debts, who alone was able to add any fresh principle to the body of the laws of civilisation.

The typical North American attitude is still an idealisation of armed rectitude. To do justly but to do it strenuously, with no other law than the sanctions of one's own conscience, is still the last word of its civilisation. One sees it typified in "fighting Bob" Evans, who has just won the applause alike of the "grafters" and "grafted" in San Francisco, by declaring that the peace of the world would be assured if there were more battleships and fewer statesmen. The picture is complete in its way: coelum non animum mutant; one feels that "Bob" Evans is the lineal descendant of Stevenson's admirals, who used to utter similar sentiments in the intervals of chewing up their wine-glasses. The Spanish-Americans have less muscle, a less troublesome conscience, and—a real conception of law. Perhaps because there is no Puritan strain in their blood, perhaps because they cannot afford more battleships, they prefer to see the world's wrongs righted by judicial process. The result is that while Mr. Roosevelt pursues peace superbly—and wins the Nobel Prize—they have pursued it simply—and abolished war. The greatest achievement in the whole world's movement towards peace is undoubtedly the settlement effected, so far back as 1899, between Argentina and Chile. The two Republics had been brought to the verge of war by a boundary dispute. Both were high-spirited; neither was poor, and already they were buying battleships for the emergency in the European market. The Latin reverence for law prevailed. They referred their difference to the arbitration of Great Britain, reduced their armaments by mutual consent, and concluded a permanent treaty of arbitration with the British sovereign as perpetual arbiter. The mere fact that they submitted the dimensions of their armaments to negotiation made them pioneers and exemplars to Europe. But the treaty contained a more interesting clause than this. It adopted the phraseology habitual among European States, by reserving questions vitally affecting the national honor as unsuitable for arbitration. But unlike European States, these Latin American Republics were ready to submit to arbitration the question whether any given issue did or did not affect their honor. In other words, unless Great Britain should proclaim, urbi et orbi, that Chile and Argentina must fight, there can be no war between them. By this ingenious device the difficulties in the way of a universal treaty have been successfully overcome, while the promise to abstain from war receives at the same time a valuable external sanction. It is inconceivable that a third Power should ever assume the responsibility of bidding two friendly peoples to fight; it is obvious that if either ignored its decision, it would challenge the resentment of a Great Power and place itself morally in the wrong and materially at a disadvantage.

Mr. Roosevelt appears to think the cruise of his Armada round the Spanish-American coasts a valuable element in the consolidation of a continental peace. If the South Americans saw in it only the force which maintains the Monroe doctrine, and helps to preserve them from European aggression, it may have had this effect. If they realised that its manœuvres were destined to convince the people of the States of the need of doubling their navy, it may be doubted whether they really felt so comfortable. A Power which aspires to the moral leadership, and in a sense to the guardianship of a continent, is strong only in so far as she is prepared to recognise the supremacy of law. In supporting the Drago doctrines, Mr. Roosevelt strengthened his claims to this position. By every advance towards Old-World militarism he weakens it. The moral aspirations which colour and seem to justify his appeals for a "big stick" cannot alter the fact that he is perpetuating the reign of crude force. Russia votes for more battleships quite frankly because she aspires to "a place in the sun." New England likes to think that she wants them to go crusading. But it is well understood that her Peter the Hermit will be a Yellow Pressman, with his fount of inspiration somewhere in Wall Street. The progress of the world towards a judicial era in international affairs must be equally fatal to frank aggression and to isolated adventures undertaken in the name of right. A case for intervention in the name of humanity should be a case strong enough to commend itself to a court of arbitration, to an international conference, or to the Concert of the Powers. An appeal to force without the sanction of the rest of civilisation is an offence against the solidarity of peoples and the domain of law, even when it professes the most elevated motives. Mr. Carnegie, building, rather pathetically, his empty palaces for Parliaments of Peace at the Hague, and Bureaus of Solidarity at Washington, labors in vain, until there comes a statesman who will understand that legality is a better basis for peace than a muscular conscience. By Drago doctrines and Monroe doctrines, even by North Sea and Baltic agreements, the foundation of principle is being laid. Each of these restricts the possible applications of force. When at last every step which a Power can take outside its own territories has become a breach of some international agreement, war will have become an impossible offence against the collective will of mankind.

NATAL AND THE NATIVE QUESTION.

The natural desire of both British parties to avoid even the appearance of interfering with the delicate negotiations which are afoot in South Africa for the federation or unification of the self-governing Colonies imparted an air of unreality to last Wednesday's debate in its bearing on the obligation of the Imperial Government to safeguard the interests of the native races. But the revelations of the latest Blue-book, regarding the operations of martial law in Natal and the trial of Dinizulu, gravely disturb the theory that we can safely hand over the control of the six million natives even to a federal Government of whites without express stipulations securing for them a real representation in South Africa, or an appeal to the Imperial Government, or both. While the report of the recent Commission on Native Affairs and other evidence indicates that a better mind prevails in large sections of the Colony, the conduct of the Natal Ministry during the last few months calls for the plainest speaking. "Some of our forms differ from those of English law, but our system is equally founded in principles of justice and fairness." Such is the theory. What are the facts as exhibited in the trial of the Zulu chief, Dinizulu, arrested last December under martial law? The first idea of "justice and fairness" was to hamper Dinizulu's legal defence by stopping the salary he received as Government Induna in accordance with the settlement made by Mr. Chamberlain at the time of his restoration to his country. Though Lord Elgin repeatedly pressed upon them the British theory that "Dinizulu must be assumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty," and that the stoppage of his salary interfered with his effective defence, Mr. Moor and his Ministers not only refused to assent to this doctrine, but had the audacity to urge that such Imperial remonstrance embarrassed their case in resisting a legal application for the payment of this salary made in the Natal Courts.

Their next idea of justice was to utilise a form of preliminary examination so as to hold Dinizulu prisoner without trial for many months without formulating any charge or permitting his counsel to prepare his defence. After repeated enquiries from the Imperial Government, the Natal Ministers developed a theory that a preliminary examination, such as that on which they were engaged, did not require the formulation of a charge. This, however, is entirely inconsistent with their earlier procedure, which afforded two explicit, though inconsistent, statements of the "charge" under which what was then termed the "trial" was taking place. Dinizulu was first charged with "inciting" to murder, to which, later on, were added high treason, sedition, and sundry other charges, all alleged to be "charges in warrants." To the request of Lord Elgin for the name of the person whom Dinizulu was charged with murdering or inciting to murder, no answer was given, except the mendacious statement that "Dinizulu is being informed of details of charges." Here is a man on trial for his life, and it has been impossible to extract from his accusers the name of the person for whose murder he was said to be responsible.

Even more discreditable have been the obstacles set in the way of Dinizulu's friends in preparing his defence. Though a bold verbal denial of these obstacles is made, the admissions of the law officers prove the substantial accuracy of the charges made here and in Natal by Mr. Jellicoe. For repeated applications that Dinizulu's solicitor should be allowed access to Zululand to collect witnesses and other evidence have been persistently refused, and his counsel have been denied access to the original depositions of witnesses against him, and to papers taken from his kraal for use in his forthcoming trial. No fair-minded person can read this Blue-book without a feeling of disgust at the tissue of prevarication and evasion which it contains, blended with insolence towards the Imperial Government for daring to intervene to secure some semblance of justice for their ward.

Not less serious are the disclosures of abuses under martial law. Two unresisting men were shot dead, a dozen more were flogged, and several hundreds were imprisoned under proceedings which are not even seriously defended by the Ministers who sanctioned them. For as early as January 16th the Prime Minister accepts the view of the native Commissioner, Sir C. Sanders, that there is "no further need for any military force other than the police," and the history of the movement of troops makes it quite evident that no reason ever existed to anticipate a native disturbance. Flogging witnesses to secure "true" evidence may appear a mode of justice consistent with the nature of "Martial Law," but readers of this Blue-book, bearing in mind Colonel McKenzie's assertion that "no native to his knowledge was flogged for refusing to divulge information," will turn with indignation to the record of floggings under which three men suffered lashes for "giving false information," one for "wilfully prevaricating under examination," and another for "wilfully withholding evidence."

These details are necessary that we may realise the meaning of that martial law for the maintenance of which the Imperial Government shares the responsibility. For we agree with Mr. Alfred Lyttelton's firm though guarded insistence that the opinion of the law officers, to the effect that the Governor of a self-governing colony must obey his Ministers in so grave a matter as the virtual suspension of the colonial constitution, cannot be accepted as the final word of Imperial policy. Moreover, even if the Governor, who on this occasion did not conceal his opposition to the proposed course, is bound to defer to the pressure of his Ministers in the declaration and maintenance of Martial Law, this does not cancel the responsibility of the Imperial Government for the ratification of an Act of Indemnity. If, as we understand, the Government is not prepared to appoint an Imperial commission of inquiry, the disclosures made in this Blue-book demand a free and full discussion in Parliament of the constitutional question raised by such a use of Martial Law, and an impartial scrutiny of its operations as a condition precedent to the ratification of an Act of Indemnity by the Imperial Government.

THE LATE PRIME MINISTER AND HOME RULE.

BY THE LEADER OF THE IRISH PARTY.

I WAS, I believe, the very last Member of Parliament to speak to "C.-B." within the precincts of the House of Commons, and I shall never forget this interview.

It was Wednesday, the 12th of February. As Prime Minister he had made a speech of considerable length in the forenoon, proposing a resolution for the closure of the discussion on the Land Values (Scotland) Bill, which had been rejected by the House of Lords last year, and which the Government were about to send back to the House of Lords again as a challenge.

His speech was fairly vigorous, although it was noticed that he seemed somewhat nervous, and made more use than usual of the copious notes which he had brought down with him.

About 7.30 in the evening he sent me a message with a desire to see me. I found him in one of the small private rooms immediately behind the Speaker's chair. I discussed with him fully the forthcoming Home Rule debate, which was to take place the following Monday, and I found him most anxious and determined that the discussion should be of a character entirely satisfactory to Ireland and to the Irish Party.

He told me that he had made up his mind to wind up the debate himself, and that I could rely upon him making a strong Home Rule declaration.

Knowing the enfeebled state of his health, I suggested that he ought to speak early in the debate instead of putting himself to the labour of waiting up until a late hour, and speaking, perhaps, at midnight. He answered that by saying: "I am not so far gone as all that, and I am quite determined to wind up the debate myself."

I noticed that his face was not only drawn, but almost ghastly in its pallor, and I apologised to him for having kept him so long; but he would not hear of any apology. On the contrary, he assured me that he was as anxious as I was myself about the success of the forthcoming debate. He said he was then going home to have a quiet evening and rest. He said "good-night" to me and went out by the private door at the back of the Speaker's chair, and immediately left the building.

That was the last occasion on which he ever set foot in the House of Commons.

I confess that I felt extremely uneasy about the state of his health, and I mentioned to more than one friend that evening that I was almost shocked at his appearance at close quarters.

I cannot say that I was entirely surprised when, the next afternoon, I was informed, in the strictest confidence, that once again he was extremely, seriously, ill.

The public did not know, at that time, anything about it, and even when mention was made in the papers that he was indisposed the matter was made light of. But I knew, from the Thursday afternoon, that he would never be seen in the House of Commons again.

A striking instance of his extraordinary anxiety for the result of the Home Rule discussion was afforded the next day—that is, Friday, the 14th of February.

Mr. Birrell had suddenly been struck down by influenza, and we were then in this position: that neither the Minister responsible for Ireland nor the Prime Minister would be able to take part in the Home Rule debate on the following Monday.

I put myself in communication with Mr. Asquith, who was acting as Leader of the House in the absence of the Prime Minister, and represented to him the difficulties of proceeding with the debate in the absence of these two gentlemen.

After consulting with some of his colleagues, I was informed by Mr. Asquith that, on the whole, it would be better for the debate to proceed, and that he himself would take part in it.

Later on Friday afternoon, however, I ascertained that "C.-B.," having heard that Mr. Birrell, the Chief Secretary, would be incapacitated from taking part in the debate, had sent an urgent message over to the House of Commons for a well-known Cabinet Minister to visit him.

This latter gentleman returned after about half an hour. He had had an interview by the bedside with the Prime Minister, who informed him, if the debate was not adjourned, that he had made up his mind, no matter what the cost, that he would get up out of bed and come over and take part in the discussion himself.

In consequence of this message, the debate was finally adjourned; but, unfortunately, the Prime Minister was never able to take the part in it which he intended.

During the last twenty years I had very many opportunities of judging of the friendliness of "C.-B." to Ireland and the cause of Home Rule.

His great characteristic was that, in face of intimidation and pressure of all sorts he always stood by his guns. He refused to budge one inch to the clamour which was raised against him over the South African War; and, in the same way, he refused to budge one inch on the question of Home Rule in deference to the pressure within his own Party, led by Lord Rosebery and his friends.

At the last General Election, if it rested with him, Home Rule would have been one of the leading issues to be decided by the electors. Indeed, so far as he personally was concerned, he did his best to make it so.

In his speech at Stirling during the Election, and in his subsequent utterances, he put the Home Rule question to the very front, and, in Lord Rosebery's subsequent words, "Nailed the Home Rule flag to the mast."

He absolutely declined to give any pledge that Home Rule would not be dealt with effectively in this Parliament. But he was not master of the situation, and before the Election he naturally never had any conception of the extraordinary reaction of popular favour towards the Liberal Party which was about to be witnessed.

The result was that other members of the Party and other members of the new Government gave pledges which had the consequence of effectively ruling out Home Rule in the full sense of the term for this Parliament.

To have carried out his own view with reference to Home Rule, "C.-B." would have been forced to smash his Cabinet and his Government immediately after they came into power.

I have had, for many long years, personal and political relations with "C.-B." of a somewhat close character, and I formed the opinion that, as a politician, he was perfectly straightforward and reliable, and, as an individual, was of a most lovable character.

In proposing a resolution in the House of Commons, consequent upon the assassination of the King of Portugal, "C.-B." described that monarch as "the manly, friendly, kindly King." There never was a man of whom those words were so true as they were of "C.B." himself. These were his characteristics—manliness, friendliness, and kindliness.

In him Ireland certainly has lost a good friend, and I think it speaks well for the public life of England that, in his instance, the qualities which I have mentioned led, in the end, in spite of calumny, prejudice, and abuse, to the very highest office in the nation, and gained for him the universal respect and regret of men of all political parties and creeds.

J. E. REDMOND.

Life and Letters.

HOPE.

Wet or fine, hot or cold, nothing was more certain than that the lame man would pass, leaning on his twisted oaken stick, his wicker basket slung on his shoulders. In that basket, covered by a bit of sacking, was groundsel, and rarely, in the season, a few mushrooms kept carefully apart in a piece of newspaper.

His blunt, wholesome, weather-beaten face, with its full brown beard, now going grey, was lined and sad, because his leg continually gave him pain. That leg had shrivelled through an accident, and, being now two inches shorter than it should have been, did little save remind him of mortality. He had a respectable, though not an affluent, appearance, for his old blue overcoat, his trousers, waistcoat, hat, were ragged from long use, and stained by weather. He had been a deep-sea fisherman before his accident, but now he made his living by standing or sitting on the pavement at a certain spot, from ten o'clock to seven in the evening. And anyone who wished to give her bird a luxury would stop before his basket and buy a pennyworth of groundsel.

Often—as he said—he had "had a job to get it," rising at five o'clock, and going out of London by an early tram to the happy hunting-grounds of those who live on the appetites of caged canaries. Here, dragging his injured limb with difficulty through ground that the heavens seldom troubled to keep dry for him, he would stoop and toilfully amass the small green plant, with its close yellow-centred heads, though often—as he mentioned—"there don't seem no life, like, in the stuff; the frosts ha' spiled it!" Having collected all that fate permitted him, he would take the tram back home, and start out for his day's adventure.

Now and again, when things had not gone well, his figure would be seen stumping home through darkness as late as nine or ten o'clock at night. On such occasions, his blue-grey eyes, which had never quite lost their look of gazing through sea mists, would reflect the bottom of his soul, where the very bird of weariness lay with its clipped wings, for ever trying to regain the air.

In fact—as he had no need to tell you—he was a "trier," from year's end to year's end; but he had no illusions concerning his profession; there was "nothing in it," though it was better, on the whole, than flowers, where there was even less. And, after all, having got accustomed to the struggles of that bird of weariness within his soul, he would even perhaps have missed it had it at last succeeded in rising from the ground and taking flight.

"An 'ard life!" he had been heard to say, when groundsel was scarce, customers scarcer, and the damp had struck up into his shrivelled leg. This, stated as a matter of bare fact, was the extent of his general complaint, though he would not unwillingly descant on the failings of his groundsel, his customers, and leg, to the few who could appreciate such things. But, as a rule, he stood or sat silent, watching the world go by, as in old days he had watched the waves drift against his anchored fishing smack; and the look of those blurred blue, far-gazing eyes of his, in their extraordinary patience, was like a constant declaration of the simple and unconscious creed of man: "I hold on till I drop."

What he thought about while he stood there it was difficult to say—possibly of old days round the Goodwins, of the yellow buttons of his groundsel that refused to open properly, of his leg, and dogs that would come sniffing at his basket and showing their contempt, of his wife's gouty rheumatism and herrings for his tea, of his arrears of rent, of how few people seemed to want his groundsel, and, once more, of his leg.

Practically no one stopped to look at him, unless she wanted a pennyworth of groundsel for her pale bird. And, when they did look at him, they saw—nothing symbolical—simply a brown-bearded man, with deep furrows in his face and a lame leg, whose groundsel was often of a quality that they did not dare to offer their canaries. They would tell him so, adding that the weather was cold, to which, knowing a little more about it than themselves, he would reply: "Yes, m'm—you wouldn't believe how I feel it in my leg." In this remark he was extremely accurate, but they would look away, and pass on rather hastily, doubting whether a man should mention a lame leg—it looked too much as if he wanted to make something out of it. In truth, he had the delicacy of a deep-sea fisherman, but he had owned his leg so long that it had got on his nerves; it was too intimate a part of all his life, and speak of it he must. And sometimes, but generally on warm and genial days, when his groundsel was properly in bloom and he had less need of adventitious help, his customers would let their feelings get the better of them, and give him pennies when ha'pennies would have been enough. This, unconsciously, had served to strengthen his habit of alluding to his leg.

He had, of course, no holidays, but occasionally he was absent from his stand. This was when his leg, feeling that he was taking it too much as a matter of course, became what he would call "a mass o' pain." Such occasions threw him behindhand with his rent; but, as he said, "If you can't get out, you can't!" After these vacations he would make special efforts, going far afield for groundsel, and remaining on his stand until he felt that if he did not get off it then, he never would.

Christmas was his festival, for at Christmas people were more indulgent to their birds, and his regular customers gave him sixpence. This was as well, for, whether owing to high living or merely to the cold, he was nearly always laid up about that time. After this annual bout of "brownchitis," as he called it, his weather-beaten face looked strangely pale; his blue eyes seemed to have in them the mist of many watches. So might the drowned ghost of a deep-sea fisherman have looked, and his pale, roughened hand would tremble, hovering above the groundsel that had so little bloom, trying to find something that a bird need not despise.

"You wouldn't believe the job I had to find even this little lot," he would say. "Sometimes I thought I'd leave me leg be'ind; I was that weak I couldn't seem to drag it through the mud at all. An' my wife, she's got the gouty rheumatiz. You'll think I'm all trouble!" And, summoning God knows what spirit of hilarity, he smiled. Then, looking at the leg which he had nearly left behind, he added, somewhat boastfully: "You see, it's got no strength in it at all—there's not a bit o' muscle left. . . . Very few people," his eyes and voice seemed proudly saying, "have got a leg like this!"

To the dispassionate observer of his existence, it was a little difficult to understand what attraction life could have for him—a little difficult to penetrate down through the blackness of his continual toil and pains, to the still living eyes of that bird of weariness lying within his soul, moving always, if but slightly, its wounded stumps of wings. It seemed, on the whole, unreasonable of this man to cling to life, since he was without prospect of anything but what was worse in this life; and, in the matter of a life to come, he would dubiously remark: "My wife's always a-tellin' me we can't be no worse off where we're a-goin'. An' she's right, no doubt, if so be as we're goin' anywhere."

And yet, so far as could be seen, the thought, "Why do I continue living?" never came to him. It almost seemed as if it must be giving him a secret joy to measure himself against his troubles. And this was fortunate, for in a day's march one could not come across a better omen for the future of mankind.

In the crowded highway, leaning on his twisted stick beside his basket, with his tired, steadfast face, he stood—a ragged statue to the great unconscious human virtue, the most hopeful of all things: Courage without hope!

John Galsworthy.

THE FAITH OF FREE THOUGHT.

In a singularly interesting article in the last issue of the "Hibbert Journal," Mr. Lowes Dickinson dwells upon the changed attitude of "free-thinkers" towards the problems of life and the universe during the last generation. The old confidence in the universal reign of law, and in science as the sole authentic exponent of its operation, has broken down. Nor do we find anywhere that contented acceptance of the Agnostic position regarding ultimate issues displayed during the combative period of scientific advance in the mid-Victorian era. As Mr. Dickinson point out, our latter-day free-thinkers are not less sceptical, but they are also more believing. Still in full revolt against the orthodox religious formulae, all in their various fashions are stretching out "lame hands of faith," introducing some principle of unity and worship (in the proper significance of that term) from some other than an intellectual source. So we find George Meredith demanding a worship for Earth, while the rejected creed of Positivism is gathering illustrious disciplies in a religion of Eugenics, and numbers of hard-headed and somewhat unimaginative devotees of Secularism are rediscovering in Socialism the soul and the paradise abandoned by their fathers. This widespread and manifold revival of a distinctively religious movement among intellectual people outside the churches is of supreme significance in the spiritual life of the nation. We may distinguish in it two streams of tendency, one negative, one positive. In origin it is a vigorous re-assertion of discontent against a purely scientific view of life. The early protests of the churches, or of such free-thinkers as Carlyle and Ruskin, against the arrogance of the scientific spirit of their age, were swept aside as mere displays of temperamental violence. Our sober thought could never acquiesce in Carlyle's mystical appeal for "a great, deep, sacred infinitude of Nescience upon which all science swims as a mere superficial film."

The modern criticism of the all-sufficiency of science is far more definite and positive, and is voiced not by rhetoricians, but by philosophers, such as Professors Ward and William James, by serious, if audacious, sociologists, such as Mr. Wells and Mr. Shaw, as well as by not a few of our most influential historians of contemporary life. Not merely the present failure, but the inherent inability of science, and the logic it employs, to afford any satisfying apprehension of the universe as a moving, ordered harmony, and of man's place in such a harmony, is the kernel of the indictment. In part, it amounts to a general extension of the charge that science but "murders to dissect," that it is essentially analytic in its method, and that such formative principles as the so-called scientific imagination employs in the large physical or psychical hypotheses about the nature of matter, or the meaning of evolution, are imported, unavowedly and often illicitly, from other modes of discovery. The false prominence which the doctrine of evolution has won in the study of human history, has served more than anything else to indicate the nature of the inadequacy of scientific reasoning to satisfy not merely the soul but the intelligence of man. So there has grown and spread what Mr. Wells happily terms "a scepticism of the instrument," a clear perception of the fact that evolution itself destroys the claim of science to be the supreme arbiter of higher truths by showing how scientific methods themselves are only evolved by selection for the practical uses of man in his struggle for survival, and have no such eternal and universal validity as has sometimes been claimed for them. The positive suggestion which emerges from such criticism is that we must look to the co-operation of faculties other than the intellectual mechanism of science, for the apprehension of life and the universe required to feed the spirit of men and to inspire us for the work of life. Mr. Dickinson is right, we think, in using the term "faith" to designate the faculty or process required for that synthetic work which science cannot do, and in claiming for faith a far wider and freer function than is contained within the limits of any orthodoxy. For the work of faith is poetry, the operation of the creative spirit of man, the impassioned imagination in its endeavours to assimilate the moving spectacle of life and to gather motive power and guidance. That this new approach to faith and poetry should be made simultaneously from so many different quarters outside the churches will, in our judgment, be fraught with enormously important results in a spiritual revival, which is already seen to awaken no mean response inside the churches. It is no new doctrine that Mr. Dickinson sets forth—to many it will read as the purest Emerson—how that "Poetry has been the raw material of all dogma, and such poetry is neither true nor false; it only becomes false or true, or both at once, at the moment it is formulated as a creed." Is the age of creeds passing, to be displaced by an equally revered and incomparably more sustaining, because more plastic, age of poetry, in which all that is individual, as well as that which is common to the emotional life of man, shall have free play in the interpretation of life?

But in one respect Mr. Dickinson seems to us to fail adequately to interpret the poetic mission. If poetry means anything it means creation, and the poetic freedom of the religious life for all means the unceasing play of the creative power of man. It is surely untrue that we are merely concerned with "process," and that "the idea of creation has ceased to be credible, and what is worn has ceased to be interesting." On the contrary, the most fundamental criticism of the inadequacy of science is based, as Mr. Bergsen has shown in his profound work "L'Evolution Créatrice," upon the subtle influence of "creation" in the processes of evolution of life. In a word, it is the inability of scientific analyses to convey the "urge of the world," the élan de vie, which is continually expressing itself in the emergence of new poems, incalculable from all knowledge of prior conditions. The scientific positions, that history repeats itself, or that the same causes produce the same effects, though serviceable in the interpretation of inorganic nature, are baffled by organic unity, and have little efficacy when directed to the delicate processes of spiritual life. For in the realm of organic processes the arts of mechanical calculation, upon which science rests, continually fail; new species arise, new adaptations, new modes of conduct, not predicable from the minutest possible knowledge of antecedents: it is a world of miracles, in the sense of results which no science can enable us to forecast, and which differ, in quality, character, or human interest, from anything that has occurred before. This baffling force, this play of the creative energy, pulsating through the universe, and exhibiting itself most conspicuously for man in organic changes affecting spiritual life, can only be apprehended, if at all, by some directly intuitive action of the mind of man, more akin to instinct than to reasoning.

Thus it is to man as spiritual artist rather than as scientist that we must look for that vital unity of apprehension required, not only for such understanding of life as is possible, but still more for that confidence in our power to alter things for the better, essential to nourish and sustain the human spirit. It is not easy to extricate this thought from the toils of a vague and shifty verbiage and give it clearness and validity. For this work, M. Bergsen makes use of a fine and fruitful metaphor. A poet, who is your friend, reads you his poem, and your mind, held tense in a condition of keen emotional sympathy, attends and gathers in the impassioned meaning of the poem as a single emotional and intellectual experience, a "creation." As it is recited, it makes a single, unbroken impression: it has the force of a harmony. Only afterwards, when this tenseness of sympathetic apprehension is relaxed, reflection sets in, analysis ensues, you begin to dwell upon the separate passages, the individual images, and the pattern of composition, the systematic order, so that the method of the artistry comes into clear consciousness: and as it does so, the feeling of the unity evaporates. So Bergsen images the relation between the sort of intuition or higher instinct required for the apprehension of all organic movements and events, and the sciences which show how this flow of creative energy uses its material.

Great men of science have commonly been willing to admit the limits of reason as the guide of life, and to assign some real place to faith and imagination in the search after understanding. But it rests with modern philosophers and psychologists to set science and her methods in their true place as servants of humanity. This place is second, not first, in the art of life: for the facts and laws which they unfold do not furnish that full single harmony which we call the Universe, or set the soul of man in sympathetic accord with the wider pulsations of this "over-soul." It is here one perceives that the real reconcilement of religion with science lies. But the art of such religion must be free, a perpetual fountain of fresh divination flowing over the enlarging fields of knowledge and fertilising them for spiritual nutriment. It is true that man must look with Mr. Dickinson for "a principle of growth—what I call Imagination, since some word one must use. And by this he stretches feelers into the dark, laying hold there of stuff and building mythologies and poems, the palaces of splendid hopes and desires."

THE TRAMP WORLD.

The Tramp World is the normal civilised universe seen (as it were) from the reverse side in which the grey has become blue and the blue grey. Every accepted standard has become inverted. The inhabitants are at war upon the working world; using its charity and its clumsy legislation in order to suck from that world no small advantage. They have eluded (like the inheriting wealthy) the obligations of labor, like the inheriting wealthy they possess their own exacting moral codes, differing from the moral codes of working humanity; which supports both, if not with equanimity, at least with fortitude. Occasional revelations, candid and unashamed, by those few in either of these strange universes who become articulate, reveal to that astonished working humanity the life which moves around them, among them, but not of them. Such is this most interesting "Autobiography of a Super-Tramp" (Fifield), in which Mr. W. H. Davies, loafer, poet, capitalist with an assured income of ten shillings a week, narrates the record of his adventures. "An amazing book," Mr. Bernard Shaw rightly calls it; in which in clear, dispassionate language the author does not so much impeach the accepted standards of British morality, as set them aside in disdain. "I was born thirty-five years ago, in a public-house called the Church House in the town of N——" is the commencement of a story not altogether unworthy of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe," without his sincere, if somewhat intrusive, moral determinations, living amongst the aborigines on the deserted island of this "floating, transitory world." In the final chapter he sums up the philosophical advice which he would bequeath to similar sojourners in that amazing region. The most important dogma of it is "contained in the simple words: 'Never live in a house next door to your landlord or landlady'; which," he declares, "deserves to become a proverb." "Many people might not consider this warning necessary," he concludes, "but the hint may be useful to poor travellers like myself who, sick of wandering, would settle down to the peace and quiet of after days."

It is the normal world, in England and America, turned inside out, seen from the other side of Looking Glass country. From such side are examined the benevolence of the rich and the benevolence of the poor, the Salvation Army shelter, the common gaol, the Charity Organisation Society, the various efforts of society to protect itself against the locust and the caterpillar. The locust, it must be confessed, especially in America, generally has the best of it. The artless and somewhat clumsy organisations of State and city and private persons spread their simple traps of cheese or delicacies for the mouse—the mouse annexes the cheese and leaves the trap scatheless. Especially is this true in America, where wealth, easily and carelessly heaped together, is as easily and carelessly scattered. Many of Mr. Davies' confessions of American begging experiences are almost incredible in their suggestion of opulence. An hour or two in streets of modest comfort will yield, to the experienced workman, a profusion of good things—money, clothes, rich and pleasant food. Free rides by "beating" the various trains, transformation with changing climate of summer and winter from the north to the south, occasional interludes in local gaols, where the officials, being paid by the number of their captives, offer increasing attractions to those who will condescend to accept such hospitalities, offer a healthful and variable existence of adventure and repose. The companions of the road offer no despicable advantages, there is no "honor among thieves," they rob each other with effrontery, and make no assertion of chivalry or fine and decent living. But they are generous in their sharing of the booty with their companions, and possess a ready sociability which leads them to partnerships and associations of some enduring value. The two unforgiveable crimes are work and thrift. Effort and Accumulation—the gods of the working world—have become idols to be trampled on. Yet, in the underworld, the appeal to compassion is still irresistible. The cattle men who bring the living food of England across the Atlantic to Liverpool "are recognised as the scum of America, a wild, lawless class of people, on whom," says Mr. Davies, "the scum of Europe unscrupulously impose." Mr. Davies had frequently made the journey, and tells horrible tales of the indifferent cruelty to the beasts: habitually the cattle men arrive, fresh from such degrading experience, upon a city of poverty; habitually they part with their scanty earnings in gifts to that poverty when they arrive. "Having kind hearts they are soon rendered penniless by the importunities of beggars." "These wild but kind-hearted men," says this testimony, "grown exceedingly proud by a comparison of the comfortable homes of America with these scenes of extreme poverty in Liverpool and other large seaports, give and give of their few shillings, until they are themselves reduced to the utmost want."

In America, under the expert advice of "Brum," the young novice learnt the valuable secrets of the trade. On entering any town, look out for a Church steeple with a cross, which denotes a Catholic Church and therefore a Catholic community. "If I fail in that portion of the town I shall certainly not succeed elsewhere." Fat women are the best to beg from. "How can you expect these skinny creatures to sympathise with another," is the unanswerable argument, "when they half starve their own bodies?" In begging in England, avoid every town that has not either a mill, a factory, or a brewery. But in America the gold mines are the watering-places and haunts of the idle rich: perhaps because they recognise natural allies in the other class of Anarchist, perhaps because they satisfy a slumbering responsibility and compassion in a careless scattering of uncalculated charity. Amongst the New York watering-places "the people catered for us as though we were the only tramps in the whole world, and as if they considered it providential that we should call at their houses for assistance." In such providential plenty the standards are well maintained: otherwise this inverted world might right itself and become normal once again. The travellers are received with disfavour by a stranger, who later is smitten with remorse. "Excuse me, boys, for not giving you a more hearty welcome," is the apology; "but, really, I thought you were working men, but I see you are true beggars." In a cottage an aged labourer who had amassed a modest fortune after a life of toil hangs on the wall the shovel which he had used in early days. To these wanderers the vision is as distasteful as an image of a saint to a Covenanting assembly: a symbol of false gods.

America is the creation of an individualism run riot: the right of the citizen exalted into a religion, the communal responsibility scarcely recognised. Mr. Davies in his exhilarating narrative of living experiences can illustrate on every page the result of such a disparity. Each of these adventurers was arrested by the city "Marshal": each found the experience agreeable, and the law evaded by a genial combination of hospitality and blackmail. Seized for trespassing on the railway, they adjourn with their captor to the public-house, where the host, the policeman, and the prisoners drink together at the expense of the latter "in a very friendly manner."

So the life continues; tramping and begging on the open road, with occasional interludes of light work, picking fruit in the summer, or occupying the pleasant gaols in winter which attracted the wayfarer with rash delicacies. To enforce the criminal law, the good citizens in these little towns would offer large bounties to the police for the arrest of each prisoner, and the result was a system satisfactory to all concerned. "There is a long and severe winter before you," pleads the Marshal, "you would certainly be better off in gaol. Sixty days in our gaol, which is considered one of the best, if not the best, in Michigan, would do you no harm, I assure you." "We might take thirty days each," is the pleasant reply, "providing, of course, that you make it worth while. What about tobacco, and a drink or two of whiskey?" Both are immediately promised. All is exceedingly well arranged. The Marshal gets a dollar each for every arrest he makes; the judge three or four dollars for every conviction; the sheriff of the gaol is paid a dollar a day for boarding each prisoner under his charge; "we benefit by a good rest, warmth, good food, and plenty of sleep, and the innocent citizens have to pay for it all."

Some forced inaction stimulated a never entirely destroyed love of literature. Mr. Davies took to poetry as he had taken to pilgrimage and prison, selling his own production from the common lodging-houses of South London. At the age of thirty-five he can look back upon an astonishing life history, settling to rest as the hero of "Candide" settled to rest, having made nothing of the world's confusion; not only occupied in "cultivating his garden," but also eager with that ultimate word of earthly wisdom, "Never live in a house next door to your landlord."

Short Story.

PAKA THE CAT.

Translated from Swahili by Captain C. H. Stigand.

This is the story of Paka the cat.

If there are three or four men walking along and only one woman, the cat will turn aside from the men and follow the one woman.

Now, the reason for this is the story I am telling you.

In the beginning Paka sat in the bush, till one day she felt the pain of hunger.

So she came down to the shore, and there she met a serval who was hunting the crabs of the shore. So Paka went up to the serval and said, "Good morning"; and the serval said, "Who are you?"

"It is I—Paka."

"What do you want?"

"I want to follow you about and so get food."

So the serval said, "Very good, then. Here, eat these crabs."

So Paka ate of the crabs, and she followed the serval many days.

Till one day there came a leopard and fought with the serval and killed him.

So Paka thought in her heart: "Now, this one was not a manly one: he who is the man is the leopard." So Paka went up to the leopard and saluted him, "Good morning."

So the leopard said, "And who are you?"

"It is I—Paka."

"What do you want?"

"I want to follow you about and get food."

So the leopard said, "Very good. Here, eat of this serval."

So Paka followed the leopard many days and many weeks.

Till one day came a lion, and he fell on the leopard and killed him.

So Paka thought in her heart: "Now, this one also was not a manly one: he who is the man is the lion."

So she went to the lion and said, "Good morning."

And the lion said, "Who are you?"

"It is I—Paka."

"What do you want?"

So Paka said, "I want to follow you about that you may give me food."

So the lion said, "Then eat of this leopard."

So Paka ate of the leopard, and she followed the lion for many weeks and many months, till one day there came an elephant.

And the elephant came and struck the lion with his trunk and the lion died.

So Paka said in her heart: "Now, this one, too, was not a manly one: he who is the man is the elephant."

So Paka went and greeted the elephant, "Good morning."

The elephant said, "And who are you?"

"It is I—Paka."

"What do you want?"

"I want to follow you about that you may give me food."

So the elephant said, "Then eat of this lion."

So Paka ate of the lion, and she followed the elephant for many months and many days.

Till one day came a man; and that son of Adam came and he took his matchlock and fired.

And he hit the elephant and the elephant ran away.

After running a long way he fell down, and that son of Adam came and he fired again and again until the elephant was finished and he died.

Now Paka said: "Behold, he also was not a manly one: he who is the man is the son of Adam."

So Paka went up and saluted him, saying, "Good morning."

And the man said, "Who are you?"

"It is I—Paka."

"What do you want?"

"I want to follow you about that you may give me food."

So the man said, "Then eat of the elephant."

So Paka stayed with the man and ate of the elephant, while he was cutting out the tusks.

When the man had finished cutting out the tusks he wended his way home and came to his village.

Now, that man had two wives, and the one he loved and the other he loved not.

So he came first to the house of her whom he loved not, that he might stay a short time and go to the house of her whom he loved.

So he came there and greeted the wife whom he loved not, and straightway went on to the house of her whom he loved.

When he had come there he said to her: "Oh, my wife whom I love, I have done this on purpose.

"I came first to the house of the other one that I might come straightway to you whom I love, and remain with you a long time."

Now, the woman was angry in that he had gone first to the house of the other, and she said to him: "What you say is false!"

So she came up to him and struck him—pah!

That man did not do anything; he turned round and left the hut.

Then thought Paka: "Now, even this one is not the manly one. Why does he go away? He who is the man is the woman."

So she went up to the woman and said to her, "Good morning."

The woman said, "And who are you?"

"It is I—Paka."

"What do you want?"

"I want to follow you about that you may give me food."

So the woman said to her, "Very good. Sit here in my house."

Now, this is the story of Paka the cat, which comes from long ago, and this is the reason why a cat will leave a man and follow a woman.

The Drama.

A DRAMATIC "CONVERSATION."

THERE are at least two kinds of men of genius, the expansive and the shy, the talkative and the taciturn, and Mr. Shaw belongs undeniably, and even notoriously, to the former type. He is also (like most men of genius) an extremely wilful person, and it is these qualities of wilfulness and talkativeness which are between them responsible for the production of "Getting Married." It is no objection to this conversational play or playful conversation that it is a new experiment in drama. The important thing to discover about it is whether, in addition to its being a characteristic example of Mr. Shaw's talent, it is also suited to the atmosphere and the purpose of the stage. It is not an answer to this question to suggest, as Mr. Walkley suggests, that other writers—like Peacock— have also used the method of the symposium. All styles are good, said a greater than Peacock, save the tiresome style. And if parts of Mr. Shaw's new dramatic effort are tiresome, there is good reason to think that so very lively a writer must, in fact, have chosen the wrong style, that he has tried to accomplish something repugnant to the dramatic form, or alien to the special subject of his play.

This explanation accounts, in my view, for its reception on Tuesday afternoon. The first instalment of "Getting Married" was received with enthusiasm, the second with tolerable pleasure, the third with much coldness. To some extent this failure of interest was due to the inferiority of the execution of the later portions of the dialogue, in which there was too much journalism, too little of Mr. Shaw's delicately pointed workmanship. But it also arose from the elementary fact that the essence of good talk, when it is mere talk, is that there must not be too much of it. "In the beginning was the Act," and as life depends not on words but on deeds, we soon weary of the most brilliant reflections on it which do not illustrate action. The drama proper depends on action flowing from character. And this is almost equally true of the great symposium. Why are Plato's dialogues so interesting? First, because they reveal the mind and soul of the mighty raisonneur who conducts them, and who is continually their centre; secondly, because they deal with great subjects, greatly treated; but, thirdly, because they concern the life and the death of Socrates, the war of the great free intellect against the narrow minds and malicious powers that encompassed it. In other words, there is thought at its highest tension, there is action in its eternally significant form.

Or take the newer analogy, the modern intellectual drama. In Ibsen all comes from action and tends to it. In "Rosmersholm," everything that Rosmer was, all that his fathers were, is gathered together so that when the revealing word is spoken, when the last ray that illumines, the last shadow that darkens, has fallen on his soul and on that of Rebecca, their destinies shall be duly accomplished. Compare this with Mr. Shaw's method in "Getting Married." He has taken marriage, a great subject, though difficult to treat with candour on the stage, because, just as most men would rather hang themselves than tell the whole truth about their lives, this human shyness veils so intimate a relationship with especial closeness, and veils it above all before the mot cru of the stage. But then he omits the two other conditions even of the successful symposium. He does not himself act as the grand raisonneur. He preaches no definite faith; expounds no philosophy. And, finally, he suggests no action. His characters, to begin with, are a body of philanderers. There is the lady—a very typical modern lady—who has Dared Nothing. There are the couple who have Dared only a Collusive Farce in the divorce court. There is the Bishop who is Daring only in thought, for, like the brilliant ecclesiastic from whom he was drawn, he has not even dared to doff his ill-fitting apron. There is the young Superman whose Daring expires in a moment of unpardonable rudeness. There is the lady whose Daring has apparently been repulsed by the entire male sex, and there is the couple who, greatly Daring at the end of the third interval, get married on a mutual insurance policy. These hesitating, nicely balanced, characters set themselves to talk round a table about marriage. And they go on talking about it. There is nothing else for them to do; there is neither outer nor inner action. Each puppet rises at the pulling of the wires, and rehearses and repeats the formula set down for him. They cannot do right, for they have not done wrong. God cannot pardon them, the Devil cannot claim them. As one of them says, things have sometimes "happened" to them, and the rational-irrational end of their living, expounded them by Mr. Collins, natural philosopher and greengrocer—namely, to marry first and think about it afterwards—seems almost beyond their attainment.

For these reasons "Getting Married" seems to me an error, committed by an artist of great critical faculty, both in the choice of form and in the treatment of it. It is much as if a sculptor had tried, as modern sculptors sometimes do try, to obtain effects natural to painting, or a painter had aimed at results that only sculpture can properly embody. You must have something more than conversation for a drama, which must have a beginning and an end, and if you converse, it must be with some single and powerful moral purpose behind the talk, as with the narrative-conversation in the train on which Tolstoy builds up the dreadful warning of "The Kreutzer Sonata." Now, I hope I am not blind to such meaning as lies behind Mr. Shaw's conversation-play. I think I see behind its exposition something of the dubiousness of will that overtakes nearly all our thinkers as they survey, without the old, simple, positive clues, the perplexities of modern life. But in the main, and to him who will follow the few connected threads which its author vouchsafes, the pith of Mr. Shaw's conversation is his advocacy of the woman's case. In many passages this case is obviously advanced, in others more subtly pleaded; in one with great distinction of language and with singular truth and beauty of conception. In effect, all this society of marrying or non-marrying people agrees. Marriage, they say, is not right as it is, for it is contracted by people who are too young and impulsive to understand it and to keep to their word, or by selfish people for objects of convenience, in which the man makes the better bargain, or it is marred by the exclusiveness of one partner or another, and the denial of rational friendship. In a word, it breaks down through the perversity and thoughtlessness of human nature. To these rational pleas are joined the hesitation of the fastidious, the dislike of the "new woman" for being commanded or thrown out of the agreeable circle of her maiden life, its serious work and single responsibilities. Therefore this ill-adapted institution must be a terminable contract, a lawyer-like lease, terminable at seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, not a life-long engagement. So they proceed to draw up the ideal contract. And they all come to grief, and the exultant ascetic, to whom marrying and giving in marriage are an abomination before the Lord, tears up the new social assignment before the first section of the first clause has been drafted. In this dilemma none can help. The Church is impotent; even the State—Mr. Shaw's idealised State—is not much better. The conclusion would seem to be that the sense of human justice and right must set to work, on lines that will give woman a chance—though, indeed, she seems to ask for nothing more than to be slain on the old terms and on the old altar, misunderstood to the last by her priest and betrayer.

This, I imagine, is something like the riddle which Mr. Shaw has tossed about from the mouth of one philanderer to another. If it is needlessly obscure, if it is at times handled too slackly, at others too lightly, it is because, as an artist, Mr. Shaw has set out on a wrong track. Having started amiss, his inventiveness fails him at critical moments, so that he falls back on old characters like the waiter in "You Never Can Tell," or adapts a type like the Major in "The Voysey Inheritance," which fits more naturally into its original environment. On this point he may take the verdict of a friendly audience, or he may ask himself whether all the masters that have gone before him are not in the right and he in the wrong.

H. W. M.

Art.

THE SOROLLA EXHIBITION.

Nearly three hundred paintings, the work of Senor Sorolla y Bastida, who is one of the best known figures in the modern school of Spain, are now being shown at the Grafton Galleries. The first point that strikes one about this exhibition is its extent; the second, its variety. There are very few living painters who could fill these galleries with their recent work as completely as Senor Sorolla has done, and there are fewer who could equal his amazing versatility. These facts contribute towards making the collection an interesting one. The remaining, and most important, fact is the quality of the work. One can hardly deny that, apart from the speed with which he paints, Senor Sorolla is an artist of the most uncommon power, a phenomenon in modern Spanish art. The newer phases of this art have only just begun to be known and appreciated in England. A few years ago, before the International Society was inaugurated, men like Zuloaga and Anglada might have been forgotten artists of the dead ages for all the attention they received from ourselves. Even when Zuloaga became established as a regular exhibitor at the annual show in London, his style was barely recognised as Spanish by a nation that had grown accustomed to identify modern Spanish art with the highly-coloured literalism of Mariano Fortuny. The Spanish Exhibition, held a few years ago at the Guildhall, fostered this notion in regard to the art of the modern school. The modern section was filled with paintings more or less in the manner of Fortuny, those of the more advanced school being inconspicuous or absent. Hence we, as a nation, knew very little of what is being done by artists in Madrid or Valencia, and we should be grateful to Senor Sorolla in that his exhibition lets us know a little more. We are also indebted to him for a very ample demonstration of an unique artistic individuality, which in this month of Academy visiting is particularly welcome.

This is not to admit, as the posters claim, that Senor Sorolla is "the world's greatest artist." Nonsensical statements of this kind can only prejudice the opinion of art-lovers who are best able to judge and appreciate his merit. He has, in no lesser degree than many other living painters we could name, the defects of his qualities; in spite of his vast range of subjects, he is necessarily debarred from combining all the excellences in the painting of them. Something has to be sacrificed by every artist, and a great deal by all except the very greatest. The greatest truth of light and atmosphere, spontaneity in expression and action, can only be acquired at the expense of detail, and of those graver, more reposeful truths that mark a faultless, perfectly finished composition; and happy is the painter who can make up his mind to the sacrifice either of one thing or the other, and concentrate his energies on the end he has in view. Certainly Senor Sorolla can do this. In all his works there is no quality more prominent than his single-mindedness, than his knowledge of what he wants and his intention to get it. We realise this especially in what may be termed roughly, but not inaccurately, the plein air class of his paintings. His success in this class is more pronounced than in certain low-toned portraits, where he seeks to emulate the manner, without achieving the subtlety, of Whistler. The comparative failure of these latter gives us a clue to his artistic nature. It would seem as if light and colour and atmosphere were essential to it. His pictures of boys bathing, girls playing, peasants and fishermen, seas and woodlands, everything and everywhere that the sunlight glorifies, the breeze cools, and nature's atmosphere transforms from hour to hour, all these bubble and sparkle with colour and light, the gay light and colour of the South. The first impression, indeed, that one forms of this exhibition is that of its brightness, of its vivacious contrasts, and of its almost reckless daring. Perhaps it is because one is confronted with so much colour that the sober, more symphonic pictures, few as they are and distributed throughout the galleries, appear to be dull, lifeless, and even ill at ease in this multi-hued assemblage. The exhibition "shouts," as a whole, and the few quiet voices are lost in the general clamour. But their failure to impress one is not entirely due to this circumstance. Senor Sorolla can paint many things, but it would be absurd to pretend he can paint all equally well, and it is in these low-toned portraits and pictures, in spite of his evidently long and earnest study of Velasquez, that he reaches his low-water mark. The best of them are portraits such as the "Dr. Decref" and the "Dr. Madenaveitia," where the lighting of the face, as apart from the general reticence of the scheme, gives scope for his talent to express itself in vigorous modelling. These and one or two others are as searching revelations of character as Lenbach, of whose art they are reminiscent, ever painted.

The main feature of his painting, however, is its joyous bounding vitality. A naturalistic artist to the core, he is best where he is most naturalistic. The three figures of his "Swimmers," their frog-like bodies seen through the green water, are a striking realisation of action cleverly caught. Similarly, "The Skipping Rope" gives us delightfully the lithe, buoyant movement of a slender girl, plus the sunlight and buoyancy of an open space in the town. Sumptuousness, controlled but still sumptuous, characterises the first group of "My Children," but we are brought up sharp by the second—composed decoratively, but with the decorative formality quite upset by the middle child's being the personification of animated fun. After what we have seen and said, it is less surprising for its failure than for its nearness to success. Another surprise is the nude in the Central Gallery —a "Spanish Gipsy" in the attitude of Velasquez's "Venus" reversed, realistic in the extreme, yet chaste, a pale olive form against pale rich rose—a seeming exotic after the open-air, frankly painted "Sea Nymphs" in the same room. At the end of the long gallery hangs a portrait of King Alfonso. His Majesty wears the uniform of Colonel of the 16th Lancers, but not even the colour opportunities afforded by this redeem the portrait from flatness and undue constraint; it is one of the few pictures in which the artist appears to have felt the weight of tradition and bowed beneath it to the extent of producing a well-watered Velasquez. His other portrait of the king is far preferable. It is as if the background of woodland and the presence of dappled sunshine had given him the necessary confidence to let his brush riot with the blue and scarlet of the Spanish Hussars. More and more does the open air seem indispensable to this vivid transmitter of light. Take the biggest picture of all, the "Beaching the Boat, Valencia." From the door of the Octagon room this canvas stares across the room at us, a blaze of blue sea, and dull red oxen plunging in the shallows, and white bellying sail that almost seems to swell with a puff of wind as we look. All the vigour of a vigorous man has gone to the making of this vast insistent canvas. It conveys indescribably the sense of freshness, of nearness to nature, that one associates with a small sketch done out of doors.

This work epitomises the robustness of Senor Sorolla's art. The morbid fevers that waste the talent of so many a modern painter do not touch it; the only fever that burns within him is the fever to visualise the thing seen quickly. With the aid of a vast technical facility, he is able to do this pretty much as he pleases, and, as he has learnt the secret of painting to scale, he can do it on a fourteen foot canvas as surely as on a four-inch panel. "Beaching the Boat" suggests nothing so much as a huge outdoor sketch dashed in by the hand of a giant. There is one more thing to note While he has absorbed the essence of many styles he has become the slave of none; he varies his technique with his subjects and with the different ways he sees them. He uses all and discards all with the kind of elemental strength which, despite its roughness, attracts far more than it repels.

Poetry.

A SONG.

Going up the hill, I found it long
Until I met a merry Song
That kiss'd mine eyes to blind me.
It mock'd at me, and turn'd and fled,
But played on, fluttering overhead,
Till I forgot I went footsore,
And the dusty hill that rose before
Was the blue hill far behind me!

Herbert Trench.

Communications.

THE TERRITORIAL ARTILLERY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—That considerable body of Englishmen who thoroughly appreciate Mr. Haldane's effort to provide a solution of the problem of defence short of compulsory service, and who earnestly desire to help, by personal service and otherwise, towards the attainment of that solution, must be unpleasantly conscious that the various eminent men who are attempting to discourage those ready to make a whole-hearted effort towards the success of the Territorial Army are doing an ill service to their country. The state at which military affairs in this country have arrived needs some great and almost revolutionary treatment; and while calmly and thoroughly considering all the solid facts with which we are confronted, surely we should, at the same time, be careful to chill as little as possible that enthusiasm the inspiration of which is so necessary to the establishment of any scheme adequate to deal with the present crisis.

The primary questions to be considered in dealing with the Territorial Field Artillery are: first, is any alternative artillery for the home army possible? and, secondly, is such field artillery itself impossible? As to the first point, no one has ever succeeded in establishing a complete scheme of regular artillery for the purpose of the defence of these islands, and in the opinion of most experts any such scheme is out of the question. As the "Times" military correspondent wrote on March 14th: "It is not practical politics to expect that this Government, or any Government, will give us 196 batteries on a regular footing for the Territorial Force. The cost would be prohibitive, even if we could find the necessary recruits, which is exceedingly doubtful." Nor has the idea ever been conceived as practical politics. In 1887, when we were precisely in the same position as we should be to-day were we left with not one battery of regular field artillery over and above those allocated to the striking force, a most interesting debate took place at the Royal United Service Institution upon this very question of the possibility of establishing territorial field artillery. It was frankly admitted by practically all who took part in this debate that the idea of providing these islands with regular field artillery for home defence must be abandoned.

General the Rt. Hon. Sir Henry Brackenbury, then Director of Military Intelligence, and speaking, as he said, "with the responsibility which attaches to me as the head of the Intelligence Department of the War Office," said that he believed that it was hopeless to ask the nation to provide batteries of Royal Artillery in time of peace, over and above what was required for the striking force, in order that they might take the field with the auxiliary forces in time of invasion. Colonel Sir Edward Hill put the matter even more strongly: "No doubt if field artillery could be supplied by batteries of the Royal Artillery, that would be the best solution of the difficulty; but I am satisfied there is no Minister, past, present, or future, who would dare to get up and propose the necessary vote for such an expenditure of money. Therefore I think we may conclude that we must look to the auxiliary forces to supply the deficiency." Therefore, this assemblage of experts decided that an attempt should be made to raise territorial field artillery. "My personal opinion," said Sir Henry Brackenbury, "is strongly in favour of having a large force of volunteer field artillery. I say that unhesitatingly, and I believe it is not until we have such a force that we shall really be able to consider these shores of ours safe from invasion."

In the course of this most interesting discussion a mass of useful information and fertile suggestion was brought forward, and after reading the account of the whole debate, the impression left upon the mind is that the case for the territorial field artillery was not only supported by those responsible to Parliament for the expenditure on armaments, but was admitted by the highest military authorities.

What has happened since that time? Has any determined effort been made to carry out the scheme which seemed so well recommended? After examination of the facts, it must be confessed that no such effort has been made. It is true that to-day there are in existence certain batteries of volunteer field artillery, but they are not even officially recognised, and they are not part of any coherent scheme, but are the results of individual, isolated, and almost unofficial enterprise.

The history of their growth may be given in a few words. About 1887 a certain number of Volunteer Garrison Artillery batteries were converted into heavy or position batteries. They were hauled by ordinary farm-horses, and were led by the farm workmen who usually worked them. Some batteries had 40 pounders, some 20, and some 16 pounders R.M.L., in fact, the whole scheme was a very patchwork affair. The Volunteers, however, determined to progress towards better things, and gradually, without official sanction, but within the knowledge of inspecting officers and others, they replaced the farm-horses by light draught horses and mounted drivers. And so the whole matter worked on until it reached its present condition, which is still unofficial, as in the Army List they are still called R.G.A., although they turn out in all respects as field artillery.

It is presumably from the results obtained by these, so to speak, "experiments," and by the Lancashire Royal Field Artillery, that Mr. Haldane has concluded that a large scheme of territorial field artillery is worth the trial. In any case, two points stand out: first, that it has always been held to be impracticable to provide a complete set of regular batteries for home defence and, secondly, that the alternative, an auxiliary field artillery, has never been given a fair chance.

Lord Lansdowne, in the House of Lords on March 16th, recited how His Majesty's advisers at the time of the South African War had added about 60 batteries before they went out of office; but he had to confess, what is now universally known, that these batteries were incomplete and unable to be mobilised. Mr. Haldane recognised this fact, and preferred a smaller scheme of fully equipped batteries to a larger one of batteries which could never take the field. An attempt had indeed been made by the Conservative Government to provide regular artillery for the home defence. But it had failed. There was left the territorial field artillery solution which had never been properly tried, and which Mr. Haldane for the first time now recommends for proper trial. Surely on the face of it every effort should be made to secure favourable conditions for this last attempt at a scheme which has yet to prove its value, and every encouragement afforded to those who are ready to assist it to success?

"But," it is said by those who are too ready to condemn the new scheme without seeing that there is a practicable alternative, "the whole thing is from the first impossible." Is it so? In the first place, as it has been pointed out, it has never been tried. In the second place, precedent and reason alike by no means condemn the new idea. It must be remembered throughout that the Second Line Army is not intended to repulse a surprise attack at the commencement of a war. A large part of the Regular Army would be in England at that time, and the considerable period which would have to elapse before it would be despatched out of the country would afford time for the training of troops which, at the lowest estimate, may be called semi-trained already. It is not, therefore, a complete body of highly-trained men, ready for instant action in an emergency, which we are called upon to secure; but a force which has undergone the preliminary stages of instruction, and which hard and constant work can in a short time make capable of efficient resistance to an invasion. It is superfluous, therefore, and indeed ridiculous, to institute any comparison between the artillery required for the First Line Army and that necessary for home defence.

Next let us see what we can learn abroad as to the possibility of raising auxiliary field artillery. Looking, as is so often expedient, to the Colonies, we find exactly such a system in full operation. In Canada, the whole artillery, garrison and field alike, is established on almost identically the same basis as that on which it is proposed to found the new system of field artillery in these islands. Officers and men alike are not professional soldiers, but citizens, who in many cases spare only a few days a year from their work at the office or on the land. At first there were only nine working days to be spent in camp during the year. This time has now been extended to a fortnight. Horses and drivers have proved no difficulty, and by establishing the headquarters of the different brigades in the towns, the gunners and non-commissioned officers are able to acquire efficiently their various duties. When I myself was over in Canada I studied with interest this system of what may be called auxiliary artillery, and all I could hear or see tended to establish the opinion that the scheme worked economically and efficiently.

The Canadian example offers striking support to those who contend for the trial of Mr. Haldane's territorial field artillery; nor do arguments which at first seem gravely to weigh against it appear so insuperable when carefully examined. Much outcry has been raised concerning the difficulty of obtaining horses, drivers, and officers. With regard to horses, the Canadian example and English precedent prove that they can be obtained and trained. The County Associations, with their knowledge of their own localities, should have no difficulty in finding men willing to become drivers, and, judging from the evidence offered at the United Service Institution debate, an advertisement in the papers would have the desired effect of procuring some old regular artillery drivers, who are still capable of doing the work to which they were accustomed. As for the officers, not only must there be plenty of retired officers who would be ready and able to come out for 14 days a year in their old capacity, but under the stimulus of the County Association it is practically certain that many young men of the excellent type required will be willing to enter this most attractive branch of the service, and give up a certain amount of their leisure to making themselves acquainted with duties which are in themselves of no small interest.

While Mr. Haldane's scheme must appear on close examination deserving of a most thorough trial, it may happen that some reassurance must be given to those who hesitate to trust the defence of these islands entirely to auxiliary forces. In this case it might be suggested that this reassurance should take the form of a small nucleus of regulars to be allotted to each battery. These men would not only prove most valuable in the instruction of their fellow soldiers, but could if necessary take out one section of the battery at almost a moment's notice. Thus where a brigade of territorial field artillery was stationed together, there would always be a battery ready for immediate service; and even in the case of isolated batteries a section would be available.

No doubt there will be certain amendments which it will be found advisable to make in Mr. Haldane's scheme; but there can be no doubt whatever that the energies of those who desire the efficient defence of the United Kingdom should be directed towards suggesting such amendments, and not aimed at the general condemnation of a scheme which offers fair prospects of success, and to which there seems to be no practicable alternative.—Yours, &c.,

E. Crawshay-Williams.

May 12th, 1908. Late Lieut. R.F.A.

Letters to the Editor.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent "Spectator" is not right in his correction of the paragraph on this subject which appeared in your issue of May 2nd. The words "refined sugar only" printed in italics in his letter do not occur in the text of the clause. It says "sugar refined in the United Kingdom and thence exported shall be accompanied by a certificate," &c. The expression sugar must be interpreted in accordance with Clause I. of the original Convention, which says that "sugar sweetened products such as preserves, biscuits, and all other analogous products are assimilated to sugar." I have noticed the efforts of our diplomatists to which "Spectator" refers, but I draw a less favourable conclusion from them than he does. No doubt our representative explains that he stated clearly that Great Britain could not undertake to furnish certificates of origin with sugared products, but if this view had been accepted by the Convention it should appear in the text. Moreover, the text is accompanied by an explanation which states that the form of certificate of origin which States can demand has not been annexed to the additional Act, although it has been approved by the Permanent Commission and placed on the minutes of the sittings. This secrecy on a matter vital to our manufactures rouses my suspicions, and is a good illustration of the distrust with which the Convention is regarded. As to the suggestion in "Spectator's" letter that our exports would be penalised if the Convention were terminated, this is the common Protectionist argument, but British manufacturers have done very well in the past without such assistance.—Yours, &c.,

May 13th, 1908. Anti-Convention.

THE JUSTICE OF THE LICENSING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Swanwick desires to spread abroad "two salient facts" about the Bill, both of which seem to be incorrect.

1. "That the Bill, if passed, will leave two out of every three public-houses untouched."

The scale in the Bill does not provide this. In this licensing division there are one market town and eight villages. There are now 83 licences. Mr. Asquith's Bill provides a scale for closing 58, leaving 25 in 1923. This is closing 69 per cent. The convictions for drunkenness in this division in 1907 were four. In ten Hertfordshire towns the Bill will close 68 per cent. In the twelve largest Cambridgeshire villages the Bill will close 71 per cent. There is very little drunkenness in these rural districts, where people chiefly drink a light beer. A probable effect of the Bill will be the closing of nearly all the beer-house licences, leaving the full licences, and the effect of a heavy monopoly charge will be a premium on selling cheap spirits in preference to beer.

The Bill does not leave two out of three public-houses.

2. "That the owners and licensees of the houses closed will be fairly and fully compensated."

In the first place, the compensation provided is taken out of the pockets of the owners and licensees, and is to be only a partial insurance of a difference in rental value with and without the licence. In no trade has Schedule A as assessed on premises ever been based on the extent, value, or profits of the business carried on at those premises. It is based on the annual letting value of the premises in the open market.

No shopkeeper, merchant, or manufacturer would accept as compensation for the loss of his business a sum based on the Schedule A assessment of the premises in which his business is carried on.

The compensation clauses in the Licensing Bill provide only for a loss of rental value, and omit the much more important value contained in the loss of business.

Schedule A on the profits of tied houses is assessed and paid at the brewery.

This simple fact is entirely ignored in the Bill. The owner of licensed premises is unable to transfer his business to other premises, as a new licence cannot be obtained. He is entitled to some compensation for loss of trade.

The limited licence system enforced by the State has compelled brewers to carry on their business at particular premises. Although the trade may find new channels, the loss of capital in closing houses is admittedly very large. The Licensing Bill ignores this loss, and merely provides an insurance fund, collected from those who incur the loss, to refund in the case of licences withdrawn, the capitalised difference of the loss on rentals diminishing annually by fourteen instalments.

Many licensed houses will be closed on which the compensation will be only a few pounds per cent. of the capital involved.

The following is an illustration: "The Black Horse," High Street, Hitchin. Schedule A assessment £48. Licence £20. Compensation levy £10. The assessment is a fair assessment of the full annual letting value, as a free house, to a free tenant. The tenant's nominal rent to his brewer is £19, but owing to the high assessment (on which a triple charge depends), rates at 7s. in the £, licence at £20, compensation levy at £10, he is, in fact, unable to pay any rent. The trade, about 200 barrels a year, is of value to the brewery, and until the Licensing Bill was introduced could easily be capitalised and sold at £1,200. The spirit trade is not tied.

This house is in a position in which it may probably be worth £40 rent for another trade, leaving £8 a year as the basis of compensation to be received under the Bill.

After paying a levy of £10 a year the owners may receive such a sum as will provide an annuity of £8 for an unexpired portion of fourteen years. If closed in 1923 the owners will have paid £190 to the Compensation Fund, and will receive £8. Can this be termed a full and fair compensation for a loss of business recently worth £1,200, a figure to which nothing has been added during the speculative rise in public-house prices? This is a concrete example of what will happen under the present compensation clauses of the Bill. Compensation becomes a phrase meaning nothing. A high licence system graduated on the density of the population is in my opinion much to be preferred to the complicated process contained in this Bill.—Yours, &c.,

COUNTRY BREWER.

May 11th, 1908.

THE BRITISH SUNDAY AND THE EXHIBITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was glad to see the letter from the Honorary Secretary of your Sunday Society in the "Times" yesterday. As Mr. Judge truly says, the public of France are waiting to learn whether the great exhibition is to be open on Sundays. I may say that they are anxiously waiting for the answer to the question, for on it depends whether thousands of our people will, or will not, be able to visit the exhibition, in which the Fine Arts section will be of such exceptional value that the "Times" properly describes it as "by far the finest collection of works of art, French and British, that has ever been brought together in this country" (the United Kingdom).

The very idea of closing such an exhibition on Sundays surprises a Frenchman, for with us it is just on Sundays that such exhibitions receive the largest number of visitors. We, however, take into account the habits of the different countries. Sunday rest has for more than two hundred and thirty years formed part of the legislation of the British people and has entered into their customs. I understand, therefore, why the industrial and commercial parts of the exhibition should be shut on Sundays, but need this extend, even in England, to the art collections? As set out in the address of the Sunday Society to the French people, the national collections of art in London are now open on Sundays. Has this opening of the national museums and galleries exercised a bad moral influence? Can it be said that the seeing of artistic objects does not form part of a people's education? It must surely be of educational importance to afford opportunities for the study of the scientific and artistic achievements of two such countries as Britain and France, and draw comparisons between them. Is not that, indeed, the raison d'être of the exhibition? Well, then, let us facilitate visits to the exhibition as much as possible. It is most important for the French visitor that these science and are collections should be visible on Sundays.

Nowadays the inspection of scientific or artistic treasures is no longer regarded as an aristocratic privilege. But the workman who took a day from work in order to visit the exhibition would pay heavily for it. In addition to the admission there would be the loss of his day's earnings. With Sunday closing the tendency would be to make the exhibition a privilege for the well-to-do.

With the liberal policy now adopted by the British Parliament in regard to the Sunday opening of the collections in your national museums and galleries, we cannot believe that similar collections in the exhibition will be shut on Sundays. If one allows that the result is good in case of works of the past, would it not be the same in the case of contemporary art and science?—Yours, &c.,

YVES GUYOT.

95, Rue de Seine, Paris,
May 12th, 1908.

LIFE OF DELANE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I must take exception to one passage in your interesting review of my "Life of Delane," in your issue of May 2nd. The accidental transposition of two prepositions in page 266 of the second volume, a mistake which will be corrected in the next edition, is hardly sufficient warranty for the statement that I have "misreported simple facts of contemporary history like the Benedetti Treaty." The context shows that the mistake is nothing more than a typographical error.

In fairness to myself I must request you to give this explanation the same publicity as your criticism of my work.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR IRWIN DASENT.

The Dutch House, Hampton-on-Thames,
May 7th, 1908.

[Of course, we accept Mr. Dasent's explanation, and withdraw our comment. But as his sentence stood, it reversed the truth about the origin of the Treaty.—ED. NATION.]

THE TRADE IN FICTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your nervous anxiety for "the liberty of the great artist," contained in your reference to my having "cut" a story by Robert Louis Stevenson, may perhaps be allayed when I inform you that Mr. Stevenson, when he came to publish his "Beach of Falesa" in book form, adopted almost to a word my alteration of his work, and thus it stands to-day.

Assuming, Sir, that you received on occasion a contribution of unquestionably literary merit and undeniably artistic taste, but here and there a touch of Rabelaisian frankness, would you or would you not insert that in your journal? I think you would "cut"—after consultation with the author, of course, where the author was available, but without consulting him if he were many thousands of miles away.

On this question of the blue pencil in literature there has been much astonishingly foolish comment in the daily journals since the verdict in the "Rita" case. My protest is against the whole of the pretentious army of makers of the fiction of the day. There are degrees of humility and of arrogance with these gentlemen, very much after the fashion that there is with tradesmen. One man keeps a small butter shop in a side street, another a substantial emporium in a main road, a third sells his butter wholesale. I am not quite sure that the airs of butter merchants Nos. 2 and 3 at the expense of butter merchant No. 1 are warranted. It is so with the fiction trade of to-day—usually a less satisfactory condiment than butter.

In the "Rita" case witness after witness declared that he was in the habit of writing stories for serial publication, and did not mind what changes were made by his editor or to what extent his stories were "cut." Among such witnesses were Mr. Coulson Kernahan, Mr. William Le Queux, and Mr. Robert Leighton.

Another array of witnesses, also well-known writers of fiction, declared that they would not have a line of their work cut by an editor. Of these gentlemen I say nothing, for some of them are personal friends. I take them, however, as representatives of a class. Of this class it may be said that the particular demand for their work safeguards them from selling it under conditions in which it would be necessary to cut. Such a publication as "Tit-Bits" or "Answers" would not add thousands to its circulation by the publication of a story by any one of these. It does not want them—it does not buy them. On the other hand, the "high-class" magazine, which is sometimes not so much edited as flung together, finds it quite convenient to publish their work without deleting a line, and buys on these conditions, generally from a literary agent, who is often the real editor of the publication in question. Sometimes the editor buys the story without reading it at all.

I am unable to take these more prominent novelists of the hour quite as seriously as they take themselves. I read many scores of their works a year. With most of them I find only a trade trick. Cutting would not make less a work of art of what was never in the remotest degree a work of art.

If I send an article to a newspaper I frequently find that it has been "cut" by the editor. I presume, Sir, that you have "cut" the articles of your contributors on occasion. Now I consider my article quite as much a work of art as nine-tenths of the novels published each year. Well, it has never occurred to me that I had any remedy against the editor, not even the £5 that a jury awarded to Rita. The £100 for calling her novel a "new story" is a separate issue.

Some time ago I sent a letter to one of the leading morning newspapers; half of it appeared. That was because the editor did not agree with the other half. This I counted an outrage, and if the law is to protect our writers of fiction, I think it should protect our writers of facts.—Yours, &c.,

May 9th, 1908. CLEMENT SHORTER.

PENSIONS AND THE SINKING FUND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I confess that I read your comments on the Budget with some astonishment.

A small pension scheme has been introduced which by working (1) an income limit, and (2) a pauper limit, contrives to whittle down cost to £6,000,000 or so per annum.

This scheme, small as it is, is not financed by the present Budget. Only £1,200,000, or less than the so-called "nucleus" of last year, is provided; as to the balance of £4,800,000, we have only a mysterious hint as to the Sinking Fund.

You, Sir, joyfully welcoming this hint, translate it into figures, expressing your belief that the annual appropriation to the debt services, put by Mr. Austen Chamberlain at £28,000,000, is to be reduced next year to £25,000,000.

You are encouraged to do this by Mr. Asquith's statement, which you endorse, that at March 31st, 1909, the debt will be where it was twenty years ago.

But why go back twenty years? Here are the facts:—

1889	.....	£697,000,000
1899	.....	£628,000,000
1909	.....	£696,000,000

At March 31st, 1909, the National Debt, that is, will be £68,000,000 higher than before the war, when Liberals properly protested against a Tory raid on the sinking fund.

Yet, with about one-third of the war cost still remaining as debt, for not knowing how soon our financial strength may be again sorely tried, THE NATION contemplates with satisfaction the financing of a pension scheme out of the Sinking Fund. Nay, not merely "out of" the Sinking Fund, for the new Sinking Fund is but about £3,000,000. You would annihilate it.

The debt repayments of the last two years have been chiefly accidental, arising from (1) our unparalleled trade boom, (2) the deaths of rich people, and (3) mistakes in estimating revenue. The contemplated raid would be designed and either permanent or replaced by a revenue quite as legitimately, if not more legitimately, obtained from "Tariff Reform."

But this is not all. Last year's revenue was obviously under-estimated, as I pointed out at the time. This year's revenue is, I fear, over-estimated. One-tenth or so of the financial year has already expired, and here is the record:—

	Revenue.
32 Working Days, April 1st to May 9th, 1908 ..	£14,762,532
35 Working Days, April 1st to May 11th, 1907 .	£17,019,468

At the rate of last year, £15,540,000 should have come in. So that we have a loss of £780,000 in a tenth of the year. Also a working day is lost, and another will be lost. It is, of course, too soon to speak with complete confidence, but in view of the extraordinary slump in trade shown by the April trade returns, we must expect bad revenue figures.

One thing may save us—the income-tax, that incomparable instrument which is still used so clumsily, and which the Government blindly refuse to use wisely. Mr. Asquith pointed out that the individual declarations up to £2,000 a year had led in 1907-8 to the revelation of much more income, the gross assessments now reaching £980,000,000. Yet Mr. Asquith refused last year to entertain my proposal that the rich, as well as those with up to £2,000 a year, should declare their incomes. It would but need this simple and just provision to bring the gross assessments well over £1,000,000,000—the net income of about 5,000,000 people of the "classes" now approximating to that figure. I mention this to remind you, and the Government, that a nation with such stores of wealth should deem it unnecessary either to whittle pensions down to a £5,000,000 undertaking, or to pay that £6,000,000 by raiding a too small Sinking Fund.—Yours, &c.,

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY.

House of Commons, May 14th, 1908.

THE DUNDEE ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have seen many letters, in which attempts have been made to arrive at a true comparison between the bye-election just decided at Dundee, and the election at the same place in January, 1906. As far as I can judge, none of these attempts has been successful, mainly because the correspondents concerned do not appear to have seen an analysis of the voting of 1906.

The then candidates were Robertson and Robson, Liberals; Wilkie, Labor; Shackleton and Smith, Conservatives.

This is how the voting went:—

Robertson and Wilkie	3,183
,, Robson	5,953
,, Shackleton	65
,, Smith	24
,, plumpers	51
Wilkie and Robson	124
,, Shackleton	769
,, Smith	204
,, plumpers	2,553
Robson and Shackleton	27
,, Smith	5
,, plumpers	13
Shackleton and Smith	2,934
,, plumpers	16
Smith, plumpers	16

Now votes, either plumpers or split, which have gone to any one political party are, of course, votes belonging solely to that party.

On the other hand, votes which have been split between two different parties should, to arrive at a just total, be divided equally between those parties.

Now, taking this method and applying it to the analysis, we find that the votes recorded for each party in 1906 were:—

Liberal, 5,953 + 51 + 13 + $\left\{\frac{1}{2}\right.$ of (3,183 + 65 + 24 + 124 + 27 + 5) = $\left.\right\}$ 1,714 = 7,731.

Labor, 2,553 + $\left\{\frac{1}{2}\right.$ of (3,183 + 124 + 769 + 204) = $\left.\right\}$ 2,140 = 4,693.

Conservative, 2,934 + 70 + 16 + $\left\{\frac{1}{2}\right.$ of (65 + 24 + 769 + 204 + 27 + 5) = $\left.\right\}$ 547 = 3,567.

The poll last week was—Liberal, 7,079; Conservative, 4,370; Labor, 4,014; from which it appears that the Liberals and Labor have lost 652 and 679 respectively, while the Conservatives have gained 803. Perhaps it would be better to apportion the Prohibition vote of 655. It is hardly likely that any of these were drawn from the Tories; but suppose the odd 55 were, then divide the remaining 600 equally among Liberal and Labor. This would show the following Table:—

	1908.	1906.
Liberal ...	7,379 ...	7,731 ...	Decrease 352
Conservative .	4,425 ...	3,567 ...	Increase 858
Labor ...	4,314 ...	4,693 ...	Decrease 379

The figures appear to bring out: (1) The great steadfastness of all parties at Dundee, which compares very favourably with the unreliability of all parties in these southern parts, where the strong, silent, dependable Englishman is supposed to reside. (2) The fact that the Liberal and Labor Parties suffer together; and (3) That the deserters to Protection are drawn about equally from each of the two other parties.

If this last is not so, then, if the deserters are mainly Liberal, the consequent loss to the Liberal Party is partly made up by secessions to it from the Labor Party, while if the deserters are mainly from Labor, the loss to that party is partly made up by an influx of Liberals.—Yours, &c.,

F. HUBERT JONES.

68, Tarvin Road, Chester,
May 13th, 1908.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

A BIOGRAPHY that can hardly fail to be of great political and literary interest is "The Life and Letters of Lady Russell," which will be published by Messrs. Methuen during the coming autumn season. As Lord John Russell's wife Lady Russell occupied a position of great importance in the political society of the last century, and her own undoubted gifts of character and intellect, as well as her singular charm of manner and conversation, made her house a meeting place for the chief Liberal and Radical leaders of her time. She interested herself in a great variety of subjects, and among her correspondents were Moore, Rogers, Mazzini, Dickens, and Dr. Martineau. Unlike most of the great Whig ladies, her advocacy of progressive causes became firmer rather than weaker as time went on, and she was far more of a Radical, tending even to Socialism, than a Whig at the end of her life. The task of preparing the biography has been entrusted to Mr. Desmond MacCarthy, and he has had access to a large number of unpublished diaries and letters, including the correspondence between Lord John Russell and his wife at the time of the Free Trade agitation, which was not available for Sir Spencer Walpole's "Life of Lord John Russell." It will be remembered that Lord John Russell visited Napoleon at Elba, and had long conversations with him there. It is to be hoped that Mr. MacCarthy will see fit to include in the coming book some portions of the diary in which Lord John noted down these conversations. Mr. Justin MacCarthy will contribute to the work a chapter of personal reminiscences of Lady Russell.

* * *

MESSRS. PUTNAM'S SONS are to publish a fifth series of Mr. Paul Elmer More's "Shelburne Essays" within the next few weeks. Former volumes of these essays have been an exception to the rule that a volume of essays on literary themes can never hope for a large circulation. Mr. More's success is gratifying, for he never panders to the passion for gossip. His work is true criticism, dignified, acute, and sober, and he has, too, a real feeling for style. Most of the essays in the coming volume have already appeared in the New York "Nation," and among the subjects treated are "The Greek Anthology," "The Praise of Dickens," "George Gissing," "Mrs. Gaskell," "Philip Freneau," "Thoreau's Journal," "The Centenary of Longfellow," "James Thomson (B.V.)," "Chesterfield," and "Sir Henry Wotton." One of the most striking of the essays is that which deals with the author of "The City of Dreadful Night." Mr. More classes Lucretius, Leopardi, and Thomson as typical of three aspects of pessimism. Lucretius, he states, may be said to speak for rebellious mankind, Leopardi for the patriot who merges his personal grievance in despondency over his nation, and Thomson for the individual who feels himself cut off by circumstances from the complete illusion of happiness. This is a happy characterisation of the three poets, for if Thomson has nothing of the splendid audacity and Roman courage of Lucretius, and little of Leopardi's patriotism, he has given effective expression to the mood of haunting despair.

* * *

AN account of Louis XVII., under the title "The King Who Never Reigned," will be published this autumn by Mr. Eveleigh Nash. It will contain the memoirs of Eckard and of Naundorff, together with a translation of M. Joseph Turquan's interesting attempt to solve the mystery that surrounds Louis XVII.'s fate. M. Turquan's theory is that the Dauphin was murdered in the Temple Prison at Robespierre's instigation, and that his place was taken by a child in the last stages of consumption, who was smuggled into the prison. M. Turquan's theory is simple, and has the merit of accounting for some at least of the facts, such, for instance, as the order that Madame Royale should not be allowed to see her brother, and the discovery of the skeleton of a child in the Temple. The fate of Louis XVII., like that of the Man in the Iron Mask, is one of those unsolved historical mysteries which have engaged many pens without any likelihood of certainty being reached.

ANOTHER work by M. Turquan, soon to make its appearance in English, is "The Sisters of Napoleon," which has been translated by Mr. W. R. H. Trowbridge. The view taken is that Napoleon's sisters had a greater influence on the march of events than is generally supposed, and that their action did much to damage the Emperor in the esteem of the masses. Caroline, Queen of Naples, certainly did something to promote the disasters of the Empire, and Elisa's conduct as Grand Duchess of Tuscany roused the hostility of the Italians, and was in part responsible for their desertion of Napoleon's cause in his hour of need. Pauline did less injury to her brother, but her scandalous life well merited the epithet "crowned courtesan," which has been applied to her. The lives of Napoleon's sisters and their influence upon his fortunes should certainly make an attractive addition to the history of the Empire. The book will be issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

* * *

Two novels of special promise to be published during the season are "The Little Brown Brother," by Mr. Stanley Portal Hyatt, which will be issued by Messrs. Constable, and "The Singular Republic," by Mr. W. H. Koebel, announced by Mr. Francis Griffiths. Mr. Hyatt came to the front last year with "Marcus Hay," a novel which made a great impression. His coming book is founded on his experiences of the Spanish-American War, and is said to be an uncompromising exposure of the corrupt side of American politics and its effect upon the war. Mr. Koebel is the author of "Modern Argentina," a delightful book of travel, reviewed in our issue of August 17th last. The scene of the new novel is laid in South America, where Mr. Koebel has lived for several years.

* * *

THE anonymous author of "Leaves from a Life" is at work on a new book, which will probably be called "Fresh Leaves." It will be occupied chiefly with reminiscences of country life. Mr. Eveleigh Nash is to be the publisher.

* * *

THE death of M. Ludovic Halévy on Friday week, at the ripe age of seventy-four, closes the career of one of the most witty and graceful of modern French writers. Halévy was known throughout the world as the collaborator of Meilhac and Offenbach. His librettos were a feature of the Second Empire, and are all marked by gaiety of conception and deft craftsmanship in execution. He won fame, too, in more serious work, for "Monsieur et Madame Cardinal," "L'Abbé Constantin," and "Criquette" are almost classics. He was a member of the French Academy for a quarter of a century, but wrote little since his election to that body in 1883. There are now two vacancies in the Academy, but it is understood that no steps will be taken to elect new members until the spring of next year.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Life and Letters of Herbert Spencer." By David Duncan, LL.D. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

"The Cradle of the Deep: An Account of a Voyage to the West Indies." By Sir Frederick Treves. (Smith, Elder. 12s. net.)

"The Life of Goethe." Vol. III. From 1815 to 1832. By Albert Bielschowsky. Translated by W. A. Cooper. (Putnam's Sons 15s. net.)

"The Rise of Man." By Colonel C. R. Conder, LL.D. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"Autobiography of Montagu Burrows." Edited by his son, Stephen Montagu Burrows. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

"The Court of Russia in the Nineteenth Century." By E. A. Brayley Hodgetts. (Methuen. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"From Edinburgh to India and Burmah." By W. G. Burn Murdoch. (Routledge. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Mr. Crewe's Career." By Winston Churchill. (Macmillan. 6s.)

"Le Pragmatisme." Etude de ses diverses formes, Anglo-Américaine, Française, et Italienne, et de sa Valeur Religieuse. Par Marcel Hébert. (Paris: Nourry. 1 fr. 25.)

"Molière: Les Théâtres, Le Public, et les Comédiens de son Temps." Par Karl Mantzius. Traduit du Danois par Maurice Pellisson. (Paris: Colin. 5 fr.)

"Souvenirs de la Duchesse de Dino." Publiés par sa petite-fille la Comtesse Jean de Castellane. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 7 fr. 50.)

"Le Baiser au Clair de Lune." Roman. Par Guy Chantepleure. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3 fr. 50.)

"Kirche und Sozialdemokratie." Von G. Liebster. (Berlin: M. 3.)

NOW READY, with a Coloured Frontispiece, 40 pages of Half-Tone Illustrations and 4 Sketch Maps. Small royal 8vo. 12s. net.

THE CRADLE OF THE DEEP.

An Account of a Visit to the West Indies.

BY

SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bart.,

Author of "The Other Side of the Lantern," "Tale of a Field Hospital," &c.

JUST PUBLISHED. Third, Revised and much Enlarged Edition. Small demy 8vo. 3s. 6d net.

HARDY ORNAMENTAL FLOWERING TREES AND SHRUBS.

By A. D. WEBSTER, Author of "Practical Forestry," "The Forester's Diary," &c.

MEMORIES OF MEN AND BOOKS.

By Rev. Professor ALFRED JOHN CHURCH, M.A., Author of "Stories from Homer," &c. With a Portrait. 8s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"Our only quarrel with this very agreeable book of reminiscences is that it sometimes withholds information where we particularly want it. But we must stifle our cry for more, which is, by the way, a true compliment to the book, and indicates the good things."

THE PASSING OF MOROCCO.

By FREDERICK MOORE, Author of "The Balkan Trail." With a Map and 12 pages of Illustrations, 5s. net.

Standard.—"Cleverly written, and gives some intimate views of recent scenes and developments in the Moorish Empire."

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING.

By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR. NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Revised and in parts Re-written by FREDERIC G. KENYON, D.Litt. With 2 Portraits, 7s. 6d. net.

Daily Mail.—"May now, thanks to Dr. Kenyon, be accepted by Browning enthusiasts as authoritative."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE GREY KNIGHT:

An Autumn Love Story.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

Illustrated London News.—"Altogether charming. . . . No one, we think, will read 'The Grey Knight' without feeling the better for it."

CROSSRIGGS.

By MARY and JANE FINDLATER.

Times.—"A book which contains an abundance of good things. The authors' principal claim to success is Alex Hope; in her they have added to the number of one's friends."

THE FLEMINGS.

By JESSIE and CHARLES FIELDING MARSH.

 A penetrating study of an artistic temperament drawn away from the hard and engrossing service of art by the love of a woman who possesses different ideals. [Just Published.

THE FOREFRONT of the BATTLE.

By ANDREW LORING.

Author of "The Rhymer's Lexicon," &c. [May 19.

 A story of adventure, politics, and romance, the hero being a young statesman of Cabinet rank. The plot is very ingenious, and the story contains many dramatic situations.

RE-ISSUE OF

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY,

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE.

IN TWENTY-TWO VOLUMES,

Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each;

or half-morocco, marbled edges, 21s. net each.

VOLUME III. (BROWN—CHALONER) NOW READY.

Daily Telegraph.—"One of the cheapest works of the kind ever put before the public. . . . In welcoming this new and marvellously cheap re-issue, which will cost only one-third of its original price and occupy only one-third of the shelf space, we may say that no public reference library will in future be worthy of the name that does not contain the 'Dictionary' in one or other of its forms."

London: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

16 Henrietta Street, W.C., and Edinburgh.

Mr. W. H. Lang's volume, "Australia," in the "Romance of Empire" series is now ready. The romantic incidents of Empire-building are graphically depicted. The artist, Mr. Lambert, is familiar with his subject, and contributes twelve telling illustrations, reproduced in their original colours. Of the previous volume, "Canada," by Beckles Willson, the "Saturday Review" describes it as "overflowing with adventure." 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

The idea of bringing together in neat and light volumes the best stories of all time has never yet been adopted. Messrs. Jack have commenced such a series in "The World's Story Tellers." Two volumes are ready: "Stories by Gautier" and "Stories by Hoffman." Only the best will be selected, and readers may be sure of obtaining volumes of entrancing interest and of genuine literary merit. Mr. Arthur Ransome edits the series and contributes introductions. Each volume has a frontispiece portrait by Miss J. Gavin from an authentic source. Cloth, 1s. net per volume.

Lovers of Opera will welcome Mr. Cuthbert Hadden's "The Operas of Wagner," and all who desire to follow the plot and understand the music will find a mine of wealth in this volume. The twenty-four superb illustrations in colour by an artist who has proved himself especially in sympathy with the Wagner themes—Mr. Byam Shaw—add greatly to the beauty of the book. It is at once the most perfect and the cheapest book on the subject. An ideal gift-book. 6s. net.

Of the "Masterpieces in Colour" series fourteen volumes have now been issued. Artists express surprise at the beauty of the reproductions. The first attempt to reproduce the world's masterpieces in their full glory of colour, revealing to many accustomed to the usual black-and-white illustrations beauties unrealised before. Messrs. Jack have sent a qualified representative to select and obtain the necessary permissions in the Continental galleries, and the pictures chosen include many unfamiliar subjects. Encouraged by the great success of the series many other volumes are being prepared. The four last issued are "Titian," "Holman Hunt," "Leighton," and "Raphael." The next two will be "Millais" and "Carlo Dolci." 1s. 6d. net per volume.

Mr. Birrell, M.P., has completed his selection of Browning's Poems, with introduction, notes, &c., and it now forms the twelfth volume in the "Golden Poets" series. Cloth, gilt, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Jack have always made a feature of "Nature Books," and the volume on "The Farm" has just been added to the "Shown to the Children" series. These volumes, which now include "Beasts," "Birds," "Flowers," "The Sea-Shore," contain no fewer than forty-eight illustrations reproduced in colour from original drawings. The text and plates are specially designed for children, and owing to their excellence and cheapness the volumes are in continuous demand. 2s. 6d. net.

"Napoleon" and "Oliver Cromwell," by H. E. Marshall, author of the ever-popular history of England for children ("Our Island Story"), have been added to the "Children's Heroes" series. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.

Spring List on Application.

London: T. C. & E. C. Jack,

16 Henrietta Street, W.C.; and Edinburgh.

Reviews.

THE DECAY OF DIVINE RIGHT.*

THAT religious thought is the key to political thought, and that there is an "absolute solidarity" between the controversies of the past and those of our own day are the main theses discussed and illustrated by Mr. Figgis in a volume whose modest size is no index to its importance. It presupposes a certain knowledge in the reader; but, given this, it may be said with confidence that its interest will be found as vivid as its learning and scientific temper are exceptional. It recalls the work of Acton and F. W. Maitland, and represents the Cambridge Historical School at its best.

The writing is necessarily compressed. The period covered is a seed-bed of later ideas and institutions; and the limits imposed by the circumstances under which the lectures were originally delivered—they were the Birkbeck Lectures of 1900—made anything like detail impossible. And the more carefully the facts are studied the more inadequate general statements professing to embody them appear.

> "Of course, all these statements are merely approximate. We can say no more than that certain tendencies were dominant at one time rather than another. The theocratic ideal is still discoverable; and there was very little theocracy about the Venetian Constitution in the Middle Ages. In the same way there was some real equality and independence among nations long before Dante wrote "De Monarchia"; and, if the State is not to be called such because it is loosely knit, what are we to say of the British Empire to-day?"

Nowhere do we feel this more than when we compare the medieval with the modern conception of Church and State. The Medieval Church stood in close relation to the Empire; in theory the two coincided. But this theory was never fully realised: the existence of such States as England and France outside the Empire made the formula inadequate, and gave the Church a reserve force which was an appreciable factor in her conflicts with the civil power. The result, however, of the association between the Holy Roman Church and the Holy Roman Empire was that the Church was not a State, as it became later, but the State: the State, or, rather, the civil authority (for a separate society was not recognised), was merely the police department of the Church.

> "The latter took over from the Roman Empire its theory of the absolute and universal jurisdiction of the supreme authority, and developed it into the doctrine of the plenitudo potestatis of the Pope, who was the supreme dispenser of law, the fountain of honour, including regal honour, and the sole legitimate earthly source of power, the legal if not the actual founder of religious orders, university degrees, the 'supreme judge and divider' among nations, the guardian of international right, the avenger of Christian blood. All these functions have passed elsewhere, and the theory of omnipotence, which the Popes held, on the plea that any action might come under their cognizance so far as it concerned morality, has now been assumed by the State on the analogous theory that any action, religious or otherwise, so far as it becomes a matter of money, or contract, must be a matter for the courts."

Mr. Figgis illustrates this change of view by an apposite reference to the Scottish Church Case of 1904, in which the present Secretary for War endeavoured, at considerable length, to explain to the late Lord Chancellor the notion of a Church. When did an Englishman understand the ecclesiastical politics of the superior part of this island? Mr. Haldane's well-meant effort was in vain.

Bellarmine's theory of the indirect power of the Pope in the civil sphere was an ingenious attempt to meet the new facts of the political world, while retaining the claims of the old Church under a modified formula. His treatise was condemned at once by the Index and by the Parliament of Paris. The instinct of the French lawyers was sound. The new view brought in by a side wind all that was most mischievous in the old, the extravagance of whose form had gone far to neutralise its content.

> "Under the mask of an indirect power, which is to interfere in politics in order to prevent laws being passed contrary to ecclesiastical liberty or against the virtue of the people, and may depose a monarch, if he attacks the immunities of the Church, it is clear that practical activity of the most dangerous kind might be exercised by the Popes; and that the doctrine, if carried to its extremes, might be so used as to mean a temporal sovereignty for the Pope, or at any rate an irritating suzerainty."

The object was to emphasise the distinction between the ecclesiastical and the civil power at the expense of the latter, which was conceived as purely secular, a human institution for material ends. The former was from above; this from beneath. The sovereignty of the people was urged by Suarez and Molina in the interests not of civil freedom but of Church authority, which was exalted in proportion as the State was belittled. The doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings was originally a protest against this; against ecclesiastical usurpation, that is to say, rather than popular liberties: it had the Pope, not the people, in view.

The medieval theory, which was that of so sound a Protestant as John Knox, was nearer the modern view than its sixteenth century modification; the Papalism of Augustinus Triumphus needed only to be laicised to be brought into contest with actuality. The Church becomes mankind viewed from the religious standpoint; its teaching the religious consciousness of mankind at its highest expression; its infallibility the fact that this consciousness in the long run justifies itself. In this view, the error, inevitable under the then existing circumstances, was the identification of this religious and moral sense with the pronouncements of the hierarchy: but, the centre of gravity changed, the theory holds. The other theory, even under Cavour's plausible formula, lands its advocates on the slippery slope of the societas perfecta doctrine of canonists, embodied in the Immortale Dei of Leo XIII. The Church is a "societas genere et jure perfecta, cum adjumenta ad incolumitatem actionemque suam necessaria voluntate beneficioque conditoris sui, omnia in se et per se ipsa possideat."

The Encyclical, which is to be found in the later editions of Denzinger's "Encheiridion," should be carefully studied by those who desire to compare the two views. To get behind both, the position of Sohm deserves more consideration than it has received in this country. Sohm, in Harnack's words, "ist ex errore per veritatem ad errorem gelangt." But there are few writers from whom so much is to be learned. Both the "Kirchenrecht" and the smaller "Grundriss der Kirchengeschichte," an excellent translation of which is available, should be consulted. For the Catholic side of the question, reference may be made to Hergenröther's "Catholic Church and Christian State."

Mr. Figgis has, we think, overstated the case against Probabilism. There are many varieties of this theory; and it may be said with truth that, in common with other casuistic theories, they are injurious to morality in so far as they formulate the exception. But no received doctrine holds "that it is morally justifiable for a man to pursue the course which he believes to be wrong, if only he can find a single authority of weight who declares it to be right." A man is not bound to take what he conceives to be the most perfect course; but, in order to act, he must be convinced in conscience that his action is morally justifiable. What is called Moral Theology is essentially ex post facto; a science of reflection, not a guide to conduct. And Probabilism is primarily for the use of the confessor, not of the penitent. Given the existing use of the sacrament of penance, some such theory is essential in the interest of the community. Failing it, the confessor would be able to impose his personal opinions in faith and morals under a pain of refusal of absolution. St. Alphonsus Liguori made this tyranny impossible; and it is, perhaps, as the founder of Probabilism in this sense that he is a Doctor of the Church.

F.

* "Studies of Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius, 1414-1625." By John Neville Figgis, M.A. Cambridge University Press.

LEMAÎTRE ON RACINE.*

THE reader of M. Lemaître's brilliant series of lectures on Racine can hardly fail to be struck by the difference between the popular attitude towards literary reputations in this country and in France. A course of lectures on a seventeenth century classic, however eminent the lecturer, would in this country win but a sparse audience. M. Lemaître found that, owing to the demand for tickets of admission, he

* "Jean Racine." Par Jules Lemaître. Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3 fr. 50.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' NEW BOOKS.

LETTERS OF CORTES.

The Five Letters of Relation from Fernando Cortes to the Emperor Charles V.

Translated and Edited, with a Biographical Introduction and Notes compiled from original sources, by FRANCIS AUGUSTUS MACNUTT. Illustrated with Portraits in Photogravure and Maps, two volumes 8vo, cloth extra (limited to 750 sets printed from type), £2 2s. net.

This sumptuous edition of the letters of Cortes presents for the first time in a consecutive English translation the five letters of relation from Fernando Cortes to the Emperor Charles V. Historians and scholars have long recognised these letters as the earliest and most authoritative source of information on Mexican conquest. The present version has been translated throughout by Mr. MacNutt, who has rendered the cumbersome sixteenth-century Spanish of Cortes in readable English.

THE LIFE OF GOETHE.

By ALBERT BIELSCHOWSKY. Authorised Translation from the German by WILLIAM A. COOPER, Assistant Professor of German in the Leland Stanford Junior University. In three volumes, fully Illustrated, 8vo, cloth 15s. net each.

Vol. I.—From Birth to the Return from Italy, 1749-1788.

Vol. II.—From the Italian Journey to the Wars of Liberation, 1788-1815.

Vol. III.—From the Congress of Vienna to the Poet's Death, 1815-1832.

Dr. Bielschowsky was acknowledged as the foremost authority on Goethe of recent times. His biography embraces the results of all previous study of Goethe, and in addition includes a great many distinct contributions to our knowledge of his times and works, especially of how the writings are the faithful expression of the man in the various phases of his development. The literary form is one of the highest artistic finish, the book being intended not merely for specialists, but more particularly for the general cultured public.

THE WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

TURK'S HEAD EDITION.

Beautifully Illustrated with 80 Full-Page Photogravure Plates Reproduced from Original Drawings, especially made for this Set by Mr. FREDERICK SIMPSON COBURN.

In 10 large 8vo volumes, printed on Old Stratford Linen Paper, bound in buckram, with gilt tops (edition limited to 750 copies), £10 10s. net.

PRISONERS OF CHANCE.

By RANDALL PARRISH, author of "When Wilderness was King," "My Lady of the North," "Beth Norvell," &c. With Illustrations in colour. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6s.

Mr. Parrish's latest novel is a romance of the province of Louisiana during the stirring last years of the eighteenth century.

His hero is a young Englishman who meets strange adventures among Frenchmen and Spaniards, and with survivors of the ancient race of mound-builders.

Our New Illustrated List is now Ready.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, 84, Bedford Street, Strand, London; and NEW YORK.

T. & T. CLARK'S NEW LIST.

By the late JAMES ADAM, Litt.D., Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

THE RELIGIOUS TEACHERS OF GREECE.

GIFFORD LECTURES ON NATURAL RELIGION.

Edited with a Memoir, by his wife, ADELA MARION ADAM.

PREHISTORIC ARCHÆOLOGY AND THE OLD TESTAMENT. By Rev. H. J. DUKINFIELD ASTLEY, Litt.D. East Rudham. Post 8vo, 5s. net.

THE PASTORAL TEACHING OF ST. PAUL: His Ministerial Ideals. By W. E. CHADWICK, D.D., Author of "The Social Teaching of St. Paul," &c. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d net.

"The most valuable contribution to the subject of the duties of a clergyman in his pastoral capacity which has appeared for several generations."—Cambridge Review.

THE EARLY TRADITIONS OF GENESIS. By Prof. A. R. GORDON, D.Litt., Montreal. Post 8vo. 6s. net.

"We can confidently recommend this book both to students and the general reader. It embodies a reverent and at the same time thoroughly scientific reconstruction of the traditions and historical facts recorded in the earlier portions of the book of Genesis."—Athenæum.

THE RELIGION OF THE POST-EXILIC PROPHETS. By Prof. W. H. BENNETT, D.Litt., London. Post 8vo, 6s. net.

"Lucid and comprehensive, vigorously written, and entirely reverent in spirit."—Methodist Times.

NO STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE: NO NATURAL SELECTION; A Critical Examination of the Fundamental Principles of the Darwinian Theory. By GEORGE PAULIN. Post 8vo, 5s. net.

CARDINAL NEWMAN, and his Influence on Religious Life and Thought. By CHARLES SAROLEA, D.Ph. D.Litt. University of Edinburgh. Crown 8vo, 3s.

New Vol. International Critical Commentary.

ECCLESIASTES. By Prof. GEORGE A. BARTON, Ph.D., Bryn Mawr College, U.S.A. Nearly ready, post 8vo, 8s. 6d.

Complete in Two Volumes.

HASTINGS, DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS. Price per vol. in cloth, 21s. net, and in half-morocco, gilt top, 26s. net.

"The preacher's purpose is better served than it has ever been before."—Times.

T. & T. CLARK, Edinburgh; & at 14, Paternoster Sq., London.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., Ltd.

FROM

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST.

ESSAYS ON MEREJKOWSKI.

Translated from the Russian by G. A. MOUNSEY.

F'cap. 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUME: THE LIFE-WORK OF CALDERON.

Previous Issues in the Series:

The Life-Work of Hendrik Ibsen.
The Life-Work of Pliny the Younger.
The Life-Work of Montaigne.

NIGHTS AT THE OPERA.

A series of Handbooks for the Music Lover, the object of which is to reproduce in an attractive form an Analysis of the Music, together with a running Commentary on the Dramatic Element in the Opera to which it is devoted. 1s. net. each.

By WAKELING DRY.

1. LOHENGRIN.
2. TANNHAEUSER.
3. TRISTAN AND ISOLDE.
4. MEISTERSINGER.
5. RHEINGOLD and WALKURE } RING DES NIBELUNGEN
6. SIEGFRIED and GOETTER-DAEMMERUNG. } RING DES NIBELUNGEN
12. THE FLYING DUTCHMAN.

By FRANCIS BURGESS, F.S.A.Scot.

7. BIZET'S CARMEN.
8. GOUNOD'S FAUST.
9. MOZART'S DON GIOVANNI.
10. VERDI'S IL TROVATORE.
11. VERDI'S RIGOLETTO.

NATIONAL WIT AND HUMOUR SERIES.

32mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. each net. NEW VOLUME.

WIT AND HUMOUR OF THE PHYSICIAN.

A Classified Collection from Various Sources.

Previous Issues in the Series.

1 and 2. American Wit and Humour.
3. French Wit and Humour.
4. German Wit and Humour.

HYPNOTISM: ITS HISTORY, PRACTICE, AND THEORY. By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M. Demy 8vo, cloth. New Edition, 18s. net.

A MANUAL OF COSTUME, AS ILLUSTRATED BY MONUMENTAL BRASSES. By HERBERT DRUITT. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, Ltd.,
32, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

had to deliver each lecture twice, and the daily newspapers gave liberally of their space to reports of them. And in order to apprehend the full force of the contrast, it must be borne in mind that M. Lemaître had no wonderful discoveries to make known, no startling theories to propound, and that the success of his lectures was as far as possible from a succès de scandale. Here are no piquant discussions of the art of love, no subtle doses of flattery—platonic or otherwise—addressed to fashionable dawdlers who regard the lecturer as the newest type of society entertainer. We have instead a scholarly account of Racine's life, of the society in which he lived, and an appreciation of his great tragedies. How is it then that a course of lectures like these have had a success that would be impossible among ourselves? One reason, as Matthew Arnold so often repeated, is that the French have, what we have not, a conscience in matters of the intellect. There is probably no country in Europe where more trashy novels are circulated and read than in the France of to-day. But there is also no country where true literature is more certain of being appraised at its proper worth and enjoyed with greater intelligence. Swift's witty and truthful remark that many men treat books as they treat lords, they learn their titles and then boast of their acquaintance, is far less true of Frenchmen than of Englishmen. A Frenchman's reverence for his classics is profound, but it does not preclude intimacy. The consequence is that M. Lemaître was able to address an audience capable of understanding his delicate irony, quick to take an allusion, and impatient both of rhetorical exaggeration and of commonplace.

It would, however, be absurd to explain M. Lemaître's success without taking account of M. Lemaître himself. Since 1884, when he began that remarkable series of essays that now form the six volumes of "Les Contemporains," he has shown that he possesses most of the qualities that go to make a critic. He has erudition, but he is as little of a pedant as his friend, M. Anatole France. He has the grace and lightness of touch, the love of order and clearness, the dislike of what is violent or over-emphatic, which seem to be innate in the best French men of letters in all ages. Besides these he is gifted with a sense of humour and—as such writers as M. Georges Ohnet know to their cost—a touch of malice which enables him to point an epigram with deadly precision. He has, moreover, what is indispensable for adequate treatment of his present subject, a whole-hearted enthusiasm for Racine.

For many English readers Racine and the whole French classical drama call to mind, in the main, artificiality and boredom. The long tirades, the absence of external action, the coldness and formality of its pseudo-classic setting, and the atmosphere of the Court of Louis XIV., which, one hardly knows how, manages to make itself felt in every act and scene, all this renders French classical tragedy tedious and unreal to those who expect drama to show them action, and character modified and developed by the clash of action. It need scarcely be said, however, that there are in French classical tragedy most of the qualities of the highest poetry, and that these qualities are seen to best advantage in its greatest exponent, Racine. Racine may not be a world-poet, but he is both by his qualities and his essential defects the poet of the French nation. He is French by the unity of impression, the sharply defined impact which every one of his tragedies leaves upon the mind. Every scene, every episode, every sentence is calculated with the most exquisite art to hold the attention bent on the mental conflict or the emotional crisis which the author is attempting to portray. There are none of those scenes so seemingly apart from the main issue yet so important in their bearing upon character which Shakespeare lavished with so prodigal a hand. Instead all is ordered, precise, circumscribed; we are in the presence of the same conflict, the same fundamental situation from the first scene to the last. Another point is that in Racine, as in the Greek drama, there is little preparation, and the tragic tension is maintained from the beginning to the end. "French tragedy," says Goethe, "is a crisis." This is pre-eminently true of Racine. Nero is introduced upon the stage twenty-four hours before his first crime, Bérénice twenty-four hours before her departure for Rome, and it is the same in the other plays. This observance of the unity of time helps the poet in creating the definite effect he seeks in a way which the romantic drama, with its slow accumulation of incidents, does not allow. On the other hand, it is open to the objection that the passions, observed for the first time when the catastrophe is close at hand must seem violent and exaggerated, and that this violence will, owing to the needs of the drama, be heightened as the play proceeds. Sainte-Beuve notes but does not emphasise this defect in a sentence which is an accurate estimate of Racine's art. "Great art in constructing a plot; exact calculation in its arrangement; . . . presence of mind in the smallest details; remarkable skill in winding only one thread at a time; skill also in pruning and cutting down rather than power of conciseness; ingenious knowledge of how to introduce and how to dismiss his personages; . . . all inconvenient accessory parts and antecedents suppressed; nothing, however, too bare or too monotonous, but only two or three harmonising tints on a simple background; then, in the midst of all this, passion that we have not seen born, the flood of which comes swelling on, softly foaming, and bearing you away, as it were, upon the whitened current of a beautiful river: that is Racine's drama."

For M. Lemaître, as for Sainte-Beuve before him, Racine is above all the dramatist of Port-Royal. The famous Abbey formed him in his early years, and left an impress which may be traced in all his work. "The drama of Racine," says M. Lemaître finely, "is the profane and unforeseen flower of the great work of religious meditation and internal perfection that had been accomplished at Port-Royal-des-Champs." Port-Royal taught Racine his knowledge of the human breast. It introduced him, too, to the measure and harmony of Greek culture. "Thus he united the two grandest traditions of humanity—Hellenism and Christianity."

A TALE OF THE SOUTH.*

On many people the increasing complexity of our civilisation produces, by reaction, a craving for pictures of simple, primitive, old-world life. While a town life of routine and comfort seem with some to impair their powers of response to real freshness of feeling, others welcome eagerly any book that can momentarily free them from the pressure of an over-artificial environment. The latter, indeed, show the healthy instinct of children who, free of streets and pavements, hasten to roll on the grass. In "Ashes" the Sardinian novelist, Madame Grazia Deledda, paints for us the primitive atmosphere of her country, one little affected by modern influences, and so specially interesting to us when viewed through the eyes of a native who has passed out of it into the atmosphere of a great capital. In "Nostalgia" Madame Deledda executed a brilliant piece of work, and "Ashes," if less perfect, should uphold her reputation.

Little Anania is the illegitimate child of the young peasant girl, Oli, "well grown and beautiful, with very large, very bright, feline eyes of greenish grey," and of her worthless lover, Anania, a field labourer, who has come to the Cantoniera for the spring sowing. Her father, Uncle Micheli, receives him kindly, but later on, after a visit to the town, Nuoro, he comes back saying, "Oli, mind yourself. Bad luck to that farm labourer. He has deceived us even as to his name. He comes from Argosolo. The people of Argosolo are a race of goshawks, of thieves, and jail-birds. Mind yourself, young woman! He's a married man." But when Oli has "gone wrong," Uncle Micheli is implacable, and casts her out. He has warned her; he has trusted her. But this, no! Oli takes refuge in the miserable house of Aunt Grathia, a bandit's widow, in the mountain hamlet of Fonni, where all is "misery, rags, dirt." Little Anania grows up with the goat-herd boy, Zuanne, and sees little of his poor mother, who is always out working in the fields. She dug potatoes and came home late, worn out, livid with cold, famished. And the child cannot remember having seen his father, who never comes to Fonni; and sometimes he hears his mother sobbing at night, but he is afraid to ask her why. One night Oli awakes the child and dresses him, and hangs an amulet round his neck, and starts with him at dawn on the long journey to Nuoro. There is a quiet truth to nature in the description of this eventful

* "Ashes." By Grazia Deledda. Translated by Helen Hester Colvill. John Lane. 6s.

Are you reading the remarkable Articles by The Right Hon.

WINSTON S. CHURCHILL

describing his Visit to Uganda in the

STRAND MAGAZINE ?

The first Article appeared in the MARCH issue.

Order from your Bookseller or newsagent. Price SIXPENCE.

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS.

These charming and portable volumes are small enough for the pocket (8¾ in. by 4 in. by ¾ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type, on thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present.

Cloth, 3s. net; limp lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume. Postage 3d. extra.

VICTORIAN ANTHOLOGY. Edited by Prof. W. Knight.
SCOTT'S POEMS. Edited by Prof. W. Knight.
THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND CONFESSIONS OF DE QUINCEY
BYRON'S WORKS. 3 vols.
ADDISON'S ESSAYS.
SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.
EVELYN'S DIARY.
PEACOCK'S NOVELS.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.
HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.
THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.
LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.
THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.
SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.
MILTON'S POEMS.
BURNS'S POEMS.
BACON'S WORKS.
PEPYS'S DIARY.
KEATS'S POEMS.
CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.
MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.
ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.
AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.
THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.
HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by George Chapman.
HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by George Chapman.
SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.
BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
HERRICK'S POEMS.
MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
THE NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.
MARLOWE'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

NEWNES' ART LIBRARY.

A series of volumes illustrative of the work of the Great Artists. Each volume contains about 64 full-page Illustrations in Monochrome, and a Frontispiece in Photogravure. The text is mainly biographical and descriptive, and includes a list of the principal works of the artist under consideration.

The volumes are bound in quarter vellum, with artistic paper sides, and published at 3s. 6d. net, post free, 3s. 10d.

VELASQUEZ. By A. L. Baldry.
TITIAN (Early Works). By Malcolm Bell.
TINTORETTO. By Mrs. Arthur Bell.
PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By Arsene Alexandre.
G. F. WATTS. By Romualdo Pantini.
FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. Konody.
TITIAN (Later Works). By Henry Miles.
GIOVANNI BELLINI. By Everard Meynell.
PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By Ernest Phythian.
FRA ANGELICO. By Edgcumbe Staley.
DELACROIX. By Henri Frantz.
MICHAEL ANGELO. By Dr. Georg Gronau.
CORREGIO. By Selwyn Brinton.
INGRES. By Octave Uzanne.
SIR EDWARD BURNE-JONES (Second Series). By Arsene Alexandre.
G. F. WATTS' LANDSCAPES. By Walter Bayes.
SIR HENRY RAEBURN. By R. S. Clouston.
SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE. By R. S. Clouston.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD. (Dept. 129),
SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL have just published a striking
New Novel by the Author of "Jessie Vandeleur," entitled

THE FOURTH SHIP.

By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE, of which "THE DAILY TELEGRAPH" (First Review) says: "A SHEER DELIGHT. . . . FULL OF DELICATE WORKMANSHIP AND REAL LIFE. . . . ALIVE WITH HUMAN SYMPATHY, RICH IN TYPES OF FEMININE CHARACTER, AND WRITTEN THROUGHOUT WITH DISTINGUISHED RESTRAINT."

Also the New Novel by the Author of that extraordinary romance, "The Boats of the Glen Carrig," called

THE HOUSE ON THE BORDERLAND.

By WILLIAM HOPE HODGSON, which may, perhaps, be best described in the following brief outline from last Fridays "Times":

"Purporting to be a manuscript discovered in a strange old ruin in the West of Ireland wherein the recluse who d elt there records his amazing experiences; first of horrible, swinish creatures who surround and attack him; and then of a weird cosmic phantasmagoria when cons rush past him, and sun, stars, time, and space whirl about in a kind of awesome nightmare: stopping at the moment when he hears the Horror come creaking through the trap of the cellar below: 'strange padding steps' on the stairs—Something fu bling at the door handle—O God help me! The door is opening—slowly, someth—". Altogether, a pretty and original exercise in thrills.

Also, if you have not read the following Novels from CHAPMAN and HALL'S LIST, you will find them at any Library or Booksellers'.

THE HUMAN BOY AGAIN. . . . By Eden Phillpotts.
SALLY BISHOP: A Romance. By E. Temple Thurston. (2nd edition.)
THE WATCHERS OF THE PLAINS. By Ridgwell Cullum. (2nd edition.)
THE DEATH MAN . . . . . By Benjamin Swift.
IMPERIAL BROWN OF BRIXTON. By Reginald Turner. (2nd edition.)

CHAPMAN AND HALL, LTD., 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.

NOW READY.

AUTHORITY AND THE LIGHT WITHIN.

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

Crown 8vo. Cloth Boards, 2s. net.

"There must be many who will be grateful to Mr. Grubb for showing so clearly and well where firm and sure religious footing is to be found, which no waves of criticism can assail or shake."
CHRISTIAN WORLD.

"I have turned again and again to some parts of thy book, and am much interested in it. It is a most suggestive work."
WILLIAM TALLACK.

"The name of the author guarantees a treatment at once thorough, sympathetic, and reasonable; indeed we should apply to it, if confined to a couple of words, 'sweet reasonableness.' . . . The book is full of suggestive thought, and should be widely read by all who wish to understand the essential meaning of what is called the 'The Quaker Message'."
THE FRIEND.

LONDON: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14 Fleet Street, and of all Booksellers.

Books as wedding presents—this is the subject of an interesting article in the May "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net. Another article is on "What Glasgow reads," and the number contains all the news of bookland, with many illustrations.

Order from your bookseller, or write for a specimen copy to the publishers, Simpkin Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

day on which the poor mother has decided to cast her child on the mercy of the weak and blustering father and his cheerful and motherly wife, Aunt Tatàna. Oli leads the child to a house in Nuoro, and tells him to go in at the door and say, "I am the son of Oli Derios," and then she disappears, and nothing more is heard of her. After the first commotion of the household, Aunt Tatàna adopts little Anania, despite the oaths and protestations of the olive-miller. But at night the boy hears somebody tip-toeing to the bed, and feels a bristly moustache on his cheek. It is his father. How true this is to the lack of moral courage of most men.

The most charming section of the novel describes Anania's life at Aunt Tatàna's, where in the courtyard, or at night round the furnace in the olive-mill, a mixed company of poor neighbours come to warm themselves and gossip. Madame Deledda delineates with great exactitude the tone of these peasants, beggars, and workpeople, and their careless philosophy of life. All over Europe, from Spain to Russia, in all "backward" districts, that is to say, where railways, factories, machinery have not changed the economic conditions, the old-world life of the peasantry offers much the same family features. So much is this the case that if the landscape and the local colour were altered, the talk of the poor folk in "Ashes" would be true to village talk in almost every European country. The following sorrowful passage might have come out of the pages of Gorki:—

> "Little Anania spent his days amid these folk: from them he learned rude words and actions, and they accustomed him to the sight of drunkenness and careless misery. In another smoke-blackened and cobwebby cellar beside Maestro Pane's workshop, a poor sick girl was withering. Years ago her father had gone away to work in an African mine, and he had never been heard of again. The girl, Rebecca, lived alone, diseased and abandoned, in her squalid den, swarming with flies and other insects. A little further lived a widow, whose five children were supported by begging. Maestro Pane sometimes begged himself. But one and all they were merry. The five beggar children never stopped laughing. Maestro Pane talked to himself and related long peasant tales of the jolly days when he was young. Only in the long luminous afternoons, when the streets were silent and the wasps buzzed over the elder flowers, inducing sleep to the little Anania, stretched at the threshold, then in the hot stillness could be heard the sharp cry of Rebecca. It rose, it grew, it broke off; it recommenced, it hurled itself on high, it dashed itself to earth. It seemed, so to speak, to pierce the silence with a shower of sibilant arrows. In this cry was all the grief, all the evil, the poverty, the forlornness, the unforeseen wretchedness of the place and its dwellers; it was the voice even of things, the lament of the stones which dropped one by one from the blackened walls of the prehistoric houses, of the crumbling roof, of the broken stairs, and worm-eaten balconies which menaced ruin; of the spurge which grew on the pathway, of the wild olive which shadowed the walls, of the children who had no food, of the women who had no clothes, of the men who drank to stupefy themselves, and beat their wives and their children and their beasts because they could not strike at their destiny; it was the voice of all sickness uncured, of all the misery ineluctably accepted like life itself. But who heeded?
>
> "Little Anania, stretched across the threshold, flapping away the flies and wasps with a branch of elder, thought sleepily—'Whew! Why is that girl screaming? What makes her scream? Why are there any sick people in the world?' . . .
>
> "As the sun sometimes shines out from an unexpected quarter of a cloudy sky, so the florid figure of Signor Carboni sometimes appeared in this district of dismal poverty. Then the women came to their doors smiling and saluting; the men who did no work, and passed their time stretched out indolently in the sunshine, sprang to their feet and blushed; the children ran after him and kissed his hand, which he carried carelessly behind his back. In hard winter he gave polenta and oil to the whole neighbourhood. People came to him for small loans which they never repaid. Everywhere in the dirty wind-swept lanes he met boys and girls who called him Godfather, and men and women whom he addressed as Gossip. He could not keep count of his godchildren, and Uncle Pera declared that many called him Gossip merely to get his money."

Anania, however, is raised above this careless peasant life. The benevolent Signor Carboni stands sponsor for him, and pays for his education at school and college, and Anania soon falls deliriously in love with the beautiful Margherita, the padrone's daughter. The intoxication of love in adolescence, the languorous dreams of youth, the enchanted horizon of life, the intermittent fits of moroseness, jealous despair, and wild melancholy, all the complex psychology of the feverish period, is admirably seized by Madame Deledda. But Anania's moral and mental crisis is much complicated by his morbid shame about his mother, and by his consuming desire to seek her out and reproach her with having deserted him. Painfully conscious of the stain on his birth, he longs for news of her death, and yet this solution seems to him great cowardice. The beautiful Margherita returns his love, but Anania excites himself continually with the idea that when the girl learns that his mother is still living, a wretched outcast, or fallen into a life of shame, that he will lose her love. When Anania goes to Rome to study law at the university, this obsession about his mother's ruining his life grows so strong on him that he sets the police to work to discover where she is (and the villagers of Nuoro declare that she has been seen in Rome by one of their number); and the police inform him that a woman, Maria Obinu, answers to the description, and is living in Via del Seminario. Anania seeks her out, and her manner is so strange and ambiguous that he cannot make up his mind as to whether she is, or is not, his mother. He takes lodgings in her house, and lays little traps to force her admission, but he can never be certain whether she is playing a part, whether she is concealing an immense tenderness for him and is afraid of declaring herself openly. This puzzling situation is sketched with considerable cleverness, for the reader himself feels baffled. She might be his mother, so perplexing are human actions. And Anania has to return to Nuoro before he has solved the mystery.

In the last portion of the novel the morbid conflict in Anania's heart suddenly reaches its climax through his discovery that he has deceived himself about Maria Obinu, and that poor Oli is living, a "pale, emaciated apparition," wan with fever and squalid with neglect, in the desolate Cantoniera. She has led a wandering beggar's life for years with companions of the road, has been ill-treated, beaten, in prison, abandoned, has dragged herself from place to place, stupefied and starving, and always she is afraid of her son discovering her, afraid of being put in prison. Anania is in a mad tumult of feeling; he pities and yet wishes to spurn his mother. He will do his duty by poor Oli, he will renounce Margherita. "My life is destroyed, my career ended. How could a pure, delicate girl live beside an infamous woman?" He has fits of exaltation and abasement turn by turn, and when he at last faces the lost and trembling woman, he becomes hard and brutal, "and remorse for his brutality increased his fury. All the instincts of primitive man, jealous, ferocious, barbarous, vibrated in his quivering nerves. He knew it, but was unable to control himself." It is difficult to criticise the psychology of Anania's anger, and of the tragic scene that follows. The analysis is profoundly true to human selfishness, but temperamentally the English reader will feel both remote from and curious about these Southern passions that master the reason. And because we are, most of us, more sophisticated, more reasonable, colder, and less variable, it is very good for us all to have to follow these nervous, distraught, and "romantic" moods of Anania's feverish nature. The English are very poor psychologists, and every generation sees us a little stiffer, more wooden, more set in our own ideals of human conduct. That is why modern Continental literature is so valuable to us.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

We are very glad that Mr. Burrows and Mr. Hobson have collected and published such examples of Mr. William Clarke's journalism as were ready to their hands ("William Clarke: A Collection of His Writings." By Herbert Burrows and John A. Hobson. Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.). The articles give a very fair notion of the width of his interests and sympathies, the clearness and power of his style, and the quality of serious thought which he gave to every subject he touched. Mr. Clarke was at once a great and a popular journalist, by which we mean that he popularised great topics, dealing with them with singular mastery, but also with the power of enlightening those who knew less than he knew or felt less deeply. His production was constant and very large. He could write on nearly everything which modern journalism surveys, pouring out in a steady stream critical work for the magazines, political leaders, reviews on a very wide range of subjects, and "appreciations" of significant figures of his times. He had a remarkable gift

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:

Things Heard and Seen.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS. BOOKS. BOOKS.

Rare and curious Books for the collector. First Editions. Court Memoirs Medical, Occult, &c. Out of Print Books and everything that's a book supplied. No matter when published. State wants. 1,000,000 books on sale. Catalogues free.

HOLLAND BROS., 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED. First editions of all kinds. Sporting, Naval, Military Coloured Plates by Alkin, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and others. Special list of 3,000 wanted.

SATURDAY

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

WESTMINSTER

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—

Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

AN AUSTRALIAN VIEW OF "PUBLIC OPINION."

Here is an Australian estimate of PUBLIC OPINION, from the Sydney Stock and Station Journal, published in Sydney, N.S. Wales:—

"This week there came to hand the very sort of paper that a busy man wants, and that is PUBLIC OPINION. I remember having seen it years ago in England, but somehow amid the multitude of things I saw at home, it failed to grasp my imagination. But it's an all right paper. You would think it was the idea on which Stead modelled his Review of Reviews.

"It is simply what it professes to be, public opinion. It gives you the opinions of leading men and leading papers in regard to the current events of the day. No man out here has either the time or the inclination to read all that is going on in the great British world, and this paper boils it all down, and gives it as purely as possible. What I like about it is the fact that the editor does not appear to have an axe to grind or fad to illuminate. That is what we need. We all have fads of our own here, because I think we are more intelligent than the stay-at-home people. If we're not, we probably think we are, so it's all the same. 'Cogito ergo sum.'"

PUBLIC OPINION A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.

Every Friday Twopence

EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION, 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

SPECIMENS FREE ON APPLICATION.

of using quotation as an illuminant of his work, not as a substitute for it. None of it, indeed, was conventional. Mr. Clarke touched religion, politics, philosophy, literary criticism, less as a student, though student he was, than as a man who realised what significance lay between all these forms of thought and feeling and the central facts of present-day life. There are very few such journalists, and if any young man wants to know what a high level of thought and style, what richness of knowledge, and what special aptitude for illustrating it, can be combined with a most active and continuous life in Fleet Street, he cannot do better than read every essay in this collection. Not less remarkable than Mr. Clarke's gifts was his character. This was upright and single-minded to a degree. Of no man can it be said more exactly that he lived with truth and spoke to his kind only that which he conceived as being helpful to it. Like many sincere men, the study of life drew him the way of pessimism, and ill-health, and the brooding habit of the intellectual man too exclusively devoted to the interior life, cast a certain shadow over his temper. But his writing was always sane and truly moderate. His best work was done for the "Daily Chronicle" and the "Spectator," and was not less remarkable in mass than in quality.

* * *

The adventurous wedding tour of the Count and Countess de Lesdain is described by the Count in "From Pekin to Sikkim, Through the Ordos, the Gobi Desert and Tibet" (Murray, 12s. net). It was a sufficiently audacious enterprise, entered upon, say the authors, "to gratify our wish to cross country hitherto unknown and, if possible, to increase the geographical knowledge of our day." Starting from Pekin with an equipment of three Chinese springless carts, the two travellers made their way to the Ordos desert, which they found uninteresting. Its only claim to distinction is the tomb of Jenghis Khan, and this also proved a disappointment, but the Count and Countess have at least the honor of being the first Europeans to see this jealously guarded site. "Two small tents, one behind the other, and connected by a very low inner door, made of worn-out felt, and admitting through their rents the rain and the wind, are the 'monument' destined to perpetuate the renown of the greatest conqueror the world has known." The Gobi desert was monotonous, though not so difficult as had been expected. Greater hardships were experienced in Tibet. On one occasion the party encamped at a spot more than 19,000 feet high, and their escort could with difficulty be induced to proceed further. In Tibet the travellers saw some rich gold mines, but from the absence of pasturage and the great severity of the climate, they do not think that exploitation by Europeans would be possible. The book is pleasantly written, and should appeal to all who are interested in exploration, as a great part of the country passed through is quite unknown to Europeans. There are some interesting photographs and a map showing the route taken.

* * *

To their tasteful and marvellously cheap series, "The Muses' Library," Messrs. Routledge have added "The Complete Poetical Work of George Darley" (1s. net), together with a workmanlike introduction by Mr. Ramsay Colles. This is the first collected edition of Darley, a poet who enjoyed some reputation in the second quarter of the nineteenth century. Both Carlyle and Lamb praised his verses, and though they can hardly be said to have the compelling quality of really great poetry, they have merit enough to place Darley in a secure, if subordinate, position among the poets of the nineteenth century. Several of his lyrics—in particular "It is not Beauty I demand"—have the charm and feeling of the seventeenth century poets whom he followed. The present edition is capitally done, and will be valued by those who care enough for poetry to wander off the beaten path.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"Dean's Hall," by Maude Golding (Murray, 6s.). A good story of Quaker life at the end of the eighteenth century, not strong in plot, but excellent in characterisation. "The Fourth Ship," by Ethel Colburn Mayne (Chapman & Hall, 6s.), is a charming character sketch of an old maid, showing close observation and undoubted power of writing. "Bess of Hardendale," by Theodora Wilson Wilson (Hutchinson, 6s.), revives the well-worn plot of babies changed at birth, but is redeemed by a convincing picture of the Westmoreland dalesmen. "Faith Unfaithful," by Fred. E. Wynne (Brown, Langham & Co., 6s.), is a clever story of Irish life, humorous and pleasantly written. "Marozia," by A. G. Hales (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), contains a number of short stories of adventure and passion, written round a queen who seems to have been modelled on the late Queen Draga of Servia. "The Cottage on the Fells," by H. de Vere Stacpoole (Werner Laurie, 6s.), is a detective story, quite unlike Mr. Stacpoole's usual manner. The plot is excellent, and the style rapid and vigorous. "The House of the Lost Chord," by Dona Teresa de Savillo (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), and "Tinman," by Tom Gallon (Ward, Lock, 6s.), both contain carefully concealed mysteries, which even experienced readers of this type of fiction will be unlikely to disentangle.

The Week in the City.

The position of trade and finance just now is extremely interesting, and very difficult to diagnose. Those who were looking for an immediate rally in the States have been disappointed, though Wall Street has had the Pennsylvania success to give it courage. But manufactures and commerce, which rallied a little in February and March, are said to have sunk back in April to the lowest depth since the crisis. Traders in the Western States are especially despondent as to the prospects of any immediate change for the better. One cause of the stagnation is that the great protected trusts, which poison the political and commercial atmosphere of the United States, refuse to lower prices, and prefer, in their own elegant language, to "lay off" men. Fortunately, the reports of the condition of winter wheat are most promising, and as the crop will be on its way here in three months' time, there is good reason to hope for a further decline in the price of bread. That should cause a general fall in provisions, and, taken in conjunction with the reduction of the sugar tax, may well bring about an important rebound of trade. Our working classes will buy tools and clothes much more freely when this long desired relief comes to swell their real wages. It is to the home consumer that we shall have to look to make up for the falling off of foreign custom. From this point of view the wool market is especially interesting. In the old days it used to be a maxim that when corn was low wool was high, and vice versa. This has been remarkably exemplified in the last eight months. No sooner had the sharp rise come in corn prices than the slump occurred in wool. Many speculative buyers both in Yorkshire and on the Continent have been severely hit, and at the London wool sales, which are being held this week, quotations for coarse wools are lower than they have been for many years. As there is far more capital in England than in Germany, and we have an immense advantage just now over Berlin in discount and money rates, it seems likely that British merchants will lay in large stocks of wool at prices very favourable to cheap production. It is by this natural adjustment of prices that a decline of production is always arrested. Prices had risen too high for the consumer. He has closed his purse, and now the general decline in raw materials will enable manufacturers to tempt him back into the market.

The Reception of the Budget.

City men are, of course, predominantly Conservative, and nothing will induce them to pay any public compliment to a Radical administration. Nevertheless, there is an undertone of rejoicing at the Budget. After all the premonitory wails of "Mail" and "Times" and "Telegraph," there has been an unprecedented reduction of debt and an important remission of taxation. That the introduction of the decaded scheme of old age pensions should have been accompanied by the halving of the sugar duties is a dazzling feat, especially when it is announced that nearly 17 millions of Consols, Irish Land Stock, and Floating debt have been paid off in the course of the year. The stock markets have been quite buoyant with the exception of Americans, which have evidently still a troublous time to face. One rather humorous feature of the situation is that the reduction of the sugar duty is a considerable boon to brewers, as it cheapens an important raw material of beer.

Lucellum.

London & County Banking Company, Limited,

REGISTERED UNDER "THE COMPANIES ACTS."

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.

Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. SIR ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.	WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.	SIR THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.	WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.	OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
VISCOUNT GOSCHEN.	WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.	CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.

Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

Foreign Exchange Branch—80, Cornhill, E.C.

THE LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED,

Opens DRAWING ACCOUNTS with Commercial Houses and Private Individuals, upon the plan usually adopted by Bankers.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Deposit Receipts are issued for sums of Money placed upon these Accounts, and Interest is allowed at such rates as advertised, reference being had to the state of the Money Market.

CIRCULAR NOTES AND LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued payable in all the principal Cities of the World. CURRENCY DRAFTS are issued on all Cities, and Colonial and Foreign Drafts collected.

The Ageney of Foreign and Country Banks is undertaken.

THE PURCHASE AND SALE of Government and other Stocks, also of English and Foreign Shares, are effected. DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., are received for Customers of the Bank.

Great facilities are afforded to the Customers of the Bank for the receipt of Money both from and in the Towns where the Company has Branches; also the following Banks will receive and transmit, free of charge, credits for Customers of this Bank:—Barclay & Co., Ltd.; Capital and Counties Bank, Ltd.; Lloyds Bank, Ltd.; London City and Midland Bank, Ltd.; and National Provincial Bank of England, Ltd.

The Officers of the Bank are bound not to disclose the transactions of any of its Customers. By Order of the Directors,

E. F. ROBINSON, Secretary.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

SHIPPING.

JAPAN, CHINA, HONOLULU, MANILA and AROUND THE WORLD

(Via NEW YORK and SAN FRANCISCO),

By the Steamers of the { PACIFIC MAIL S.S. CO. / OCCIDENTAL and ORIENTAL S.S. CO. / TOYO KISEN KAISHA.

THROUGH TICKETS from EUROPE issued at SPECIAL RATES. WEEKLY SAILINGS from San Francisco, 14,000 and 12,000 tons, twin-screw steamers, LARGEST and FASTEST on the Pacific.

For rates, berths, tickets, &c., apply to the
GENERAL EUROPEAN AGENCY,
London Offices—West End, 22, Cockspur-street, S.W.;
City, 49, Leadenhall-street, E.C.;
And at 25, Water-street, Liverpool.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRIVATE ACCOUNT BOOK. For Country or City Gentlemen. Guaranteed to fulfil every requirement. Post free 10/6, or Particulars free, McQueen & Co., 1a, Moat Rd., Leicester.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the post of ASSISTANT LECTURER, specially qualified in English and general subjects, at the Clapham Day Training College for Women, Cedars Road, Clapham.

The salary will commence at £130 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £170 a year.

The person appointed will be required to give lectures in her subjects; to help in supervising the students' school practice; to assist in the organisation of college clubs and societies (bearing, as a rule, some relation to her own department of work); and to take an active interest in the general life of the College.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, May 25th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "Assistant Lecturer in Training College," and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W. C.,
May 12th, 1908.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

RUGBY SCHOOL.

THE EXAMINATION FOR SCHOLARSHIPS
Will Begin MONDAY, JUNE 1st.

Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN JULY.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

DALTON HALL OF RESIDENCE

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.

Affiliated to the University. Contains Study Bedrooms for Fifty Students, with Dining Hall, Library, Class Room, Common Room, Billiard Room, Workshop, Fives and Tennis Courts, Football Field and Garden. Stands on three and a-half acres in a residential Park. Large staff of Tutors, and all social and athletic advantages of college life. Managed on undenominational lines by the Society of Friends.

JOHN W. GRAHAM, M.A., Principal.

MALVERN COLLEGE.

Scholarship Examination, June 2nd, 3rd & 4th.

One of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Scholars) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in examination. Council nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well, but fail to obtain a scholarship. For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Examination for Scholarships (£60-£20) begins on June 10th at Giggleswick, in London, or under conditions, at Preparatory Schools. Apply Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle, Yorks.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.

An Examination will be held on June 24th, 25th, and 26th to fill up not less than 5 residential and 3 non-residential Scholarships and also some Exhibitions. For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, S.W.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class: Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

MILL HILL SCHOOL,
LONDON, N.W.

The Next Examination for Entrance Scholarships (value 15 guineas to 60 guineas) will be held on Thursday, July 2nd, and two following days. For further particulars apply to the Bursar.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION, July 1st and 2nd.
APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Car Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.

52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGANDINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND.

Newly Edited from the MSS. by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH. Vol. II., containing Parts IV. and V., with an Appendix of Extracts from Leland's Collectanea. Small 4to. 12s. net.

 This edition will be completed in five volumes, of which Vol. I. (containing Parts I.-III.), price 18s. net, and Vol. III. (containing the "Itinerary in Wales"), price 10s. 6d. net, are already published.

"The present edition was worth waiting for, and we are grateful to Miss Smith for the care she has bestowed on a congenial task. The result of Miss Smith's editing is eminently satisfactory. The Itinerary, which is interspersed with extracts from charters and lives of the saints, abounds with lights on the vanishing feudal period, and there are few who will not find the indefatigable old antiquary an amusing and most instructive companion."—Westminster Gazette.

NEW VOLUMES BY THE RIGHT REV. F. A. GASQUET, D.D.,

ABBOT PRESIDENT OF THE ENGLISH BENEDICTINES.

Crown 8vo. 6s. net each. Just Published.

THE LAST ABBOT OF GLASTONBURY, and other Essays. Illustrated.

 The first essay here reprinted, "The Last Abbot of Glastonbury," was first published in 1895 as a separate volume, which has long been out of print. It gives an account of the destruction of the great Benedictine Abbeys of Glastonbury, Reading, and Colchester, and of the tragic deaths of the last abbots of those houses in the reign of Henry VIII. The other essays in the volume are collected from various magazines, and have not previously appeared in book form.

THE BLACK DEATH IN 1348 and 1349.

A History of the Great Pestilence. New and Revised Edition.

"By far the most interesting and exhaustive record to be found of this most appalling visitation."—Morning Post.

READY SHORTLY.

THE OLD ENGLISH BIBLE and Other Essays.

CONTENTS.—Notes on Mediæval Monastic Libraries—The Monastic Scriptorium—A Forgotten English Preacher—The Pre-Reformation English Bible—Religious Instruction in England during the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries—A Royal Christmas in the Fifteenth Century—The Canterbury Claustral School in the Fifteenth Century—The Note-books of William of Worcester, a Fifteenth Century Antiquary—Hampshire Recusants in the Time of Queen Elizabeth.

OTHER WORKS BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Henry III. and the Church. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

The Eve of the Reformation. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

Detailed List on application.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

THE GOSPEL OF PAIN. By THOMAS J. HARDY.

A small volume which will be found to give, with much eloquence and the weight of experience, the witness of suffering to a larger life. The object of the writer is to show that suffering is less a field for the exercise of philosophic speculation than the common and central ground of life itself, where alone may be found an indication of life's purpose, and consequently of its conduct.

"This thoughtful and stimulating little book."—Times.

"Mr. Hardy is both earnest and persuasive, and the doctrines he expounds have force as well as consolation."—Evening Standard.

Prospectus on application.

The York Library.

Fcap. 8vo. Cloth, 2s. net; limp leather, 3s. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

GOETHE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY. ("Dichtung und Wahrheit.") Revised Translations by M. STEELE-SMITH, Head Lecturer in Modern Languages at Newnham College, Cambridge. With an Introduction and Bibliography by KARL BREUL, Litt.D., Ph.D. 2 vols.

THE IDYLLS OF THEOCRITUS. With the Eclogues of Virgil, rendered into English Verse by CHARLES STUART CALVERLEY, with an Introduction by Professor R. Y. TYRRELL. [Ready end of May.

READY END OF MAY.

4to (nearly 600 pages). 500 Copies only for sale.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION, 1806—1867. A Catalogue of Exhibitors and their Works. By ALGERNON GRAVES, F.S.A. Price £3 3s. net.

This work is to be issued uniform with the same compiler's "Royal Academy of Arts" and "Royal Society of Artists," and will form a valuable Supplement to them. A special feature of the volume is that the sizes of the pictures exhibited are given, and (in the case of pictures exhibited after 1852) the prices asked for their works by the artists.

A Prospectus, with Specimen Page, on application.

DECORATIVE HERALDRY. A Practical Handbook of its Artistic Treatment. By G. W. EVE. With about 200 illustrations. New and Revised Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

"He treats his subjects with a width as well as a depth of knowledge that renders this volume amongst all modern writings the treatise on heraldry par excellence for artists."—Magazine of Art.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANCAIS ILLUSTRES. Publies sous la direction de DANIEL O'CONNOR. Small crown 8vo, with Eight Full-page Illustrations in Colour and about Thirty in Black-and-White. 5s. net each.

"Charmingly illustrated . . . a delightful series of French Classics in French."—Spectator.

"Well printed and charmingly illustrated."—Journal of Education.

"A most attractive edition. . . . We look forward to the promised issue of further volumes in a series which has begun so well."—Oxford Magazine.

NOW READY.

GEORGE SAND: LES MAITRES SONNEURS. Preface d'EMILE FAGUET, de l'Academie, Française. Illustrations by M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

GEORGE SAND: LA MARE AU DIABLE.

Notice Analytique de C. A. SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

BALZAC: LES CHOUANS. Illustrations de J. BLAKE GREENE.

A Prospectus, with Specimen Colour-plates, will be sent on application.

Bell's Cathedral Series.

UNIFORM VOLUMES.

Crown 8vo. Profusely Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net each.

THE TEMPLE CHURCH. A Description of the Fabric and its Contents, with a Short History of the Order. By GEORGE WORLEY. With 31 Illustrations and a Plan.

THE PRIORY CHURCH OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW THE GREAT, SMITHFIELD.

A History and Description of the existing Fabric, and some account of the Hospital and smaller Church of St. Bartholomew. By GEORGE WORLEY. With numerous Illustrations and a Plan. [In the press.

Bell's Miniature Biographies.

Pott 8vo, each with Eight Illustrations. Cloth, 1s. net.; limp leather, with Photogravure Frontispiece, 2s. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

PAINTERS—

BOTTICELLI. By R. H. HOBART CUST.

DA VINCI. By R. H. HOBART CUST.

MUSICIANS—

GRIEG. By E. MARKHAM LEE.

HAYDN. By J. F. RUNCIMAN. [In the press.

Webster's International Dictionary (Twentieth Century Edition)

Revised throughout and brought up to date. 2,348 Pages. 5,000 Illustrations.

WEBSTER is the best practical Working Dictionary of the English Language. It is recognised as the Standard Authority throughout the English-speaking world. It is an indispensable Reference Book.

Send for Illustrated Pamphlet, with Hundreds of Testimonials, Specimen Pages, Price, &c.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1908.

The Nation

SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1908.

1908 ISSUE JUST PUBLISHED.

The Statesman's Year-Book.

Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World for the Year 1908. Edited by J. SCOTT-KELTIE, LL.D. With Maps. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

African Nature Notes and Reminiscences. By F. C. SELOUS, F.Z.S.

With Illustrations by E. CALDWELL. 8vo. 10s. net.

The Eversley Tennyson.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols. Globe 8vo, 4s. net each.

Vol. VI.—BALLADS AND OTHER POEMS. [Tuesday.

2nd Impression.

The Story of the Guides.

By Col. G. J. YOUNGHUSBAND, C.B., Queen's Own Corps of Guides. With Illustrations, 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

The history includes such episodes as the march to Delhi in 1857, and the massacre at Kabul, which led to the Afghan War, and is carried down to the Chitral Expedition.

National and Social Problems.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

A volume of great and varied interest. These collected papers deal with European political problems of the highest moment and with questions of Labour, Unionism, and Socialism.

The Problems and Perils of Socialism. Letters to a Working Man.

By J. ST. LOE STRACHEY Sewed, 6d.

 Copies for purposes of distribution may be obtained from the Publishers in quantities of not less than 100 at the rate of 25s. a hundred, carriage to be paid by the purchaser.

Highways and Byways in Hampshire.

By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. With Illustrations by ARTHUR B. CONNOR. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Autobiography of Montagu Burrows

Captain R.N., Chichele Professor of Modern History, Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. Edited by His Son, STEPHEN M. BURROWS. With Portraits. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

The Diary of John Evelyn.

With an Introduction and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON, Hon. LL.D. Edin. 3s. 6d.; limp leather, 5s. net.

H.M.I. Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools.

By E. M. SNEYD-KYNNERSLEY, formerly H.M.I. North-West Division. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

A highly entertaining book, containing a large number of good stories told by a raconteur of exceptional ability.

Civil War and Rebellion in the Roman Empire, A.D. 69-70.

A Companion to the "Histories" of Tacitus. By BERNARD W. HENDERSON, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S NEW NOVEL.

Mr. Crew's Career.

By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Coniston," etc. Illustrated. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Poems of T. E. Brown.

Selected and Arranged with an Introduction and Notes by H.F.B. and H.G.D. 2s. 6d. net. [Golden Treasury Series.

The Philosophy of Loyalty.

By Professor JOSIAH ROYCE. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d. net.

8th THOUSAND. With Portrait and Map. 2 vols., 24s. net.

MODERN EGYPT

BY THE

EARL OF CROMER.

Lord Cromer's book has been extensively, and most favourably, reviewed by the Press of every shade of political opinion. The Spectator directs attention to its "extraordinary charm and interest" and to its insight and humour. The Edinburgh Review refers to its value "as a record of a contemporary episode in world history," and states further that "the book is worthy of the subject and of the man."

"Fit to be placed with the greatest works of the great historians."

The importance of the work as a contribution to contemporary history is emphasised by Mr. SYDNEY LOW in the Standard. "It may be supplemented," he says, "it cannot be superseded"; while the Daily Telegraph expresses the opinion that "it would be superfluous to praise a book which is obviously destined to take high place among the rare volumes of authentic contemporary history."

THE BOOK OF THE YEAR.

"Lord Cromer," says Punch, "writing as well as he works, has contributed to history one of the most important chapters added during the present generation." "It is," says The Westminster Gazette, "a fascinating book." The Evening Standard prophesies that the book will become a classic, and refers to it as "a work that every student of our Imperial life must read.

Mr. SPENSER WILKINSON, in the Morning Post, says that "Modern Egypt" tells from beginning to end "a story which is perhaps the most dramatic that has passed before the eyes of Englishmen now in middle life," and is, in the opinion of the Daily Chronicle, "a narrative that holds and a judgment that convinces. . . . A most fascinating and surprising narrative."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN.

GOSPELS OF ANARCHY and other Contemporary Studies.

By VERNON LEE. 10s. 6d. net. (May 25th.)

Deterioration of Soul, Tolstoy as a Prophet, Nietzsche and the "Will to Power," On Modern Utopias; an open letter to Mr. H. G. Wells, etc., etc.

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. 10s. 6d. net.

The Nation says:—"It is in our judgment by far the best general historical treatment of the origin and play of forces in the Labour Socialist Movement of this country that has yet appeared. . . . All Liberals who are not too scornful of Socialism to wish to understand it as set forth by this brilliant exponent will read Mr. Villier's book."

HISTORY OF IRELAND TO THE COMING OF HENRY II.

By ARTHUR UA CLERIGH. 10s. 6d. net.

THE STATUTES OF WALES.

Collected, arranged and edited by IVOR BOWEN, Barrister-at-law, of the South Wales Circuit. 21s. net.

CRIMINAL APPEAL AND EVIDENCE.

By N. W. SIBLEY, B.A., LL.M., Joint Author of "International Law as interpreted during the Russo-Japanese War." 15s. net.

THE SWISS DEMOCRACY A Study of a Sovereign People.

By H. D. LLOYD and JOHN A. HOBSON. 6s. net.

"I can only recommend legislators to read it, trade unionists to purchase it, preachers to lecture on it, and all ethical and similar societies to discuss it chapter by chapter."—The Review of Reviews.

THE UPRISING OF THE MANY.

By CHARLES E. RUSSELL. With 32 Illustrations. 5s. net. A description of the democratic and labour movements throughout the world.

NOTE.—Mr. Unwin's new announcement list will be sent post free to any address on application.

1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

Readers of The Nation will be interested in seeing a list of books written by members of the New Government.

LORD MORLEY.
"The Life of Richard Cobden."

Mr. R. B. HALDANE.
"Army Reform."

Mr. JOHN BURNS.
In "Labour and Protection."

Mr. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.
In "The Johnson Club Papers."

Mr. C. F. G. MASTERMAN.
"In Peril of Change."
"The Heart of the Empire."

Mr. W. RUNCIMAN.
In "British Industries under Free Trade."

Published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN has been appointed by His Majesty's Government Sole Wholesale Agent for the small scale Ordnance Survey and Geological Maps. A complete catalogue will be sent post free to any address on application.

IN PREPARATION.

MICHAEL DAVITT

Revolutionary Agitator and Labour Leader.

By F. SHEEHY-SHEFFINGTON.
7/6 net.

The stormy career of Michael Davitt has an absorbing fascination for all who are interested in the Irish question. This book is a sketch of his life-history by a writer fully in sympathy with his ideals. The volume will contain an Introduction by Justin McCarthy.

T. FISHER UNWIN, LONDON.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

(B.C. 29—A.D. 476.)

By H. STUART JONES, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. Story of the Nation Series. 5s.

"A really valuable and instructive book."—Daily Chronicle.

NOTE.—A complete list of the Volumes in the Story of the Nations' Series, the standard history of the world, will be sent post free to any address on application.

HISTORY OF CIVILISATION.

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 5s. net each.

Vol. I. HISTORY OF ANCIENT CIVILISATION.
Vol. II. HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL CIVILISATION.

A concise review of the development of European civilisation since the downfall of the Roman Empire.

THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA.

By FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE. New Impression. 8s. 6d. net.

NOTE.—A complete list of the works of Friedrich Nietzsche published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will be sent on application.

GERMAN EDUCATION, PAST AND PRESENT.

By FRIEDRICH PAULSEN, Ph.D. 5s. net.

This book is perhaps one of the most brilliant achievements of the well-known Berlin philosopher and educationist.

Cheaper Editions. Bound uniform with LORD MORLEY'S "Life of Richard Cobden." Illustrated. Cloth 2s. 6d. net each.

LIFE OF GOETHE.

By HEINRICH DÜNTZER.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

By HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER. With a new introductory chapter.

ANNIE BESANT. An Autobiography.

Cheap Edition with a new Preface. Illustrated. 5s. net.

"BETTER AND HAPPIER."

An Answer from the Ladies' Gallery to the Speeches in Opposition to the Women's Suffrage Bill, Feb. 28th, 1908. By LADY McLAREN. Paper cover. 6d. net.

T. FISHER UNWIN, LONDON

The Nation

Reviews.

THE STRATEGY OF PITT.*

THE question has been hotly discussed whether the revolution in naval construction which has come about since the days of the wooden walls has rendered obsolete the study of the naval strategy of the earlier times. Arguing on the surface of things, one would certainly decide in the affirmative. The changes have been so sweeping that the naval wars of the eighteenth century might seem to have no lessons for those who direct the leviathans of to-day. But this view rests on sheer confusion of thought. It fails to distinguish between tactics and strategy. The former, concerned as it is with the movements of units in a battle, has changed utterly. The latter, dealing with the wider operations of war, is not essentially changed; for its dictates depend on principles which are scarcely less abiding than those of mathematics and geometry. It is therefore well that Mr. Corbett should have undertaken to carry on in these volumes the story of our earlier naval wars (omitting the uninteresting Spanish War and the War of the Austrian Succession), and to set forth in detail the combined naval and military plans and efforts which rendered the Seven Years' War so fruitful in results.

As is well known, that war began with a series of disasters which damped the ardour of nearly all but Pitt. To his inspiring power we owe a priceless debt of gratitude, but Mr. Corbett here proves that his services were equally great in the council chamber. Here, indeed, is the chief value of this book: it is very far from being a naval chronicle of the type of James's work. It is concerned more with the policy which planned great expeditions than with the details of their execution. Little or no notice is taken of fights between single ships which are dwelt on so largely by James. This is pre-eminently a book which statesmen as well as seamen would do well to study. Perhaps Mr. Corbett has devoted rather too much attention to Whitehall and not quite enough to Portsmouth and Plymouth. The book would have been improved by a chapter on the British and French navies and dockyards. In the concluding chapter, entitled "Lessons of the War," there are some remarks on the excellent work done by Anson and others at the Admiralty in this period, one result of which was the adoption of the '74 ship as the standard sail-of-the-line, and the 32-gun frigate as the fast cruiser. But this does not meet the want indicated above. The ordinary reader needs to know something of the naval resources of the rival States, as well as the general relations of all the Great Powers which the author has clearly outlined.

The preliminary survey of European affairs shows why our policy at first was tentative and halting. Though the capture of Fort Duquesne (afterwards Pittsburg) by the French was a direct challenge to war, there were many reasons why Ministers should seek to localise it. Austria was grumbling about the Barrier Treaty to which we vainly sought to hold her; the Dutch were not bound to help us unless we were distinctly attacked; Spain more than once seemed about to join France; and Frederick the Great was casting longing eyes on Hanover. In fact, this book supplies new proofs of the clogging effects of the Electorate on British policy. The timidity of Newcastle accentuated the difficulties; but, as something had to be done, Boscawen was secretly commissioned to sail with a fleet to Cape Breton Island, cruise off that important stronghold, Louisburg, and capture any French expedition that might seek to enter. By dint of lying hard to the French ambassador at his own table, Granville and Robinson soothed his fears for a time; and the expedition promised to prevent any further French aggressions in North America and to bring the whole question to a decisive issue. Despite the lies, Boscawen failed utterly; and, as is here shown, from a lack of comprehension of the real points in question. If he struck any blow at all, it should have been decisive; but he chose to attack a French squadron in foggy weather, took three ships, and, for the sake of a pawn, compromised England's opening. On the Continent we were looked on as the aggressors, and the Dutch naturally refused to fulfil their treaty obligations. The disaster that befell Braddock's force near Fort Duquesne and the failure of Admiral Hawke to seize Du Guay's squadron off Finisterre made the outlook of the gloomiest.

Mr. Corbett then describes the events that altered the situation, namely, "the diplomatic revolution" and the rise of Pitt to power. The former of these ranged Austria on the side of France, and therefore almost forced Prussia into an alliance with England. The latter gave us a Minister worthy of working with the great Frederick. After the rather niggling treatment accorded to Pitt by Dr. von Ruville, it is refreshing to read this narrative written with wider views and sympathies. Perhaps the tendency here has been somewhat to over-estimate Pitt's genius for strategy. To take one instance: Mr. Corbett praises the plan for a raid on Rochefort as the most telling means of lessening the pressure of the French arms on Frederick and the Duke of Cumberland's army in Hanover in the summer of 1757. Now, it is true that action against any French port was far better than the inaction of which our ally had bitterly complained. But why was Rochefort chosen? No trustworthy plans of the place and of its difficult approaches were in our possession; the blow could not be struck with the same speed as at one of the northern French ports; the position of Rochefort was so remote from Hanover as to afford only very indirect relief to Prussia; and it seems to us on every ground that a stroke at Dunkirk or Havre would have been far more effective. George II. struggled to get an expedition sent to the coast of Hanover, where it would have threatened the right wing of the Duc de Richelieu's army.

But no arguments could bend Pitt's haughty will. The force set sail; the commanders of the land and sea forces hampered one another at the critical time; and the expedition was a miserable failure. Mr. Corbett well points out the final causes of the fiasco; but he does not convince us that the whole plan was not ill-conceived. To quote Elizabethan and other examples of raids and diversions in support of the surprising statement that: "Judged by the most fastidious science, Pitt's expedition to Rochefort was absolutely correct," is to beg the whole question, which is whether or no Rochefort was the best objective.

The failure was not without its lessons. Wolfe saw at Rochefort how the fleet and army had been used to thwart instead of support one another. "In war something must be allowed to chance and fortune, seeing that it is in its nature hazardous and an option of difficulties." Such was his pithy comment on the poltroonery of his superiors at Rochefort. The refusal of Pitt to acknowledge the Duke of Cumberland's Convention of Klosterzeven, and the victories of Frederick at Rossbach and Leuthen changed the whole face of the war as if by magic. Here, it seems to us, Mr. Corbett has not done justice to the great Prussian. Even in a work dealing primarily with the sea, it should clearly be shown how immense was the influence of Rossbach in reducing France to the defensive and enfeebling alike her resources and her nerve. Twenty diversions to Rochefort or to St. Malo (another "scratch at the French coast") would have effected less than that direct and crushing blow.

The combination of skill and daring that marked Pitt's plans for the conquest of Canada is here duly emphasised. The capture of Louisburg opened the way to Quebec. But a long delay occurred owing to the failure of the British expedition against Fort Ticonderoga at the foot of Lake Champlain. When the plan was renewed in 1759, Wolfe had charge of the great expedition that was to move from Louisburg on Quebec, while to Amherst there fell the advance by way of Ticonderoga. Mr. Corbett does not notice the criticisms that have often been made on this division of force. A demonstration on that side was, of course, essential, in order to lead the French to scatter their forces. But, to suppose that Amherst could move through very difficult country in time to stretch a hand to Wolfe before Quebec, was most risky. Strategists have generally condemned movements on lines so very widely apart; and it is clear that if, say, the half of Amherst's force had joined Wolfe in moving by sea straight on Quebec, the chances of failure would have been minimised. As it was, the boldness of Wolfe and of his naval coadjutor, Saunders (to whom justice has at last been done in this work), snatched a brilliant victory from the jaws of defeat; and those who read the thrilling story here re-told, will realise the importance of combined military and naval movements. This is the true significance of the capture of Quebec.

*"England in the Seven Years' War: a Study in Combined Strategy." By Julian S. Corbett, LL.M. 2 vols. Longmans. 21s. net.

We have no space in which to notice the other features of interest of this work—the reduction of Montreal, the capture of Belleisle and Havana, the triumphs in the East Indies, and the change produced by Pitt's resignation. Everywhere the touch is sure and the survey illuminating. We should like also to discuss Mr. Corbett's statement that defence is stronger than offence. Surely this is contrary to general experience. A commander who conceals his real line of attack, and distracts his enemies by feints, is almost sure to win if his foes cannot deal vigorous counter-strokes in time. The successes of Napoleon were nearly always won by his use of a vigorous and unexpected offensive. The defensive both on land and sea will, as a rule, only succeed when it has the advantages of position, numbers, and morale on its side.

J. Holland Rose.

THE RIDDLE OF THE BACCHAE.*

There are various medieval stories of a good monk contemplating the proceedings of some robber or notorious evil-liver, and detecting therein the seeds of some future saintliness which will eventually raise the sinner to the position of a pattern monk. It is with very similar feelings that I regard this book. It is in my eyes a sin, an open and flagrant sin; but it has the seeds of grace. If Mr. Norwood repents, there are qualities in his book which suggest that he will be a brilliant scholar; if he does not repent—well, it will be a disappointment to lovers of Greek literature. He possesses two of the great requisites for understanding ancient poetry—sound scholarship and intensity of observation. He fails, I think, in historical sense; in the understanding of how a playwright works; and perhaps also, though I hesitate to bring such a charge against a writer whose style shows uncommon vigour of thought and wide knowledge of literature, in sensitiveness to what I may call poetic values.

The main doctrine of the book is based, as the writer explains, on the theory laid down by Dr. Verrall in "Euripides the Rationalist." Euripides was a sceptic; therefore he cannot have seriously introduced gods or miracles into his plays. Therefore those parts of his plays—rather specially numerous—in which gods and miracles do occur, must either bear a secret meaning, intelligible to some supposed esoteric band of followers, of whom we have no mention in history, or they must not be parts of the play at all, but merely additions intended to save the writer from persecution by the orthodox. I will not criticise this theory in general, but will merely explain Mr. Norwood's application of it to "The Bacchae."

"The Bacchae" is a sort of miracle play, based on a sacred legend of the Bacchic cult. The new god, Dionysus, comes from the unknown East to his own land of Thebes to preach his doctrine and assert his godhead. His own people, led by Pentheus, presuming upon his gentle appearance, insult and imprison him. The persecuted god at last rouses himself, breaks down his prison walls, puts a fatal delusion upon Pentheus, and makes him commit the sin of spying upon the secret rites of the Bacchic women; which doing, he is discovered and torn to pieces. It is an old and horrible "sacred story," full of dramatic possibilities, but not calculated any more than other tales of primitive religion to bear strict scrutiny from the standpoint of morals. How Euripides transforms it, and what meanings of his own he reads into it, I have tried to discuss in the introduction to my first volume of translations of Euripides, and will not repeat here. Mr. Norwood starts from two hypotheses: first, that the play must be a work of rationalist propaganda (not merely a play with a spirit of rationalist criticism visible in it, which is a quite different thing); and secondly, though he does not formulate this so clearly, that the poet must definitely take one side or the other in the implied moral conflict, and cannot intentionally leave the reader bewildered.

He starts from the earthquake which shakes down "all the house" where Dionysus is imprisoned. The Chorus who are alone on the stage apparently see the earthquake, cry out in terror, fall on their faces, &c., and Dionysus comes out of prison immediately after, and tells how it occurred. But Mr. Norwood says that there was no earthquake, and that the Chorus only think there was one because they are hypnotised to do so by the professed Dionysus, who is in truth only an accomplished medium. His reasons for denying the earthquake are (1) that we do not know how earthquake effects were produced on the Greek stage. This, I think, is no argument at all, since it is admitted that they were produced. (2) After the earthquake scene there is no more mention of the earthquake, and persons who come on the stage later do not make any remarks on the effects of it. This in a modern play would be an important difficulty; but it amounts to little in Greek dramatic technique. The Greek habit was to let each scene stand very much by itself, producing its own effect uninterrupted by references to other parts of the play. An incident or a character which has done its work is simply allowed to drop. One could give many instances, but each one would need to be discussed in detail. I will merely state my opinion that Mr. Norwood's error lies, first, in applying the standards of realistic drama to a form of art which never contemplated them; and secondly, in a tendency to handle a poet's words as if they were the statements of a suspect witness, in which any contradiction or logical inconsistency is evidence to show that important facts are being kept back from us.

He concludes that the point of the earthquake scene is to show how mad the Chorus were in thinking there was an earthquake, when by the nature of the Greek stage there could not be one. Consequently the other miracles are all imaginary too. Those narrated by the First Messenger are meant to show how credulous that Messenger was; those mentioned by the Second Messenger are not really miraculous. The object of the whole play is to show how, among credulous persons, faith in a miraculous religion may have arisen. Dionysus is, as we have said, not a god at all, but a professional medium of bad character. True, he distinctly tells the audience in the prologue, and the other characters in the epilogue (where he appears ex machina in the usual divine manner), that he is a god; but those parts must be rejected. The chapter on the character of this human Dionysus is vigorously written, and suggests the subject of quite a good play, which I wish Mr. Norwood would try to write. I believe he would then find how totally different it is from the subject which Euripides has treated. Mr. Norwood's Pentheus would be a character in it, and a quite good and workable character; better, indeed, than Euripides' Pentheus. Euripides leaves the rebel king curiously uninteresting, considering what a chance he had. The reason doubtless was that with a real flesh and blood Pentheus, who appealed much to our sympathetic imaginations, the story of "The Bacchae" would be absolutely disgusting. If you are dealing with an ancient hell-and-judgment story in which a man is torn in pieces alive by his mother and aunts, it is more tactful not to have the man in question very human. Best leave him rather wooden and conventional. The pathos when you want it will be quite strong enough. I wish Mr. Norwood would consider, not what a case can be made out for Pentheus, but why Euripides has abstained from making out such a case.

Of course, it must be remembered that I have views of my own about "The Bacchae," and therefore am not likely to read Mr. Norwood's book with a quite unbiassed mind, or even to state his arguments quite as he would wish them stated. His criticisms of my work are in every way fair and even generous, though I still think that the "manger" in Luke ii., 7, &c., is historically connected with the

* "The Riddle of the Bacchae." By G. Norwood, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, Lecturer in the University of Manchester. Manchester University Press.

"manger" in which Dionysus was prisoned. The Greek word is the same, and the parallels between Dionysus-worship and certain elements in Christian legend are admitted by most authorities to be very numerous, and to turn up in the most curious and unessential details. I do not see why Mr. Norwood should wish me to translate the word by "stall" in one place and "manger" in the other. Perhaps I reject Mr. Norwood's view the more swiftly because some fifteen years ago, when studying the Rationalist theory in general, I tried almost exactly this same hypothesis upon "The Bacchae," and decided that it would not work. But Mr. Norwood's book has even in the eyes of a sceptic the considerable merit of stating the hypothesis in a very thorough-going and able manner, and at least giving it its full chance of being believed. I can imagine that many people may be convinced by reading Mr. Norwood, though I doubt if the conviction will often survive a re-reading of the play itself.

GILBERT MURRAY.

AN AGNOSTIC ESTABLISHMENT.*

No one reading this book could miss its interest and ability; it might, nevertheless, be possible to miss its importance. Dr. Stanton Coit, besides being a man of high distinction and idealism, is a man of many ideas, and it would be easy to regard this book as a collection of such ideas. But it is sometimes more valuable to have one idea than many; and this book is primarily the exposition of one idea, and that an important one. Many would even call it paradoxical and perverse. Properly, of course, it can only be stated in Dr. Coit's words, but for purposes of brevity it can be stated in mine. Dr. Coit, a modern agnostic, criticises existing Christianity along lines almost literally opposite to those of Herbert Spencer and the majority of the critics. The common charge against Christianity was that religion was indeed, or might be, a matter of passionate private importance, but that it had been coarsened by establishment and crushed by ceremonial. A man might worship Jehovah, but why need he do it in church? A man might have a faith beyond this world, but why should it have an establishment within this world? It is hardly an exaggeration to say that Dr. Coit reverses this. He says it is the Church that is right and the Jehovah that is wrong. He says that it is the establishment in this world that is right, and the faith beyond this world that is wrong. This agnostic is strongly against the Nonconformists, especially of the Puritan age, not because they did not conform to the orthodox theology, but strictly because they did not conform to the Established Church. For while a theology is super-human, and an agnostic cannot support it, an Established Church is human and an agnostic can support it. "Imagine," says Dr. Coit, "for a moment how different would be the state of social life and thought in England to-day if the religious philosophy of National Idealism had been known and acted upon three centuries ago by the reforming enthusiasts of England! The Nonconformists within the Church would never had acquiesced for a day in their final expulsion from the established organisation. They never would have rested content with the idea of private enterprise churches. They would have resented the idea of free churches. Instead of their infinite solicitude to save separate souls from eternal torment by gathering them into isolated conventicles, they would have continued to agitate as a great political force for the recognition of their teachings within the Establishment." With great clearness and eloquence, and a fascinating subtlety of illustration, Dr. Coit maintains throughout this proposition: that the national Church is the nation, that everyone ought to belong to the national Church first and discuss its doctrines afterwards.

On the whole, it may be conceded that Dr. Coit has proved that an agnostic can belong to a State church. Exactly what he has not proved is that one who is not an agnostic can belong to it. On his line certainly a secularist can be a churchman; the only doubt is whether a Christian can be a churchman. Nay, on these lines the real doubt is whether a churchman can be a churchman. The natural claim of one's country presumably is supreme for those to whom the supernatural does not matter. But Dr. Coit has not dealt with the case of those to whom it does matter. If you only believe in this world social solidarity is possibly the most important thing; if you believe in something more it is not, and there is the end of the discussion—and the beginning of the quarrel.

This is specially noticeable in the able chapters in which Dr. Coit pleads for his well-known policy of using the terms of supernatural religion in the sense of ethics. Dr. Coit most plausibly explains how theological terms might be useful to a man with no theology; but in the actual theological atmosphere of mankind they will surely be a little misleading. To Dr. Coit it is quite natural to say that he belongs to the Christian Church, because he believes in national unity and admires Christ. But to me it sounds exactly like saying that I belong to the Primrose League because I believe in political combination and admire primroses. Such a suggestion would leave unfairly out of account the fact that the Primrose League believes, rightly or wrongly, that it is fighting for something important. Christian theology, rightly or wrongly, thinks the same.

The question of whether we should use these terms in a wholly symbolic way is surely greatly affected, to say the least of it, by the fact that more than three-quarters of our civilisation uses them and believes in them in an actual way. Of course, we do use religious or mythological terms with reference only to an abstract spirit or agency. But generally this is only done with dead religions or mythologies. Thus offering our children to Moloch now only means offering them to cruelty and destruction; but if there were really a little temple of Moloch in Battersea with a corrugated iron roof, we might avoid the term as confusing. Or again, our lighter journalism still talks (I regret to say) about the darts of Cupid; but if there really were an important Nonconformist sect which believed in the positive personal existence of Cupid, we should find it necessary to make a distinction. The whole of Dr. Coit's proposals for loosening or expanding the sense of words is really founded on the assumption that Christ is as dead as Moloch or Cupid. That is where he makes a mistake.

Lastly, there is a sensation which makes me distrust all this talk of a purely secular and social religion, of the nation as the religious unit, and all sections joining in worship without reference to theology. There is in us a memory of the history of our race. Christianity was not an expedient tried in the barbarous twilight of history; it was an expedient tried after the sun of rationalism had both risen and set. It was an expedient tried after Dr. Coit's expedient had been tried—and found wanting. For the true name of this civic religion without dogma is simply Paganism. It is needless to discuss whether it can exist: it has existed. Men have worshipped the virtues as pure pillars of the State; they did it in ancient Rome. Men have worshipped a god who was simply public unity and equity—his name was Divus Cæsar. And we modern Europeans are not so much men moving towards that experience as men still fleeing from it; we are only the advance guard of that immense revolt and rout which fled from the failure of the Pagan Empire. Sometimes, when we visit an entirely new town, we have a strange feeling that we have been there before. I have that strange feeling when I visit Dr. Coit's new religious city. I fancy there is something in me that has been there before; I feel like a ghost. And as a man in an empty street may hear footsteps mocking him with a belated echo, so as I walk down this modern highway I seem to hear behind me the sound of my own sandals padding along the Appian Way.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

* "National Idealism and a State Church." A Constructive Essay in Religion. By Stanton Coit, Ph.D. Williams & Norgate. 7s. 6d. net.

THE DECAY OF GERMAN DRAMA.*

WITHIN the past few years we have noted a growing tendency in German criticism to proclaim the decay, if not the complete break-up, of the contemporary movement in the German drama, which began with such wonderful promise and such high hopes nearly twenty years ago. Among the sym-

* "Vom Rückgang der deutschen Bühne." Von Paul Goldmann. Frankfort on the Main: Rütten und Loening. M. 4.
"Kaiser Karls Geisel. Ein Legendenspiel." Von Gerhart Hauptmann. Berlin: S. Fischer. M. 3.

pathisers with the movement the want of unanimity is on the increase, and the critics who, from the first, maintained a sceptical or antagonistic attitude, are becoming more clamorous. To the latter class belongs Dr. Paul Goldmann, the Berlin representative of the "Neue Freie Presse," and author of the present volume of polemical criticism. He is a clear-headed, common-sense critic, whose views have from time to time been welcome as affording a wholesome antidote to the often rather blatant optimism of the "moderns." But in this last volume his reserved and sceptical attitude has passed over into what can only be called a pæan of "Schadenfreude." Dr. Goldmann might have told us—and with a justice that stood in no need of vigorous underlining and reiteration—that the new German drama was deficient in theatrical qualities, that it refused to learn from the French, that it showed a disagreeable fondness for perverse moral questions, and delighted in refurbishing forgotten classical plays with modern psychological interpretations. But his tone is of a kind that provokes antagonism rather than wins sympathies; his limited materialistic outlook in matters of poetry precludes any hope of an understanding with the young German pioneers, and explains, too, why an embittered anti-Semitism is so much more readily fostered in Germany than elsewhere. Dr. Goldmann clearly overshoots the mark in his latest volume; the end is not yet. Germany's disappointment and impatience with her national stage are not difficult to understand. The present writer had the good fortune to witness and share in that outburst of popular enthusiasm which, in the early 'nineties, greeted plays like "Die Ehre" and "Heimat," "Jugend" and "Die Weber"; one could not but hope then that Germany would ultimately evolve from the crossing influences that came from France, Scandinavia, and Russia a distinctively national drama on a basis of wholesome realism. But year after year passed, one play after another was greeted with acclamation only to disappear in the limbo of forgotten things, and the coming of the master-dramatist seemed further off than ever. A widespread disappointment was inevitable. But all this does not make Dr. Goldmann's irritatingly superior tone any the more palatable, nor does it convince us that the German drama, as Dr. Goldmann would like to prove to us, was from the beginning on the wrong path.

To such a laudator temporis acti Gerhart Hauptmann is the head and corner-stone of offence. As a matter of fact, the lesser playwrights may pretty well be neglected; writers like Halbe, Dreyer, Hirschfeld, Fulda, have long since shown that, however willing the spirit is, their work is deficient in the ideas that move men; their horizon is bounded by the Philistinism of the theatre, or at best by the vagaries of the literary coteries. Hermann Sudermann, again, accepted too readily the rôle of popular playwright to count very seriously in the building up of a drama of literary pretensions, and we doubt if the reputation of that unkempt genius of the perverse and the abnormal, Frank Wedekind, is erected on a much surer basis. But Gerhart Hauptmann belongs to a different category, and whether, like the critic whose volume we have before us, we accuse him of foolish obstinacy in refusing to learn what a play is from his betters, or are merely disappointed at his continued inability to make headway in the German theatre, we must at least admit that he is an original force in contemporary literature.

His new dramatic legend, "Emperor Charles's Hostage," which was produced in Berlin a little time ago, is not likely to stay the "decay" of which Dr. Goldmann speaks; but we doubt if that critic would agree with us as to the reason. It is a legend of Charles the Great in his later years, and describes the infatuation of the aged king for a young Saxon hostage, Gersuind, who, standing "jenseits von Gut und Böse," is to the old man the embodiment of all that is pure and desirable, while in reality she is rotten to the core. In this mere anecdote Hauptmann has been fascinated by the psychological problem; he has set himself to study how an old man may be shaken by an elemental passion, and he has thrown the result into dramatic form. So far we have no quarrel with the poet; for if the new German drama promised anything twenty years ago, it was that, on the Scandinavian model, it would give us plays of inward, not outward, problems and conflicts. Dr. Goldmann censures with peculiar acrimony Hauptmann's unwillingness to take advantage—in the manner of Dumas and Sardou—of the natural dramatic accents in the subjects he chooses; as a matter of fact, the poet seems to avoid such moments as systematically as the old classical dramatists avoided bloodshed on the stage. And if, by this means, he succeeds in concentrating his audience's attention on the inward dramatic conflict, it is a legitimate and welcome departure from the conventions of the theatre; moreover, the accentuation of the subjective conflict at the expense of outward effectiveness has been a steady principle in the best dramatic work of the North of Europe from Heppel to Ibsen. But, however that may be, there is less action in "Kaiser Karls Geisel" than in any other of Hauptmann's plays, even in that actionless tragedy "Michael Kramer"; the only happenings take place in the mind of the king himself.

The failure of the play is not, however, to be attributed merely to the choice of subject or the method of its treatment; it seems to us that a power was needed to realise this intensely subjective type of drama which lay beyond the poet's range. Hauptmann made his name in German letters as a realist of plastic imagination and delicate powers of observation; in "Kollege Crampton," "Die Weber," "Hannele," "Der Biberpelz," "Fuhrmann Henschel," and "Michael Kramer," he has written dramas which rank very high among the products of the naturalistic movement in Europe, and if the realism of these works was occasionally enlightened by mystic gleams from another world, and poetic, even allegorical, touches not to be found in the drab of French and Russian realism, this only gave Hauptmann's work a distinctive, unforgettable flavour of its own. On the other hand, even the poet's warmest admirers cannot claim for him distinction as a writer of verse; his lines have none of the haunting music of the young Austrian dramatists of our day; he is also, as Georg Brandes pointed out years ago, strangely lacking in the ideas that form the yeast of dramatic poetry. And then how unreal and imaginary is his Kaiser Karl, his Alcuin! They are no more historical than the heroes of the French tragedy of the seventeenth century, and they are, if anything, less living than the personages who strutted the stage in the endless Hohenstaufen dramas of the early nineteenth century in Germany. It would almost seem as if the wave of realism had passed across the German theatre and left it where it was. Thus we regret the failure of Hauptmann's new play not—as critics like Dr. Goldmann would say—because he is leading the German drama into new, unknown lands still unindicated on the critical map, but because he has ignored all that he himself in earlier days helped the German drama to attain. The path he has chosen here leads assuredly only one way, and that is back to the lifeless iambic tragedy on Schillerian lines, a form of literature which German realism in the hour of its triumph believed that it had destroyed. Hauptmann has had failures which we have felt were undeserved: "Michael Kramer" was one, "Schluck und Jau" another—to mention dramas which the popular verdict disposed of without much mercy; he has had one success which we deplored and still deplore, "Die versunkene Glocke," with its uninspired verses, its theatrical allegory, and broad appeal to the sentiment of the masses. Had it not been for this "Sunken Bell" we believe Hauptmann would have remained more faithful to the art of which he is a master, and if he had felt tempted to write historical dramas, they would at least have been on the lines of "Florian Geyer," and not on those of the present play.

On the whole, then, "Kaiser Karls Geisel" is not a work with which to refute Dr. Goldmann's assertion that the German stage is declining; but we trust the failure will have the advantage of sending the poet back to the form of drama in which he has no rival among contemporary men of letters. But we would also insist that the decline of the stage in Germany, if it is to come, will be brought about by those very causes—the return to the theatrical and the conventional, the cessation of experiment—in which Dr. Goldmann sees the only hope for its recovery. To many of us foreigners who are starved on the monotonous multiplicity of the theatres of London and Paris, the charm of the German theatre lies in its independence and originality, in its steady endeavour to get away from the French convention that has dominated the European theatre for more than a century. The German theatre still possesses the power of giving a new thrill to the mind. In Germany, in other words, the theatre is making an honest endeavour to break with tradition, and to speak to the cultivated man of to-day of the things that lie nearest to him; and the failures in such endeavour are, we are inclined to think, more precious in the end than the theatrical successes which run round the globe.

THE HISTORY OF FOLK LORE.*

On its physical side, anthropology is concerned with the measurement of skulls as a key to their ethnic relations; and with the collection of prehistoric remains of man, as tools and weapons from river gravels and caverns, and various objects from graves and monuments, throwing light upon his stage of culture. On its more important side, the psychical anthropology gathers from immaterial relics, products of that marvellous apparatus, the three thousand million-celled human brain, a great body of tradition and belief whose interpretation is the province of folk lore. Strange to say, anthropology knocked for many a year at the door of the British Association for the Advancement of Science before admission was granted, and folk lore still awaits due recognition from historians who profess to run on scientific lines. The inability of the older school to go behind documents had excuse, because no light from a prehistoric past had yet dawned; but no such plea avails the modern school, towards which Mr. Gomme, burning with a zeal "according to knowledge," adopts a tone more monitory than persuasive.

> "It is essential that folk lore should establish its right to a place among the historical sciences. At present that right is not admitted. It is objected to by scholars who will not admit that history can proceed from anything but a dated and certified document, and by a few who do not admit that history has anything to do with affairs that do not emanate from the prominent political or military personages of each period. It is silently, if not contemptuously, ignored by almost every historical inquirer whose attention has not been specially directed to the evidence contained in traditional material."

In brief, to their shame, these heretics deny continuity. Mr. Gomme cites two examples, one local and the other personal, of the interdependence between history and folk lore. He sees in the prominence given to London Bridge in folk tale and legend the deep impression which that structure, erected by the skilled "Romans of Lundinium," made on a rude people; while a key is put into the reluctant hands of the historian whereby is explained the association of mythical exploits with the actual deeds of the last of the Saxon defenders of his country against the Norman. Here it may not be amiss to point out that the legends themselves are witnesses to the existence of the hero, and to the nucleus which they encrust, so that many a name, nebulous in history, becomes consolidated by tradition.

In utilising materials drawn from out-of-the-way sources (as Macaulay utilised broadsheets and pamphlets for his brilliant pictures of social conditions), Mr. Gomme works in the spirit of one to whom there is "nothing common or unclean"; the folk tale, custom, and rite having at their heart some primitive idea wherein lies the only interpretation by man of man himself and of his surroundings then possible. The opening chapter, whose main argument is expressed in the quotation given above, is followed by a discussion on the methods of research to be pursued, and by definitions of terms. There is no such novelty in these as Mr. Gomme assumes; books previous to his own have laid down the canon that primitive myth is primitive science, and, in a certain degree, primitive theology. Examples more or less familiar to the folklorist are given, but, as Herbert Spencer has said, one can drive facts and ideas into people's heads only by "restating the obvious," and we are grateful to Mr. Gomme for including among his samples of creation-myths two admirable specimens from Wales and India, which, with local variation, tell how, there being no solid elements left, woman was woven out of sunbeams, breezes, warmth, cold, and sweetness. The sequel that so ethereal a creature was rejected by man is inevitable. We are reminded of the cynical German proverb: "God made man; then woman; then, taking pity on man, He made tobacco." Supplementing his illustrations by reference to the creation story in Genesis, Mr. Gomme has sympathetic recognition of the high level among cosmogonies which it attains, but his comments are somewhat confused by the use of the term "religion" where it is obvious that "theology" is meant. The distinction should be carefully maintained, because in the one we recognise an element which affects man everywhere deeply and constantly; and in the other that which is the hopeless attempt to incarnate the spiritual in creed and dogma. Neither can we follow Mr. Gomme in his remarks upon survivals in beliefs, and their outward and visible signs in rites and customs. What he has to say about their inevitable decay and death is not reconcilable with the numerous examples of their persistence which follow. It does not seem possible to over-emphasise the influence of the past on the present. As the reproductive cells are charged with ancestral tendencies so dominant that there appears to be no room for the intrusion of characters acquired during the lifetime of the individual, so it is with the forces which we call spiritual. Animistic ideas, however disguised, remain the essential elements of religions; the ancient gods may change their names, but never their natures. The four Spirits of the Sea of old Malay belief become four archangels in the hierarchy of Islam; the worship of Elijah as Helias is carried on at the shrine of the sun god Helios; Demeter survives in St. Demetrios; and the ague-stricken Lincolnshire peasant alike invokes the God of the Christian, and Woden, the old Scandinavian god, in his word-charm against the disease. A thin epidermis covers the thicker layer of pagan conceptions; the educated Hindu officer who, Sir Alfred Lyall tells us, worshipped five pebbles as the symbol of Omnipotence, is on no lower plane than a clerical friend of the reviewer, who, marching with the times in scientific matters, is a firm believer in demonology and witchcraft.

One-fourth of the volume is filled with a chapter on "Anthropological Conditions," wherein, as the title implies, Mr. Gomme deals with matters having less direct bearing on his main theme, although full of interest for the expert. Passing in adverse comment the chief theories propounded on the origin of the strange institution known as totemism, to be broadly defined as "clan work," he falls back, wisely we think, on general principles, in the remark that > "the tie of totemism is not the tie of blood kinship, but the artificially created association with natural objects or animals," born, it may be added, of barbaric belief in a community of life between earth's creatures, one among other previsions of the uncultured mind which modern science justifies. There remain a number of subjects, notably those bearing on custom, a branch wherein Mr. Gomme speaks with special authority, which have suggestive treatments, and invite comment. This the limits of space forbid, and it must suffice to commend a book which skilfully marshals a further body of evidence on the workings of evolution in the human sphere.

Edward Clodd.

* "Folk Lore as an Historical Science." By George Lawrence Gomme. With Twenty-eight Illustrations. Methuen & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

THE ARAB IN ARCHITECTURE.*

The traveller who journeys southward across Europe, as he approaches the Mediterranean, will become aware, if he is interested in the subject of architecture, of a singular change which takes place in the general character and appearance of buildings. It matters very little where exactly his southward course lies, but as the length of Italy, with Sicily lying off the end of it, and the great Spanish peninsular, are the boldest southern projections, it is here perhaps that the change is most keenly felt. It is not a change to be expressed in terms of style. You do not account for it by any of the normal references to the classic, the Renaissance, the Gothic, or any other mode of building. It is not even to be accounted for by the introduction of new forms and features; for the peculiarity of this curious change is that it can work upon any material. It is not in any sense a creative movement; it has no powers of its own; but on every kind of architectural design submitted to it it operates indifferently, and the general effect and outcome of its operations is always the same. What it does is this: it takes from every style or structural feature it has to deal with its accuracy and sharpness of outline, and the clean definition of its form. No matter what the style or the feature may be, they all undergo the same metamorphosis; they all come out a little blurred, dulled, and sodden looking. It is by this you recognise them. The Norman column, the Gothic arch, the Renaissance pilaster and architrave are found in the South, as in the North; but, as compared with the Northern specimens, the Southern always give one the same impression, the impression that they have been boiled, and have lost in the boiling their hardness and their precision of outline and angle. Moreover, it is not only in the structural features that the change takes effect; it takes effect wherever form is the motive; in all sculpture, whether of foliage, or animals, or other objects. In the South sculpture quite loses its strong and precise Northern quality, and becomes flabby and comparatively meaningless. In a word, as we approach the Mediterranean, the sense for form, which is the dominating characteristic of Northern art, weakens and declines.

* "Portuguese Architecture." By Walter Crum Watson. Constable. 25s.

All who have travelled will recognise the change of which I speak. We will not linger on what is obvious. But the causes of which this is the effect are worth considering. Those causes are not to be sought in natural differences of climate and temperature, for in the classic age, when the Greek and Roman influence was paramount in these latitudes, the capacity to deal with form existed in its full vigour. There is to this day no more curious contrast to be found in architecture than that suggested by the exquisitely clear and curt articulation of the Greek temples of Sicily as compared with the floridly decorative buildings of later dates in Sicilian towns; and throughout the whole extent of the Mediterranean countries the still surviving remains of Roman ruins, clean-hewn and solid, offer just the same contrast to later surrounding structures. The effects we speak of are not, therefore, due to natural conditions. They are due to racial influence. It will be found that, wherever the Arab race has touched, these effects have crept in, and wherever the Arab race has established itself these effects have become the abiding characteristics of architecture. Right across the South of Europe, roughly, perhaps, coinciding with the fortieth degree of latitude, extends an invisible frontier, marked upon no map, but marked clearly enough in the changing character of its buildings, up to which the Arab influence, carried by inroads or perpetuated by compact, penetrated. All along this frontier the European and Arabic characteristics grapple in a wavering conflict. Down to it from the North the European genius, which is rational and intellectual in its character and coherent in its methods, which slowly builds up its civilisation and develops its literature, science, and system of government on approved and tested principles, which leans constantly, as intellectualism always must lean, to the tangible and definable, and for that very reason has always, on the artistic side, found itself in form and expressed its ideas most naturally in terms of form—down to that line, I say, the European genius reigns, and the mark of its sovereignty is the clean-cut sculpture and architecture, imbued with the full sense of purpose and knowledge of adaptation of means to ends which belong to the Western temperament. Then comes the change, subtle, scarcely distinguished at first, but soon more and more unmistakable as lines begin to waver and forms to dissolve, and all the vigour of intellectual definition dies gradually away. We have passed the frontier now, and are within the sphere of influence of Orientalism. The mystical and the sensuous have taken the place of the practical and the intellectual. Exact definition, the formative and structural principles, are no longer here vehicles for the expression of life. Rather these principles are life's playthings, to be experimented with, to be twisted and tangled and involved into a thousand fantastic and irrational designs. Look at this quaint arcade of arches distorted into unimaginable shapes, resting on shafts like pipe stems, and honeycombed with undecipherable chiselwork. Such are the uses to which the sternly simple features of Northern architecture are now degraded.

Portuguese architecture, as Mr. Crum Watson says in the preface to the work which has suggested these remarks, is in itself no very great thing. But architecture is always interesting, for it is that one of the arts which most fully and freely expresses racial character. People all build, and they all build according to their nature. The Greeks, the Romans, the Goths, and, in their own peculiar way, the Arabs, have all left on architecture the impress of their racial temperament, and the mingling or conflict of their various styles of building is a mingling or conflict of racial characteristics. Now Portugal is one of those countries which lie upon the frontier line we spoke of which divides European and Arabic ascendency, and the whole country is more or less penetrated and influenced by the struggle between the two. Necessarily that struggle is bad for architecture as architecture. The Arab influence on the arts of form has been an unmixed curse. It only needs to turn the pages of the book before us, well illustrated as they are, to see in almost every photograph the effects of the enervating Oriental influence. The feeble ingenuity of the tracery, the instability of the arches with their frail, complicated archivolts, the overcrowded and flaccid surface-carving are the constantly recurring symptoms of that influence. All this is bad, I say, for architecture, but it has its side of human interest. It helps to a realisation of one cause at least of the old perpetual antagonism between East and West. The East has its own gifts of sensuous and emotional apprehension. It has its seers and prophets where we have our scientists and scholars. But we must go elsewhere than to the arts of form for a display of these Oriental gifts. Meeting, as here, in architecture, it is the strength of the West, the weakness of the East, that is shown. All that the West has to offer to the East, the power of coherent design, of intellectual definition and cogent reasoning, are gifts that go to the making of great architecture; and here along this Mediterranean frontier-line, where the East comes lapping to our threshold, and where we can watch the great European structural principle dissolving at its touch, here we have an opportunity of seeing at their work those disabilities and incompetencies which, far from being restricted to the sphere of art, are the disabilities and incompetencies which permeate Oriental life. Look at these tottering arches and honeycombed sculpture! This is why the East has no literature worth calling literature, no science worth calling science, no government worth calling government. This is why we are in India. Architectural incapacity is the sure sign of intellectual and political incapacity all the world over, for architecture is par excellence an intellectual art.

It has often seemed to me that the change of which we have been speaking, the change wrought in European architecture by the westward rush of an Oriental race, might be made of itself the subject for a fairly interesting little book. As I have pointed out, this change is uniform in character, it attacks all styles alike, it is fairly well defined in range, and it would seem capable therefore of being handled as a separate theme. Perhaps such a treatise might bear the title of "Mediterranean Architecture," for the Mediterranean, rather than any national boundaries, has determined its extent, and it has acted, in varying degrees of intensity, all round the coasts of that sea.

L. March-Phillipps.

THE BOARD SCHOOL—AND AFTER.*

From a former generation, that which knew the Education Act of 1870, Mr. Sneyd-Kynnersley comes down to us with mirth. He had a narrow escape of the law, but, very happily for the readers of these pages, a discerning providence reserved him for the humours of the School Board. On the morning that he was appointed "one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools," he received a brief in Chambers. "This had never occurred before." Briefs there had been, an unremunerative few, at sessions and assizes, "but in Paper Buildings hitherto the solicitors had respected the privacy of my apartment." The brief instructed him to examine a bankrupt in Chambers. The bankrupt, we surmise, had the best of it; and Mr. Kynnersley, convinced of his unfitness for the Woolsack, proceeded to leave a card on the Lord

* "H.M.I.: Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools." By E. M. Sneyd-Kynnersley, formerly H.M.I. North-West Division. Macmillan & Co. 8s. 6d. net.

President. His appointment, he assures us, was a job. There is a chorus, which all who peruse these reminiscences will raise together—"And a good job too!"

Mr. Kynnersley began in Wales, having no Welsh, and but limited powers of enjoying the profuse but incongruent hospitalities of the country. The clergy nourished him on old port; the dissenting ministers offered their choicest butter-milk. The Church tendered cigars; Dissent pressed on him an unfamiliar leaf known as "Tobacco of The Cause." His first regular billet was in Norfolk, where he found a lovable people, an irritating railway system, a curious collection of third-class inns, a climate of Siberia, and some peculiar names.

> "Also there is a child named Laste. I asked the Rector whether I should say Last or Lastee? and whether IT was a boy or a girl? IT was a boy, and the Rector well remembered baptising IT. 'Name this child,' he said, and the father replied 'Last.' 'How do you spell it?' asked the puzzled priest. The father said he didn't spell it at all, but IT was the tenth, and he wasn't going to have any more."

It was a Norfolk parlour-maid who let fall a bon-mot about the orchids she was helping her master to move: "An' a very good name fer un tew; awkidest things I ever handled." A similar unconscious pleasantry was sometimes found in the lips of the Norfolk elector. Two yokels were gazing on a poster which announced the result of a by-election:—

"Brown	3,456
Jones	2,978
Majority	478

"'I 'xpact thet's about thet there election.'
"'Ya-as: there was only tew of un got in, though.'
"'Ya-as: only they two a' the top.'
"And the other added with an indescribable air of cunning:
"'Ole Majority di'nt get many, did 'a?'"

In the course of years Mr. Kynnersley inspected the schools of nearly a dozen counties.

> "There were places which I never saw except in winter: there were others which I connected with climbing roses in the village, and great bunches of wild flowers in white jugs inside the school. If I lunched with A., I had ducks and green peas; B. came in rhubarb-tart time; C. fed me on game; D. gave me the first mince pies of Advent."

School Boards perplexed, worried, and amused him; but Mr. Inspector is, or was, a more or less irresponsible person, and the shoe seldom pinched him; the geography or arithmetic of an entire Board may collapse beyond recovery, but H.M.I. sleeps well. "Don't shoot them: they are doing their best," might, says Mr. Kynnersley have been inscribed on the council chambers of many Boards.

It is time to come to the children. Mr. Inspector was not long in learning that the one thing the human boy may be expected to say is the unexpected. His games and nearly all his pleasures are rooted in Conservatism, but when it comes to conversation or examination he has gins that bring sorrow to the wariest. "How much is eleven twelves?" asks Mr. Kynnersley, and answer is there none. He puts it more searchingly: "Who knows how much is eleven twelves?" To a question couched in that form the response, if unforeseen, was inevitable: "Gawd!"

There is the usual chapter of "Errata"; a delightful one, fruitful of amazing remarks on the boy's part. The boy in class is always shedding new light on things. History, in particular, is a mine to him out of which he fetches treasures bigger and more blazing than the Pitt diamond. The Jacobites—

> "called themselves Jacobites from a passage in Scripture about Jacob which passage they considered applicable to their own case. Their object was to do away with the tolls at turnpike gates, and they went to the root of the matter and destroyed the gates themselves."

The Young Pretender—

> "was Prince Charles Edward who claimed to have been one of the little Princes murdered in the Tower. He was found to be a deceiver, and was put into the King's Kitchen to work."

Another scholar recognised him as—

> "the son of the Old Pretender, William Pitt, who was a claimant to the throne in George 3's time. He was one of the greatest statesmen that ever lived. He was created Earl of Orford."

Magna Charta—

> "was a very good woman to the poor. Her photograph is on the stained glass windows of the Church of Scotland."

Wellington, Nelson, Bonaparte, Marlborough, Clive, and others are occasionally blended into one glorious character who began life in the king's kitchen, was ordered thence "to the regulars," rose to be the only general "able to lead the whole of the British army into Hyde Park, and lead them out of it again," was equally terrible on land and sea, gained the famous victory at Waterloo, had a hand at Blenheim, "dispelled some rioters" in the Indian Mutiny, was an inmate of the Black Hole at Calcutta, commanded the English fleet during the Peninsular war, led the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaclava, bore his part in the Spanish Armada, was "charged with bribery after serving in Parliament a few years," and was finally "carried by his men in their arms to the cabin below," where (as well he might!) he thanked God that he had done his duty.

Eager always is the boy to light his privy lamp in places he considers dark. By the Treaty of Utrecht, for example—

> "the English gained a good many battles. They gained the entry through the Mediterranean Sea, and also opened trade to the Americans. These battles was mostly all won by Bute, viz., the battles of Vicissico, Maschueritz, Passaro, and Vico Vosa. The former being assisted by Marlborough, who was one of the chief persuaders of Queen Anne, 1702. Bute, though he tried his utmost to make things successful, he was hung by the vengeance of the people. The previous wars led to the Indian Mutiny, where a great many of our soldiers were ill-treated and became romantic with thirst."

No doubt there is sometimes a certain rash confidence on the examiner's part. He is an optimist who is determined to believe that he is examining a future Stubbs or Freeman. Somewhat often, however, it is impossible to acquit him of folly in the questions he belabours the boy with. How many of us could say offhand what was the "Root and Branch Bill" of 1641? Which of us would be a penny the better for knowing all about it? Would one in ten among us have given a more reasonable answer than that of the boy who said, "A Bill dealing with the root of the matter, and some branches relating to it." The mind can charge itself only with a certain quantity of knowledge, and some useful items must be displaced in order to make room for information of an almost vicious uselessness respecting the Root and Branch Bill of 1641. Indeed, behind the feast of mirth which Mr. Kynnersley's delightful reminiscences provide us with, there will lurk, for some readers, an awkward question or so. Are the blunders of the boy all there is to show for the millions spent on national education in eight-and-thirty years? Every year almost we get a new crop of stories from the schools, and, from 1870 to the present day, they are all of the same kind. The boy has been making the same mess of history, geography, arithmetic, and literature just as long as we have been hearing about him—and a book on the lines of Mr. Kynnersley's (though seldom half so witty) makes its appearance every other year. Nay, not all the blunders are the blunders of the boy. Not a few of them are the follies of pupil-teachers, aged 18-20, or assistant teachers, aged 20-30. It is a teacher who tells us that "Warren Hastings was known as the Old Pretender," and another teacher that he was "the son of Edward VI." Really, it would seem to matter little whether the teachers taught the children or the children the teachers. Obviously both are being crammed (by what methods, out of what text-books, we know not) with a heterogeneous mass of facts and figures which they are totally unable to assimilate, and three-fourths of which would never, at any time, in any situation, be of the most infinitesimal service to them. It would be of far more real help to the boy to impress on him that he ought to keep to the right in walking than to inform him (what it is probable he privately disbelieves) that in 1641 a Bill was passed to abolish Archbishops.

Year by year, for thirty-seven years past, boy and teacher alike have striven to persuade us—in spite of heaven knows how many Codes!—that the Jacobites descended from Jacob; that Wellington, Nelson, or Napoleon was one of Queen Elizabeth's naval commanders; that Sir Thomas Moore was killed at the battle of Corunna; that Blake was one of the seven Bishops; that the Coalition Ministry of 1783 had something to do with the cheapening of coal; that Christmas originated with the Pilgrim Fathers on their celebrated adventure in the Holy Land; that Free Trade came in with the cargo of tea which Washington smuggled into the Bristol Channel; that Jack Cade quelled a rebellion with the historic words: "I am Henry of Winchester, kill not your king"; that John Knox is identified with the steam roller and the printing press; and that Christianity was introduced into Britain by Julius Cæsar, fifty-five years before the birth of Christ.

In the matter of national education, a not inexpensive item for all of us, have we tried as sincerely as Bute on the plains of Vicissico and Vico Vosa to "make things successful"?

A MODERN SONG WRITER.*

To many, perhaps to most English-speaking musicians, Hugo Wolf and his music are still very much of an enigma. Now and then a concert is given, on the programme of which stands Wolf's name against a couple of songs, while once in the proverbial blue moon there comes forward a musician bold enough to devote a whole scheme to the wonderful creature and his music. Such opportunities as are thus provided for the uninitiated are, for reasons that are quite obvious to his better-acquainted brother, entirely inadequate to a right and proper understanding of Hugo Wolf's genius. For genius Wolf unquestionably possessed, even if one cannot go the whole way with Mr. Ernest Newman, and place him, as composer of Lieder, above Schubert. But it must be confessed that the author of this extremely interesting, finely felt, and critically admirable study, makes out a good case for his subject, whom he appears more thoroughly to understand than any other British writer who has devoted attention to Wolf.

> "Those of us who have worked unceasingly at Wolf's songs, finding our admiration for them grow as our acquaintance with them has deepened, have no hesitation in putting him at the head of the song-writers of the world. He surpasses them all to the same extent and for the same reasons that Wagner surpasses all other musical dramatists—in virtue of the vast range of his interests, his Shakespearian breadth of sympathy, the infinite plasticity of his conceptions, his gift for finding for each poem a musical expression so poignant and so veracious that one can never again imagine it being expressed in any other way."

This is precisely what we should have said of Schubert. But we have, unfortunately, no space to follow Mr. Newman's argument to its end. The quotation, however, will serve to exhibit his enthusiasm.

Mr. Newman divides his book into two parts, of which one deals with the life, the other with the works, of Hugo Wolf. Intensely interesting the life is, though now and then it makes painful reading. Philippe Wolf, the father of Hugo, seems to have been a fairly prosperous business man, though he came near to being ruined by a big fire while his son was still an infant. From his father, an excellent violinist, pianist, and guitar player, Hugo received his earliest music lessons, and from the first he gave evidence of the possession of an unusual musical capacity. To this, no doubt, was due the fact that he was in no way fitted to become the "sober and contented man of business" which his father sought to make him. Unfortunately, there are no complete details forthcoming of the combat between father and son on the subject of the latter's profession, but it is enough to know that ultimately the former gave way to his son's desire, and that Hugo duly entered the Vienna Conservatorium. The delightful account of the lad's hero-worshipping of Wagner during his student days, of his applauding Wagner so furiously at the first performance he had heard of "Tannhäuser" that his hands became sore, of his ultimate meeting with the master and of his attempt to show Wagner his youthful compositions, must be read in Mr. Newman's book. Though Wagner refused to express an opinion of the merits of the music—"I understand nothing at all about music," he said—yet he deeply moved and impressed the lad. Indeed, the impression was both lasting and deep, for on one occasion Wolf closed the pianoforte upon which he had played through "Parsifal," declaring that henceforth no other music should be heard after it. And again, Dr. Decsey has stated positively that in course of time Wolf's handwriting came to resemble Wagner's. Nevertheless, all the great enthusiastic admiration did nothing to reduce the strength of Wolf's own individuality.

Looking back over a period of thirty years, it is amusing enough to read of Wolf's dismissal from the Vienna Conservatorium on account of the fraudulent missive, signed by his name, which some miscreant had sent to Hellmesberger, its chief, warning him that he had but one more Christmas to enjoy. But it was a serious matter for Wolf, who raged all the more furiously, perhaps, at the stigma of dismissal because it was his heart's desire to leave the institution, where he himself says he learned very little. Henceforth he was his own master, He read voraciously. He worked at the study of music with intense earnestness, and he found useful friends in Felix Mottl and Josef and Franz Schalk. Even then, however, he seems to have given transitory glimpses of a somewhat eccentric mind. On one occasion, on going to a wedding, he, after many solicitations, seated himself at the pianoforte, and burst, not into an appropriate wedding march, but into Berlioz's "March to the Scaffold."

> "'He played the dreadful music,' says Eckstein, 'with a realism that was positively terrifying. He represented the execution, suggested the scaffold and the blood, and made so demoniac an effect that the bride, who was standing by him in her wedding dress, fell down in a swoon. Wolf got up and left the house.'"

For a lengthy period there followed a hideous struggle with poverty, to which many a stronger man than Wolf might have succumbed. Indeed, in 1881 his pinched and precarious financial condition proved no longer endurable, and Wolf became second Kapellmeister at Salzburg. This post he held, however, for but a short time, and he appears next as the musical critic of the Vienna "Salonblatt," wherein he constantly fulminated against the Philistines, but wrote enthusiastically of the older masters, and of Marschner and Berlioz. The nationalism of Grieg and others, however, made no deep appeal to him, though rather curiously he admired Smetana, Glinka, and Tschaikowsky. For him Liszt was the lion of the piano, Rubinstein the tiger, Friedheim the panther, Rosenthal the devil—extremely happy epithets, all of them.

Gradually Wolf was growing to that mastery of which Mr. Newman writes so admirably in his critical study of the compositions, into which we have no space to go. Slowly, but none the less surely, the fruits of his muse were attracting the attention of the best judges, Friedrich Hofmann, Schalk, Jäger, Hirschfeld, Graf, Vancsa, and others. But Wolf's life was slowly ebbing to its close, long, in the ordinary course of things, before the art he so splendidly enriched was prepared to part from him. To-day all the world knows of the cloud which, small at first, gradually crept over the mind of Wolf, and there is no use in dwelling here upon the melancholy end. Enough it is to realise that Wolf was a composer of greatest gifts, and a song writer among the foremost in the singers' Walhalla. As time passes and knowledge of his muse grows, so waxes the popularity of his songs, certainly his finest creations—the word "popularity" being used, of course, in its best sense. Than this no higher praise can be given. Mr. Newman's book is one that will appeal to many readers who are not themselves musicians, for his picture of Wolf is clearly drawn, and the subject stands out well. There is not an English musician who can afford to ignore the second part of the volume.

* "Hugo Wolf." By Ernest Newman. Methuen.

THE LAND OF THE WALLABY.*

THE special characteristics of Australian fauna and flora, and also of geography, are so many, and the distinctness with which they vary from the normal so great as to strike the imagination of most new colonists and British visitors. Mr. Thomas Ward, a Queensland stock-farmer, with more than the usual opportunities of his calling, has seen much of most parts of the Continent, and has embodied his experience in copious, if somewhat random notes. They do not contain much that is new. Their main usefulness is to give the known facts their true relative proportions, to convert text-book information into something approaching personal

* "Rambles of an Australian Naturalist." By Thomas Ward. Edited by Paul Fountain. Murray.

A NOVEL QUARTETTE.

In introducing my NOVEL QUARTETTE I have in mind the general verdict passed upon THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND. The chorus of praise that these four volumes received far exceeded my most sanguine hopes, and I have no doubt that a NOVEL QUARTETTE will prove not less acceptable.

¶ "Such books are worth keeping on the shelves, even by the classics," was the opinion of the Times upon THE WINGLESS VICTORY. The numerous readers of Miss WILLCOCKS'S previous book will not, I venture to think, be disappointed in A MAN OF GENIUS. It will be remembered that the critics received her last book with acclamation, which resounded in America, and is vibrating in Germany and Scandinavia, where the book has been translated. A MAN OF GENIUS, the scene of which is laid amid the wildest scenery of the North Devon Coast, shows a profound knowledge of art, love, passion, and the elemental things of life. It will convince the reader of the danger incurred by the children of earth in playing with fire. There will be ten Illustrations by WINIFRED STORY. [Just out.

¶ There are two things that a publisher is always anxious to discover, a Great Australian Novelist and a Great Irish Novelist. When I received my reader's report upon THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT, by T. B. CLEGG, I felt that perhaps one of these discoveries was made, and the following quotation will perhaps justify me: "In my opinion Mr. CLEGG is a novelist who will at no very distant date achieve one of those successes which make a big reputation. I can with some amount of reason look forward to a real success for this novel." [May 22nd.

¶ On the publication of CLARA VIEBIG'S remarkable book ABSOLUTION in Germany last autumn a two-column review appeared in the Westminster Gazette, from which the following passages are selected: "In Germany, this book of the sombre purple cover and the design of a halo surrounding the strange title is everywhere. It is on train and steamer, in little odd bookshops of sleepy country towns, and (often in strange company) among the best displayed wares in the shop windows of the main streets of great cities. 'It is a terrible book,' people say. . . . The face of a woman, young and proud, haunts the pages of the new novel by the most powerful of women writers of Germany." [Just out.

¶ ABSOLUTION created a sensation in Germany, and THE CHILD OF CHANCE (Le Semeur) had no less a vogue in France. It was the book of the season, and as such immensely discussed in Paris. The heroine of ABSOLUTION is a woman to whom man is the Lover, to Marie-Cécile in MAXIME FORMONT'S NOVEL man is essentially the Father. The justification of illicit love has formed the subject of many plays and novels, but the rights of maternity have been grievously overlooked. Can the maternal instinct in a woman justify her disobedience to conventional standards? The portrait of Marie-Cécile offers a partial solution to the problem. M. FORMONT knows that he is dealing with a delicate subject, but he deals with it as a man, one who not only recognises the cry of motherhood, but knows what it portends. [May 19th.

I have lately issued the following novels:—

THE MASTER KNOT ALICE BIRKHEAD.
"A new writer to be reckoned with seriously . . . her handling of the hero and heroine is masterly."—Morning Leader.

THE CHICHESTER INTRIGUE THOMAS COBB.
"The idea is good, the character-drawing beyond the average, and the writing excellent in its ease."—World.

THE ISLE OF MAIDS M. T. HAINSSELIN.
"An animated, original story."—Times.

THE FINANCES OF SIR JOHN KYNNERSEY A. C. FOX-DAVIES.
"Extremely bold and entertaining."—Morning Post.

THE GATES THAT SHALL NOT PREVAIL H. M. FARRINGTON.
"Should appeal to the popular taste."—Athenæum.

LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER F. J. RANDALL.
2nd Impression.

In addition to a Novel Quartette, I have the following important books almost ready:—

(I.) PLEASURE AND PROBLEM IN SOUTH AFRICA.
By CECIL HARMSWORTH, M.P.
Record of a tour at the Cape, with discussion of the more pressing problems. Crown 8vo. 5s. net

(II.) THE CREED OF BUDDHA.
By THE AUTHOR of "The Creed of Christ."
An attempt to ascertain the inner faith of Buddha and its relations to Indian Idealism and Christianity.
Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

(III.) THE SHAKESPEARE PROBLEM RESTATED.
By GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P.
A judicial summary of the evidence for and against identifying Shakespeare with the Stratford player.
Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

(IV.) THE LIFE OF SIR HALLIDAY MACARTNEY, K.C.M.G.
By DEMETRIUS BOULGER.
Macartney was thirty years secretary to the Chinese Legation in London. Demy 8vo. 24s. net.

The Bodley Head, JOHN LANE.
London & New York.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN THADEUS DELANE.

Editor of the Times. Containing hitherto unpublished Letters of Palmerston, Disraeli, and other Statesmen, and numerous Anecdotes of the Court and London Society in the Reign of Queen Victoria. By ARTHUR IRWIN DASENT. With Illustrations, 2 vols. demy 8vo, 32s. net.

"The reader who would comprehend the incredible extent of Delane's influence must read this book. He can scarcely believe till he has seen all the evidence; but when he has seen it he will be not only astonished but convinced. . . . Nothing can disguise the instructiveness of these volumes."—Spectator.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON, M.P.

A Memoir. By REGINALD LUCAS. With Illustrations, including several Sketches of Political Personages by Colonel Saunderson. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

THE TRUTH ABOUT PORT ARTHUR.

By Monsieur E. K. NOJINE, accredited Russian War Correspondent during the Siege. Translated and abridged by Captain A. B. LINDSAY. Edited by Major E. D. SWINTON, D.S.O. With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"One must admit that he has written far and away the most vivid and instructive story we have yet had of Port Arthur."—Birmingham Post.

"It is one of the most remarkable books that have lately appeared, and it is singularly dramatic and entertaining. We are made to feel the life of Port Arthur during the siege, and to realise the causes of failure in divided counsels and a system faulty from base to summit."—Army and Navy Gazette.

A WOMAN'S WAY THROUGH UNKNOWN LABRADOR.

By Mrs. LEONIDAS HUBBARD, Junior. With Map. Portraits, and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net,

Leonidas Hubbard was a pioneer in the exploration of Labrador, and lost his life there in the cause of science. Mrs. Hubbard bravely took up the work, and, having done so with success, has set down a plain statement of her journey through Labrador, and of her husband's expedition as well. Her book tells a moving story, and is authoritative and unique.

FROM PEKING TO SIKKIM

Through the Ordos, the Gobi Desert, and Tibet. By COUNT DE LESDAIN. With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. net. [Just out.

Count and Countess de Lesdain, immediately after their marriage, travelled from Peking through the little-known district of the Ordos Desert, thence by the province of Kansu, across the high mountainous district into the valley of the Yangtse and so to Tibet.

FROM PEKING TO MANDALAY.

Being the Account of a Journey from North China to Burma through Tibetan Ssuch'uan and Yunnan. By R. F. JOHNSTON, M.A., F.R.G.S., Member of the Royal Asiatic Society. With numerous Illustrations and Map. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE RISE OF MAN.

By COLONEL C. R. CONDER, LL.D., M.R.A.S., author of "Tent Work in Palestine," "The Hittites, their Language," &c., &c. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

DEAN'S HALL.

By MAUDE GOLDRING, New Novel, 6s.

A story of open-air life on somewhat unusual lines. The scene is laid in Upper Wharfedale a hundred years ago.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

knowledge, and to stimulate a desire to know more. More can certainly be known.

The Blue Mountains, which for so many years baffled the steps of the explorers who would merely cross them, are still full of unexplored tracts. Of those strange exitless valleys, completely surrounded by cliffs hundreds of feet in height, and unwatered by any permanent stream, there are still many that have not been entered. One such, only twelve miles from the Picton viaduct, took Mr. Ward and his friends five days to reach under skilled guidance. It is seven miles long and five broad, and surrounded by thousand-feet cliffs so sheer that a stone can be flung so as to clear the whole drop. Others have an area of more than a hundred square miles, with no stream larger than a brook and no means of accounting for their origin.

Meanwhile there is ample room for the work of the preserver of wild life. In the forests of the Blue Mountains the lyre bird is painfully escaping extinction; the wedge-tailed eagle reigns there as king; and gorgeous parrots and cockatoos scream in the richly flowered ravines. We have an endearing description of the lyre bird, which, in spite of its pheasant-like appearance, is one of the sweetest song-birds of Australia. "The song is rather loud but sweet and flute-like in tone and quite unlike that of any other bird. . . . The sounds of imitation include the calls and cries of every creature that is found in the locality. . . . The lyre bird nearly always interposes snatches of its own song between its mimic cries, and finishes its concert with a prolonged solo of its own notes. The song is often kept up till night has quite set in."

The echidna, or native porcupine, is plentiful enough in the Victorian Alps. In spite of its smooth, bird-like brain, which seems to be in this animal and the platypus a mysteriously necessary corollary to their egg-laying habit, the echidna has considerable claims to intelligence. Puzzling in detail as well as in their main constitution, both echidna and duckbill are furnished with spurs on the hind feet, an offensive apparatus that seems out of place on these inoffensive creatures. However, it is only the males that carry them, so that in spite of all appearance to the contrary, these mild beings may indulge in fierce contests during the mating season. The spur is grooved, and has an obvious gland at its base, but no fluid has been detected in the gland. On the balance of probabilities, the spur is an obsolete weapon in process of disappearance.

Another harmless creature, which by virtue of a pinch-beck suit of spikes has received no less a name than Moloch horridus, or spiny devil, is met with chiefly in mallee scrub, that monotonous bush which stands on a disk or "scab" a yard in diameter, from which it sends down its tap-root and shoots up its stunted branches. Most of us are familiar with Moloch's portrait. "Its harmlessness is in direct contradiction to its horrible appearance." Unlike the frilled lizard, it by no means presumes upon its warlike appearance. Standing on its hind-legs and distending its frill to the utmost, the "Australian dragon" lashes furiously with its tail and grins appallingly with all its teeth. But these teeth it fails to use in the slightest when, its bluff having failed, its yard-long body writhes in our hands. A creature of which we had not heard before, and which we hope, with Mr. Ward, may prove new to science, is his "leaping centipede," of sometimes seventeen inches in length, which he met with in the Champion Bay and Swan River districts. It is of coppery hue with greenish reflections, and, when alarmed, escapes by drawing its body into a loop and suddenly springing a distance of twelve or sixteen feet!

AN ENGLISH SQUIRE.*

The words of Miss Florence Nightingale, which so fitly close this memoir of Lord Wantage, express the feelings of those who knew him: "Lord Wantage is a great loss—but he has been a great gain. And what he has gained for us can never be lost. It is my experience that such men exist only in England. A man who had everything (to use the common phrase) that the world could give him, but who worked as hard, and to the last, as the poorest able man—and all for others—for the common good. A man whose life makes a great difference for all. All are better than if he had not lived, and this betterment is for always—it does not die with him. That is the true estimate of a great life." However difficult it may be to enter into the soldier spirit which animated his life throughout—for he came of a military race—that which is ever present in the best type of soldiers was his, namely, a strong sense of duty, for in his later days, when failing health led a friend to urge upon him the giving up of some public business, he replied: "But I must do something to justify my existence."

Robert James Loyd-Lindsay was born in 1832 at Balcarres, in Fifeshire, the youngest child of General and Mrs. Lindsay, one of the younger branches of the Lindsay family, of which the Earl of Crawford is the head. His earlier years were spent at Bălcarres, varied by foreign travel and school. From Eton he entered Haileybury, and thence, at eighteen, into the Scots Fusilier Guards. Four years afterwards the Crimean War broke out, and his was one of the first regiments to leave for the seat of war. Influence was strong in his favour, and opportunity soon came his way. At the battle of the Alma Lindsay was the Queen's colour-bearer, and when the Fusiliers retired from the Russian parapet the tide of conflict was around him, but he saved the colours, and so won his V.C.—one of the first to obtain that coveted decoration. For two years he remained in the Crimea, returning home to be one of the heroes of his time, for at Inkerman he again was mentioned for his valour.

Such was the opening of his career, and it led to much that follows. Lady Wantage, with the delicacy which is manifested throughout the entire book, does not tell how it led to their marriage, which was romantic in the extreme. In 1852, Lord and Lady Overstone and their young daughter met the Lindsays in Rome. The story is that the young Lieutenant afterwards fell in love with the Hon. Miss Loyd, but her father refused the necessary sanction to their engagement, and the young soldier went out to the East, hoping to end his life on the battlefield. When he returned with laurels on his brow, the parental objections were removed, and Lindsay was welcomed gladly, and became son-in-law to Lord Overstone, who gave the young couple his Berkshire estates, he adding the name of Loyd to his patronymic.

The record of Lord Wantage's many activities are given in detail, but not too fully. After leaving the Army, he threw himself into the Volunteer movement, of which he was one of the earliest officers. The outbreak of the Franco German War in 1870 gave an opportunity for carrying out on a larger scale a Swiss proposal, made in 1863, for miti gating the horrors of war; and Colonel Lindsay, as he was then, was the leading spirit in the British Red Cross Society, to which he devoted a large portion of his time, and he took a personal part in directing its work in France, Servia, and Turkey, during various conflicts. In 1877, he became Financial Secretary to the War Office. But his efforts were by no means confined to military and political spheres. As a great landowner, he was deeply interested in agriculture, and his estates were among the best-managed in the country. Believing in education, he was one of the founders and a liberal supporter of what is now University College, Reading, of which he was president for many years, and directly inspired the establishment of an Agricultural Department. To that College Lady Wantage is giving a hostel for eighty men students in memory of her husband, and Wantage Hall will perpetuate his name. It is of interest to note that Lord Wantage was one of the pioneers of small holdings and allotments. He was a Conservative and a Churchman, but broad-minded and liberal in thought.

It is impossible in a short notice adequately to deal with this suggestive book, or to mention the multifarious public work in which Lord Wantage took part. Reference may be made, however, to the way in which Lady Wantage has paid this tribute to his memory. It is charmingly written, in a spirit of self-abnegation beyond all praise, worthy the subject and the writer. Throughout their married life, extending over a period of forty-three years, these two were linked by an affection which was beautiful to behold.

* "Lord Wantage, V.C., K.C.B.: A Memoir, by his Wife." Smith, Elder & Co. 10s. 6d.

DUCKWORTH & CO.'s LIST.

A HISTORY OF ART.

By Dr. GIULIO CAROTTI, of the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Milan, and the Royal University of Rome. English Edition. Revised by Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. Vol. I.—ANCIENT ART. 540 Illustrations. Now Ready. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

 An indispensable book of reference. Prospectus on application.

THE MUSEUMS AND RUINS OF ROME.

By WALTER AMELUNG and H. HOLTZINGER. Edited by Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. Maps, Plans, and 270 Illustrations. 2 vols. 10s. net.

"These little books are without their match."—Academy.

ROMAN SCULPTURE FROM AUGUSTUS TO CONSTANTINE.

By Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. With 130 Plates, Pott 4to, 10s. net.

"Mrs. Strong has never ceased to claim serious æsthetic consideration for the works of Roman artists, and is admirably equipped for the task which she has here undertaken. A word of special praise is due for the excellent selection of illustrations, which leave no phase of Roman sculpture unrepresented, and include several unfamiliar subjects."—Spectator.

Two Good Novels.

ISLE RAVEN.

By OWEN VAUGHAN (Owen Rhoscomyl). 6s.

"A tale of great power and fascination. His description of the glories of the southern coast and the perils of its rock-bound channels will appeal to every lover of the sea."—Observer.

"A writer of great power." "A magnificent love story."

"A wonderful romance which holds us in the grip of a visionary world."—Daily Telegraph.

A Leaflet descriptive of Owen Rhoscomyl's Novels will be sent free on application.

Very considerable praise is being accorded to the first published work of Miss SOPHIE COLE. Its title is

RACHEL CHALFONT.

No recent Novel has depicted the emotional experience of a woman with such telling effect. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Just Published.—By CH. M. DOUGHTY. 4s. 6d. net.

ADAM CAST FORTH.

A Drama Founded on a Legend of Adam and Eve.

"Its spacious imaginings move in a world as austere in its lines as the desert itself. But like the desert they have grandeur, and at rare intervals a green oasis. In the latter scenes, especially, there come passages of a simple human beauty, like herbage round a spring in a bare land. We had expected magnificence from Mr. Doughty, but we do not know whether his moments of tenderness are not more impressive than his heroics. He has written a noble poem which will be welcomed by all who are worthy of an art that makes no concessions to popularity."—Spectator.

THE DAWN IN BRITAIN.

By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY, Author of "Travels in Arabia Deserta." 6 vols. crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net each.

"This strong, strange poem fulfils aspirations. . . . . This is no ordinary poem, such as minor bards, endowed with a cultivated taste and a select and recondite vocabulary, could write. It is work of an altogether higher order."—Times.

WANDERINGS IN ARABIA.

By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. With a Portrait and a Map, 2 vols. 16s. net.

"One of the greatest travel books in literature."—Spectator.

"In many respects the best book of travel ever written."—Punch.

"One of the great books of our own time."—Observer.

"Surely belongs to the classics."—Daily News.

Two New Volumes in the POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART.

WHISTLER. By BERNHARD SICHERT.

CRUIKSHANK. By W. H. CHESSON.

With many Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. net, Leather, 2s. 6d. net, each volume.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3, Henrietta Street, W.C.

J. M. DENT & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

FLOWER GROUPING IN ENGLISH, SCOTCH, AND IRISH GARDENS.

Text by ROSE KINGSLEY, "E.V.B.," the Hon. EMILY LAWLESS, WALTER P. WRIGHT, &c.

With Notes and 56 Illustrations in Colour by MARGARET WATERFIELD.

Square Crown 4to, £1 1s. net.

A Companion Volume to "Garden Colour," now in its Fourth Edition. [Prospectus post free.

"The charming volume, full of pleasing pictures and suggestive notes by Miss Margaret Waterfield and eleven contributors, cannot fail to be popular with the modern school of gardeners."—Saturday Review.

"A very handsome volume, finely illustrated with picturings of what has been done in many gardens of the United Kingdom. Miss Waterfield has had the help of able contributors, and has given garden-lovers not only a book, but an ideal, nay, many ideals."—Spectator.

A NEW VOLUME OF THE

"MEDIÆVAL TOWN" SERIES.

A Series of Literary Guide Books.

"A pretty series wherein art and history are deftly combined in the service of the intelligent tourist."—Westminster Gazette.

LATEST ADDITION

THE STORY OF MILAN.

By ELLA NOYES. Illustrated by DORA NOYES. Cloth, 4s. 6d. net; leather 5s. 6d. net.

THE TEMPLE BIOGRAPHIES.

LATEST VOLUME

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By HENRY BRYAN BINNS, Author of "A Life of Walt Whitman." With many Portraits and Other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"Mr. Binns is not a hero-worshipper if this means drawing a portrait without any shadows. His drawing is vigorous; he makes us see something of what the man really was."

Westminster Gazette.—"A careful and interesting study of President Lincoln. He tells us more than the ordinary biographer of the intimate personal life."

JUST PUBLISHED.

GRANADA: Present and Bygone

By A. F. CALVERT. 20 coloured, 8 half-tone Illustrations, and numerous line drawings in the text, by TREVOR HADDON, WALKER HODGSON, LOUIS WEIRTER, &c. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Granada is in many respects the most fascinating city in Spain. The Author endeavours to supply such archaeological and historical information as will enable readers to understand Granada and its associations.

SHORTLY.

A NEW VOLUME IN THE ENGLISH MEN OF SCIENCE SERIES.

LORD KELVIN.

An Account of his Scientific Life and Work.

By ANDREW GRAY, LL.D., F.R.S., &c. Cloth, gilt top, with Photogravure Frontispiece, 2s. 6d. net.

Professor Andrew Gray succeeded Lord Kelvin in the Chair of Natural Philosophy at Glasgow University, and was his intimate friend.

CITIES OF ITALY.

By ARTHUR SYMONS.

A Collection of Essays dealing with Rome, Venice, Naples, Ravenna, Pisa, &c.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Symons is always picturesque, and his book is a delightful record of pleasant hours in a sunny land."—Manchester Guardian.

A GUIDE TO THE PAINTINGS IN THE CHURCHES AND MINOR MUSEUMS OF FLORENCE.

By MAUD CRUTTWELL.

Small 8vo, numerous Reproductions of the Paintings, 3s. 6d. net.

VASARI ON TECHNIQUE.

Translated into English for the first time by L. S. MACLEHOSE. The Translation Revised and an Introduction and Commentary added by Prof. BALDWIN BROWN. With Coloured and other Illustrations, square demy 8vo, 15s. net.

[Prospectus post free.

Manchester Guardian.—"Miss MacLehose has succeeded admirably in her exceptionally difficult task of rendering into English equivalents the obscure and sometimes obsolete Italian technical terms, and Prof. Brown's copious and scholarly notes are of great interest and value."

Prospectuses of any or all the Series advertised above will be sent free on application.

J. M. DENT & Co., Aldine House, 29-30, Bedford Street, W.C.

At a simple function, when they were thanked for hospitality to a party of Reading College agricultural students, acknowledging, Lord Wantage said that Lady Wantage had shared in the welcome, and then added, "but we are always one in what we seek to do." Such revealed the nature of both.

A BUDGET OF NOVELS.

"An Engagement of Convenience," by Mr. Louis Zangwill (Brown, Langham & Co., 6s.) stands well out from the common ruck of novels by the mere fact of possessing those fundamental qualities which no novel ought to lack, but which, alas! most novels do. Mr. Zangwill's story is sincere, straightforward, true to the realities of human nature, and thoroughly well put together. It is not at all a work of genius, but is excellent reading, and, like all genuine pictures of life, it leaves our circle of comprehension widened. Not many men could have kept the portrait of Alice—that dear, unobtrusive, uninteresting woman—so precisely within its true limits. Such work stamps Mr. Louis Zangwill as one of the very small group of English-writing novelists who really know their business.

* * *

"Roses and Rue," by Horace Wyndham (Grant Richards, 6s.) records the amatory experiences during a twelvemonth of an exceedingly imprudent young lady. Miss Daphne Barrington, although by no means a social novice, had not acquired any perception of vulgarity in men and contrived to get herself into embarrassing situations with the most "impossible" persons. Finally she married the comparatively respectable man whom she had loved from the beginning, and whose good advice she had consistently rejected. The novel is confectionery, lightly and skilfully beaten up, and flavoured with that airy touch of bitterness which the modern palate is understood to prefer.

* * *

It is not very easy to formulate a judgment of Mrs. Percy Dearmer's new novel, "The Alien Sisters" (Smith & Elder, 6s.). One may safely begin by saying that it is too long, and in parts too wandering, and that it has not the light touch and charming humour of "Brownjohn's" and "The Orangery"; but these colourless observations scarcely touch the question why, being so full of thought, of feeling, of perception, and of intense sincerity, the book is not a remarkable success. There is probably some inner weakness of construction, not immediately perceptible, which might be revealed by detailed analysis. Be this as it may, the fact remains that "The Alien Sisters" is not, like the earlier efforts of its author, in a much easier field, a finished achievement. It may, nevertheless, indicate a stage of advance, and Mrs. Dearmer's next book may perhaps be as successful on the serious plane as "Brownjohn's" was on the playful one.

* * *

From a note on the wrapper of "The New Galatea" (Greening, 6s.) we learn that its author, Mr. Samuel Gordon, is known as "the Jewish Kipling," and that English is an acquired tongue to him. We may venture to guess that he has not acquired it in a very good school, since his writing entirely lacks delicacy, distinction, and exactitude. A man might easily know less English and yet write better English. He constantly conveys a slightly wrong shade of sentiment—uses, for instance, "answerable" when he means "responsible"—and makes his educated men employ the slang that belongs to a wholly different class. The very last lines of the book contain an imaginary art-criticism from the "Times" that concludes thus: "It is not so well known that the face of Galatea is a lifelike portrait of Mr. St. George's young and charming wife." Now the "Times," though it may recently have made regrettable errors, has not yet adopted the tone of society journalism, and those two adjectives are, happily, quite incredible. Mr. Gordon's story is that of a silly, self-opinionated, and rather unnatural young woman, whose misunderstandings of herself and her fellow-creatures are colossal. If she had any reality, we should want to beat her; fortunately, she has none.

* * *

The average novel reader who carries home Mr. Arthur Wellesley Kipling's volume, "The New Dominion: A Tale of To-morrow's Wars" (Francis Griffiths, 6s.), will be likely to find himself disappointed, for the work—though indisputably full of imagination—is rather a political tract than a novel. It is an American variant of the old "Battle of Dorking" theme, and its appearance in this country would seem to be slightly belated, since "to-morrow's wars" are described as beginning in 1907. We learn that in the late summer of that year King Edward was laid up by an accident, and that meanwhile not only had the United States and Japan gone to war, but Great Britain had all but become involved as an ally of Japan. On September 4th, however:—

> "At eleven o'clock the King, aroused by the noise and hubbub, demanded an explanation of what had happened, and forty minutes later he took upon himself the responsibility of steering his country through the crisis. Called upon to choose between Alliance and Race, his Majesty did not hesitate. Blood was thicker than water, and at three in the afternoon the famous message was sent by cable to Washington:—
>
> "'To His Excellency the President of the United States, Washington.
>
> "'Britain withdraws from her alliance with Japan. Let there be peace between your country and mine.'"

We admire the combination of politeness and prudence in this strange dispatch. Even at a moment of rapid action, more strictly characteristic of a kindred potentate, the King of England is represented as cabling every monosyllable in the titles of the President, but as saving eighteenpence to his nation by omitting the usual adjective before "Britain." As the "British final ultimatum" had been sent two days earlier, we should have expected to find some ill-conditioned member of Parliament complaining of the Royal interposition, but nothing of the kind is recorded. This brilliant flight of fancy occurs early in the proceedings, but, sad to say, it stands alone, the greater part of the book being about as interesting as a newspaper report. Finally:—

> "Great Britain and all her dependencies have entered into the great pact that binds the two Americas against the rest of the world. The Monroe doctrine has been extended until it overshadows all the fair territories under the British flag."
>
> "The Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack have flaunted victoriously together over a beaten foe."

"Flaunted?" It is to be hoped that if the two standards ever should be hoisted side by side above "a beaten foe," the Union Jack, at least, will have the good taste rather to "float" or to "wave" than to "flaunt."

* * *

It must be regretfully declared that Lady Troubridge's new novel, "A House of Cards" (Hutchinson, 6s.), is in no respect a good piece of work. The situation is hackneyed, the characters mere puppets, and the writing so hopelessly slipshod as to be at times barely intelligible. How many generations must still pass by before it comes to be understood that language is an instrument the use of which needs learning as that of a violin does? The writer who produces such a passage as the following—which appears on p. 91 of "A House of Cards"—is still at the earliest stages of the instruction book:—

> "Not only that, but to Meriel herself she had taken an intense, unformulated hatred, for Lady Hayden from the first had disliked and despised her, although she was quite incapable of fathoming her petty intrigues, still less of dreaming of the half-matured plan which had risen in Lady Carden's mind, and which now gave her the courage to cast her all upon a die, and to say words which, if he were more honourable, or more devoted, than she gave him credit for to his wife, would make him banish her from the house; but shallow as she was, Vera had been clever enough to read the unmistakable symptoms of a quarrel in Hayden's manner when he rejoined her."

* * *

Mr. Basil Tozer, the author of "A Daughter of Belial" (Rebman, 6s.), describes his work as "a sensational novel," and no reader will be found to question his classification. As literature, the book has no existence, but the headlong speed of the narrative and the cheerful prodigality of crime may render it readable to the simple-minded. One humorous touch it has: the dedication to Queenie "Gordon," formerly of Cavendish Square, W. Now "Queenie Gordon" is the name of the quite incredible she-villain who plays "the lead" in Mr. Tozer's melodrama. This artful method of insinuating that the ghoulish lady really existed, and that Mr. Tozer actually knew her, in so mundane a spot as Cavendish Square, is almost worthy of Defoe.

A HELPFUL BOOK FOR A THOUGHTFUL YOUNG MAN

THE LORD'S TEACHING CONCERNING HIS OWN PERSON.

By WAYLAND HOYT, D.D., LL.D., Professor in the Theological School of the Temple University, Philadelphia. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2*s. net*.

1. The Fact of Jesus.
2. The Question "Who then is this?"
3. The Answer of Jesus.
4. Some Conclusions.

A HELPFUL BOOK FOR AN UNSTEADY BELIEVER.

CAN WE TRUST THE BIBLE?

Chapters on Bible Criticism

By the Revs. FRANK BALLARD, D.D., HUBERT BROOKE, M.A., Canon R. B. GIRDLESTONE, M.A., GEORGE HANSON, D.D., MATTHEW LEITCH, D.D., and R. SINKER, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2*s.* 6*d.*

1. Is the Bible Inspired? 2. Discoveries Confirming the Old Testament. 3. Facts and 'Facts.' 4. Invulnerable Certainties. 5. Deuteronomy & the Higher Criticism. 6. Are the Gospels True?

A HELPFUL BOOK FOR THE EARNEST CHRISTIAN.

TAKING MEN ALIVE:

Studies in the Principles and Practice of Individual Soul-Winning.

By CHARLES G. TRUMBULL. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2*s.* 6*d.*

The Life of Faith says: "We do not wish to use exaggerated words, but the volume is a fascinating one."

The Scotsman says: "Its suggestions are marked by freshness and practical common-sense."

The Revival Times says: "It will be found of infinite help to all who wish to be used of God."

The Schoolmaster says: "It is a book to buy, to read, and to 'distribute by hundreds.'"

A HELPFUL BOOK ON THE OLD THEOLOGY.

SAVING TRUTHS OF THE GOSPEL

By the REV. F. S. WEBSTER, M.A. "Sundays of the Year" Series. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3*s.* 6*d.*

1. The Sacrifice of the death of Christ.
2. The Benefits of the Sacrifice.
3. Side-lights on the Sacrifice.
4. Words that Live.

A HELPFUL BOOK FOR ANY BIBLE STUDENT.

New Popular Edition. Demy 8vo, 3*s.* 6*d.*, 848 Pages, cloth gilt.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK

An Introduction to the Study of Sacred Scripture, by the late JOSEPH ANGUS, M.A., D.D. Thoroughly Revised and in part Rewritten by the late SAMUEL G. GREEN, D.D., Author of the "Handbook to the Grammar of the Greek Testament," "Handbook to Old Testament Hebrew," &c.

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"Dr. Angus' manual has grown remarkably during the past half-century, under the influence of modern scholarship and recent research; and in its new form should renew its undeniable hold upon the Bible student of to-day."

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, London, E.C.

5 HELPFUL BOOKS

JUST PUBLISHED BY THE

"R.T.S."

POPULAR NATURE BOOKS

FOR READERS OF ALL AGES.

ADVENTURES IN BIRD-LAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Home Life in Bird-Land," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," &c. With 90 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author, and 100 Pen-Sketches by E. RICHMOND PATON. Cloth gilt, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

BY MEADOW, GROVE, AND STREAM.

An Introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With 2 folded Coloured Plates. Photogravure Frontispiece and 171 Figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

BY-PATHS IN NATURE.

By FRANK STEVENS, Author of "Adventures in Pondland," &c. With 72 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

CREATURES OF THE SEA.

Being the Life Stories of some Sea Birds, Beasts, and Fishes. By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S. With 40 Full-page Illustrations by THEO. CARRERAS. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of Natural History," &c. With five Coloured Plates from Drawings, and 100 other Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

HIDDEN BEAUTIES OF NATURE.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S. With 95 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOME LIFE IN BIRD LAND

By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Woodland, Field, and Shore." With four Coloured Plates, and over 80 other Illustrations from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

THE HONEY BEE.

Its Nature, Homes, and Products. By W. H. HARRIS, B.A., B.Sc. With 82 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOW TO STUDY WILD FLOWERS.

By Rev. GEORGE HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., &c., Author of Plants of the Bible," New Edition, with 12 double-page Coloured Plates and 57 other Illustrations. Cloth gilt, with Coloured Pictures on cover, 2s. 6d.

NATURE, CURIOUS AND BEAUTIFUL.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S., Author of "Hidden Beauties of Nature," &c. With 69 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

NATURE: THROUGH MICROSCOPE AND CAMERA.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S., Author of "Nature, Curious, and Beautiful." With 65 Photo-Micrographs. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

PONDS AND ROCK POOLS.

With Hints on Collecting for, and the Management of, the Micro-Aquarium. By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

RAMBLES WITH NATURE STUDENTS.

By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN, Author of "Wild Nature Won by Kindness," &c. With 130 illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

THROUGH A POCKET LENS.

By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S., Author of "Ponds and Rock Pools," &c. Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

WOODLAND, FIELD, AND SHORE.

Wild Nature depicted with Pen and Camera. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Adventures in Bird-Land," &c. With Two Coloured Plates, and 101 Engravings of Birds, Animals, and Insects from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Published by THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,

LONDON: 4, BOUVERIE STREET, E.C., and Sold by all Booksellers

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

MY SCHOOL AND MY GOSPEL. By Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER. Fully illustrated. 4to, 21s. net.

"It is written with perfect ease and self-confidence, his writing is as readable as his painting is attractive. It is a piece of psychological demonstration that is extraordinarily refreshing and alluring by reason of the simplicity of its candour."—Graphic.

A HISTORY OF THE VOLUNTEER FORCES, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1860. By CECIL SEBAG-MONTEFIORE, Captain and Hon. Major 1st Midd. Royal Engineers (Volunteers), Captain Reserve of Officers. With 8 Illustrations in Colour and Photogravure. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"It is a wholly admirable piece of work, covering ground which has too long been left unexplored. The author has carefully sifted and incorporated whatever is valuable in a narrative which is exceedingly readable . . . of the deepest interest alike to students of military affairs and to the students of the general history of this country."—Daily Telegraph.

MEMOIRS OF MONSIEUR CLAUDE, Chief of Police under the Second Empire. Translated by K. P. WORMELEY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"A most readable and entertaining volume, which reads like fiction, but which is the most living of living truth."—Morning Post.

NEW WORLDS FOR OLD. By H. G. WELLS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Wells puts his case in a sane, practical manner, which should show the opponents of Socialism that they are not dealing with dreamers or fanatics, but have a reasoned view of society which they must confront with reason and with an alternative."—Daily News.

LETTERS FROM THE RAVEN. Correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn. Edited with an Introduction by MILTON BRONNER. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

"There is much in this little book which tells us intimately of the shy, sensitive, finely imaginative temperament of Lafcadio Hearn."—Daily News.

ROMANTIC TALES FROM THE PANJAB, with INDIAN NIGHT'S ENTERTAINMENT. Collected and Edited from Original Source by the Rev. CHARLES SWYNNERTON, F.S.A. New and Cheaper Edition. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

"Anyone who peruses Mr. Swynnerton's book will gain a far better idea of the tendencies, aspirations, and mental atmosphere of the inhabitants of these far-away regions than can be derived from tomes of philosophical disquisitions and anthropological or topographical reports. They are instinct with life, and narrated with a dramatic force worthy of all praise."—Daily Telegraph.

MORNINGS IN THE COLLEGE CHAPEL. Second Series. BRIEF AND INCISIVE ADDRESSES TO YOUNG MEN ON PERSONAL RELIGION. By FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY, D.D., Plummer Prof. of Christian Morals at Harvard. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Dr. CLIFFORD says:—"These short talks are full of the most precious thought, expressed in clear and strong English. They bear directly on the conscience and the practical life. A more nourishing morning book for young and old I do not know."

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED.

MORNINGS IN THE COLLEGE CHAPEL. First Series. 5s. net.
AFTERNOONS IN THE COLLEGE CHAPEL. 5s. net.

ICE-BOUND HEIGHTS OF THE MUSTAGH. Exploration and Climbing in the Himalaya. By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN, M.E. With 170 Illustrations. 8vo, 21s. net.

A volume of mountain-climbing, full of adventures. In the course of this expedition peaks of over 23,400 feet were conquered. The illustrations are numerous and of unusual merit.

THE SOUL OF SPAIN. By HAVELOCK ELLIS. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"The picture of a Spanish renaissance in the twentieth century. . . . It is a fascinating picture, and Mr. Ellis invests it with literary charm."—Yorkshire Post.

THE SYMBOLIST MOVEMENT IN LITERATURE. by ARTHUR SYMONS. New Edition. Uniform with previous Volumes. 5s. net.

LETTERS FROM INDIA. By ALFRED WILLIAM STRATTON. With Memoir by his Wife, ANNA BOOTH STRATTON, and an Introductory Note by Prof. BLOOMFIELD. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

NEW POEMS. By ST. JOHN LUCAS, Author of "The Vintage of Dreams," "The Absurd Repentance," &c. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"The poems comprised in this inspiriting volume are both versatile and vigorous. They are well felt, and expressed with a heartsome rhythm, like that of a marching tune, which is always well handled to answer the nimble movement of the verses' thought."—Scotsman.

BY THAMES AND COTSWOLD. Sketches of the Country. By the Rev. W. H. HUTTON. New Edition, with Illustrations by W. M. MEREDITH. 5s net. [Next week.

"We can heartily recommend this book; the author could not describe the country as he does if he did not thoroughly love it, and the reader, if we mistake not, will share his enthusiasm."—Literary World.

SHROPSHIRE, HEREFORD, AND MONMOUTH. By A. G. BRADLEY. With sketches of the country by W. M. MEREDITH. 5s. net. [Shortly.

GLAMORGAN AND GOWER. By A. G. BRADLEY. With sketches of the country by W. M. MEREDITH. And a Map. 3s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

THE FIRST BOOK OF FARMING. By CHARLES L. GOODRICH. Crown 8vo. With 86 Illustrations. 4s. 6d. net.

A handbook designed to stimulate and develop the intelligence, industry, and energy of the gardener and agriculturist. Mr. Goodrich has had many years of experience in teaching agriculture, and is to-day a practical and successful farmer.

THE BOOK: ITS HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT. By CYRIL DAVENPORT, V.D. Fully Illustrated. 6s. net.

"A fascinating subject is here treated by a recognised authority, who knows how to make use of his wealth of knowledge so as to be as interesting as he is informing."—Literary World.

THE STANNARIES. By GEORGE R. LEWIS. Extra crown 8vo, 6s. net.

An account of the English tin mining and miners from the Twelfth to the Eighteenth Centuries.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

MAROTZ - - - - - - - - John Ayscough.
Author of 'Admonition.'

"One of the most striking novels of the year. A book worth reading and to be read."—British Weekly.
"It is a literary masterpiece—not indeed as a novel, but as a series of vividly printed pictures of Sicilian life."—Observer.

THE DAUGHTER - - - - - Constance Smedley.
Author of 'Conflict.'

"'The Daughter' is a novel to buy, to read, to think about, and to pass on to many friends."—Westminster Gazette.

ROSE MACLEOD - - - - - - Alice Brown.
Author of 'The County Road.' [Next week.

THE ANCIENT LAW - - - - - Ellen Glasgow
Author of 'The Deliverance.'

PAULINE - - - - - - - - W. E. Norris.
Author of 'The Square Peg.' [Shortly.

London: A. CONSTABLE & CO., LTD., 10, Orange Street, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. III., No. 8.] SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1908. [PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	257
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Government and the Suffrage	259
Remitted to the Churches	261
A Moral from Hops	262
The Waste of a Continent	263
CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN IN THE ABBEY. By The Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley	264
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Background of Glory	265
Men against Sportsmen	266
The Millinery of Murder	267
The Cuckoo Habit	268
MUSIC:—
Three Opera Singers	269
THE DRAMA:—
Mr. Pinero's Study of Provincial Life. By H. W. M.	270
ART:—
Pictures at the Artistes Français	271
COMMUNICATIONS:—
The Largest of our National Estates. By Resident	272
POETRY:—
A Boy's Heart. By C. H. Bewley	272
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
Experiments on Animals. By Dr. Stephen Paget	273
The Justice of the Licensing Bill. By R. Mortimer Montgomery	274
The Educational Rapprochement. By F. E. Pollard	274
The Sugar Convention and Italy. By Anti-Convention	275
Pensions and the Sinking Fund. By T. A. Prest	276
The Riddle of the Bacchae. By G. Norwood	276
What does "Votes for Women" mean? By A. Grimshaw Haywood	276
Bombs in India. By A. St. John	277
The British Sunday and the Exhibition. By Edward Brown	277
The Problem of Medical Relief. By G. C. C.	277
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	278
Books to be Read	278
REVIEWS:—
Herbert Spencer	279
The Poets' Irish Question	280
The Anti-Indian Englishman	280
A Study in Scottish Character. By Hector Macpherson	281
A Veteran Reviewer	282
A Novel of Propaganda	284
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Search for the Western Sea	286
The Tragedy of Korea	286
Memoirs of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake	286
History of Ireland to the coming of Henry II.	286
Miniature Series of Painters	288
THE WEEK IN THE CITY	288

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Prime Minister made a sensational announcement to a deputation of sixty Liberal members who asked him on Wednesday for facilities for Mr. Stanger's Bill on Women's Suffrage. Mr. Asquith refused facilities, but gave a pledge of equal and momentous importance. He declared that, before closing the story of the present Parliament, the Government would propose a Suffrage Bill dealing with (a) the qualifying period, (b) plural voting, and (c) the "unreal categories" of voters. Speaking not for himself but for two-thirds of the Cabinet, and presumably also for the great majority of the party, the Prime Minister added that if Women's Suffrage were introduced as an amendment to such a Bill he should not oppose it. But he attached two conditions. The first was that any such change must be upon "democratic lines," which means, we suppose, that no amendment conferring the vote merely upon qualifications of property and residence would be accepted. The second condition was that Women's Suffrage must be shown to have "the overwhelming support of the women of the country." In one respect the mass of Liberal opinion, which founds itself on adult suffrage, will welcome the Prime Minister's declaration, but a certain difficulty of tactics suggests itself. Even if the Lords do not throw out the Bill altogether, as a measure requiring the previous assent of the constituencies, they will certainly refuse more than a limited property franchise. This the Government will not, of course, accept. It would seem, therefore, that we are to have a general election on adult suffrage. The extreme suffragists have not accepted Mr. Asquith's great concession, and a section of them endeavoured to besiege his house in Downing Street, and were arrested and bound over to keep the peace.

* * *

THE country will hear with mixed feelings that the King will at Whitsuntide pay a State visit to the Czar at Reval, in the Gulf of Finland. He is to be accompanied by Sir Charles Hardinge, the Permanent Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, an official who, very strangely, as it seems to us, now replaces a Minister of the Crown during formal interviews between the Sovereign and foreign monarchs. The King and the Czar are closely connected by blood and marriage, and no sensible Englishman desires to see Great Britain and Russia on bad terms with each other. But the mere fact that the King's visit is confined to a series of sea courtesies, and that a State visit to St. Petersburg is impossible, exhibits the true relationship between the Czar and his people. At no period of the reform movement in Russia has a more pitiless system of oppression, enforced by constant executions, wholesale exile, and the destruction of private rights and liberties by court martials and administrative order, existed. Had this been the state of Russia at almost any period of the late Queen's reign, public opinion would not have tolerated a meeting between the Czar and the Monarch of these realms. It is singular that we are so much less sensitive in the matter of national liberty to-day.

* * *

THE Second Reading of the Education Bill was carried on Wednesday by 370 to 205 votes, a majority of 165. The rise in the strength of the Opposition was due to the Irish Nationalists, sixty-four of whom voted against the Bill; three Liberals were also hostile, and three Labor members and a few Ministerialists abstained. The voting, however, like the debate, was unreal, the discussion showing that opinion on both sides of the House, though fluid, tends steadily to a settlement. This view was notably expressed by moderate Tories and Churchmen of the type of Sir John Kennaway and Colonel Williams. On the other hand, the Lancashire Tories, doubtless with direct encouragement from Mr. Balfour, whose demeanour and speech were equally disturbing to hopes of peace, ridiculed the notion of a compromise, Mr. Joynson Hicks, fresh from North-West Manchester, even declaring that the Unionist Party would wait "till they could dictate terms to the other side," i.e., through the rejection of the Bill by the Lords. Mr. Balfour's contribution on Wednesday was practically in this vein. He insisted that no "conciliatory picture" could be painted on the canvas presented by the Bill, which "despoiled" and "robbed" the trustees and owners of the Church schools. But he admitted that in substance there was no difference between the two sides, and that, if Churchmen and Nonconformists could work together in country parishes, they might make peace in Parliament, on the basis apparently of giving "more power" to parents in the choice of religious instruction.

* * *

THE Ministerial speeches were all conciliatory, as were those of representative Nonconformists like Sir

George White, Mr. Perks, and Mr. Ellis Griffiths. The Bill was formally put in charge of Mr. McKenna, who, however, offered a less specific defence of its plan and structure than Mr. Runciman. Mr. Asquith's line was to emphasise the general desire for peace, which he declared not twenty members of the House would oppose. His chief stress was laid on the Nonconformist grievance in the single-school areas, where, as he said, in thousands of parishes in which the school was kept up by rates and taxes, Nonconformist pupils could not teach, and Nonconformist children must choose between sectarian instruction and no religious instruction at all. He thought the Churches were drawing together, and grave would be the responsibility of politicians who stood between the wishes of the people and the children's interests—a peroration plainly aimed at Mr. Balfour.

* * *

General Willcocks has forced the passes leading into the Mohmand country. The first brigade got through the Nahakki Pass without resistance, but on Saturday one of its advanced posts at Darwazagai was attacked, and in the course of a gallant fight, which has secured special praise from the Indian Government, lost nine killed and twenty-three wounded. The second brigade had a similar experience in the Khapak Pass on Monday, and suffered twenty-seven casualties; the tribesmen here charged sword in hand with a dash not usually credited to the Mohmands. Some towers have been destroyed, but the troops have suffered severely from the heat, the vile roads, the bad water supply, and the continued sniping at night, and cholera is still raging at the base. It is not known how much longer the operations will last or what fruit they will bear, and Parliament is still cultivating its passion for ignorance of Indian affairs generally, and frontier affairs in particular.

* * *

The two sides of the Protectionist movement—preferences with food taxes and the bolstering up of temporarily depressed home industries—have both been illustrated during the week. On Saturday a large demonstration of hop-growers and hop-pickers, organised and paid for, it is said, by Tariff Reformers, met in Trafalgar Square to demand a duty of 40s. a cwt. on foreign hops, or about 90 per cent. of the value of the raw material. The statement that 40,000 acres of hops have been "grubbed" owing to "unfair foreign competition," has been completely falsified by the production of the statistics of foreign importations, which show that the highest figures—those of 1881-5—have never been approached at any later period. In the House of Lords, an attempt was made by the Duke of Marlborough to revive the dying interest in preferences. The speeches showed lamentable weakness on the part of the Free Trade peers, Lord St. Aldwyn, as usual, assenting to a policy which he showed in argument to be futile or perilous to our foreign trade, and Lord Curzon practically abandoning Free Trade for India. No consistent position was revealed, Lord Milner, as an out-and-out Protectionist, admitting that the Colonies were likely to remain devoted to Protection, and therefore to their policy of excluding British goods. Of the methods of this policy Lord Cromer made a scathing and very powerful exposure. The desire to curtail the commercial freedom of the Colonies was shown in the criticism of the Franco-Canadian Treaty, which, as Lord Crewe said, did no harm to us, and was entirely consistent with Canadian rights.

The Tangier correspondent of the "Times" admits that Abdul Aziz's game is up. Abdul Aziz put the last of his money, arms, and men into an expedition to Marrakesh, which is hemmed in, and must choose between surrender or enlistment under Mulai Hafid. Mulai Hafid entered Mekinez a week ago, and is probably already in Fez. He now rules the North as well as the South, while Abdul Aziz has to shelter behind French guns. France's recent Morocco policy is bankrupt, and it is reported in the French Press that M. Clemenceau has at length faced the facts, and decided to abandon military adventure and withdraw all troops except a few temporary garrisons. The policy of a return to peaceful penetration is advocated in opposition to General Lyautey by M. Regnault, who shared with the General the special mission to Casablanca. It embraces neutrality in the dynastic struggle and the recognition of the victor, whoever he be. It will be hard for M. Clemenceau to swallow the bitter pill of acknowledging Mulai Hafid as Sultan, but Germany will probably do so before long. His envoys have already been received "unofficially" in Berlin.

* * *

Mr. Whiteley, the Chief Ministerial Whip, is about to resign his seat and to become a peer. The ground of his retirement is ill-health. The Government appear to us to be making too many new peers, though, if Mr. Whiteley regards a peerage as a suitable reward for energetic, though not especially tactful, service in the Commons and for great driving power with the majority, the party must be content. His successor is Mr. J. A. Pease, for many years the second Whip, and we are glad to see that Mr. Whitley succeeds to a formal official position. Mr. Pease is a clever and persuasive Whip, and few men in the House of Commons know it better. But the Whips' office is still something to seek as a representation of Radical sentiment.

* * *

Mr. Asquith has made a good beginning with his clerical patronage. The new Dean of Peterborough is Mr. Arnold Page, a Balliol man, associated in his clerical work with two great Broad Churchmen, Dr. Fremantle and the Rev. William Rogers, and belonging distinctly to the liberal school of thought and action which successive Prime Ministers, Liberal and Conservative, have so long neglected.

* * *

Mr. Justice Longley, a Canadian Judge, varied the amiable platitudes at a Canadian dinner in New York last Thursday by saying that though Canada had, and would always have, the most friendly sentiments towards England she would not for ever be content to remain in the Empire. The feeling for national independence would grow and would lead to an amicable severance, and he anticipated that a treaty of alliance would replace the existing relations. Mr. Bryce, who was present, naturally protested against this doctrine, but it is hardly possible to deny the strong hold it has not only in Canada but in Australia.

* * *

A powerful demonstration in favor of a national theatre, as a commemoration of Shakespeare, was held in the Lyceum theatre on Tuesday afternoon, Lord Lytton in the chair. The Chairman was able to read a letter from Lord Plymouth, announcing that the Memorial Committee were willing to meet the counter movement, and it has been agreed that the two bodies shall meet. We hope that no compromise will be offered which interferes with the vital object of the Lyceum demonstration, the founding of a National or Standard Theatre of Dramatic Art. Mr. Alfred Lyttelton spoke strongly in its favor, declaring that the present state of the theatre was chaotic and ineffective, an indictment which Mr. Steadman supported from the point of view of the workmen, who, he said, greatly preferred the old "stock" companies to the modern system of rule by actor-managers. The movement for a Shakespeare memorial in Portland Place is practically dead.

* * *

We understand that the Home Secretary will introduce on Monday a Bill of great importance for the Prevention of Crime. It will deal with the whole subject of prison treatment and the reformation of offenders, and will introduce some new and far-reaching principles, including, we believe, a form of the indeterminate sentence.

* * *

The complete official results of the French municipal elections (writes our Paris correspondent) were published only last Saturday. There are, not including the Seine, 36,150 communes. The Unified Socialists have the majority in 164, the Independent Socialists in 148, the Radicals and Socialist-Radicals in 8,743, the other groups of the Left in 10,775, the Centre in 5,588, the Clericals and Nationalists in 9,025; in the remaining 1,707 communes the color of the majority is indefinite. The various groups of the Left have a net gain of 1,977 communes (816 from the Centre and 1,161 from the reactionaries), of which about two-thirds are gained by the Radicals and Socialist-Radicals. It will be seen from these figures that there is no reaction against Radicalism. The vast majority of the 9,025 reactionary communes are small villages, and, whereas the moderate groups of the Left hold more communes in the country as a whole than the Radicals, the latter preponderate in the towns, and their total vote is very much larger. The reactionaries hold only thirty-three of the 359 chefs-lieux of departments and arrondissements, and only 435 of the 2,320 chefs-lieux of cantons—a small net loss in each case. The clerical losses in the districts which have always been their strongholds—Brittany and the West generally—are very striking. Among the most important are the towns of Caen, Nantes (the only one of the fifteen great towns where the clericals had a majority at the last general election), Rennes, and Vannes. The Nationalists gained two seats in Paris on account of Socialist abstentions at the second ballot. On the Paris Council, as before, the Radicals hold the balance between the two Socialist groups on the one hand and the Centre and Right on the other.

* * *

The Franco-British Exhibition at Shepherd's Bush will, we hope and believe, in time be a beautiful show. The Mohammedan Indian architecture looks well by night, the gardens will be large, and there is plenty of space for the exhibits. But at present there is little else but space. Except one or two side-shows, chiefly unconnected with England or France, there is nothing much to see, and unless people pay an extra sixpence for the Indian village or float on the pond in a kind of water omnibus, they find no particular entertainment for their shilling. It is true they can listen to a band and buy refreshments, but the rest of the time they will be searching in vain through vasty halls of emptiness, or stumbling over ground like the shore at low tide. We are glad to know that the preparations are going on "with feverish haste," but we regret that the fever of haste did not come on before so many French people arrived to honor the "entente," and that such crowds were admitted only for disappointment.

Politics and Affairs.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE SUFFRAGE.

The kaleidoscope of politics has given us during the week a completely new view of the immediate future. The Prime Minister, who has hitherto been regarded as one of the most pronounced opponents of women's suffrage, announced on Wednesday his readiness to admit clauses for the enfranchisement of women on wide democratic lines in a Government measure. It is difficult to realise—we can hardly avoid the doubt whether Mr. Asquith himself has fully realised—the far-reaching importance of this change of attitude, and all its probable reactions on the movement of affairs. The ordinary Liberal may be pardoned a sense of bewilderment when he contemplates the great variety of topics that fill the theatre of political discussion under the present Administration, and the remarkable rapidity with which they follow one another across the stage. From education to the Lords, from the Lords to the land, from the land to temperance, from temperance to old-age pensions, from pensions to women's suffrage—we pass from question to question, each raising fierce and most complex controversies, each hazarding vital issues, each so full of difficulty that a Government might stand or fall by it alone; above all, each so puzzling and obscure to the general public as to require months of separate attention before it is properly understood. Before any one of these questions is well on the way, the switch is turned, the kaleidoscope has moved, and another is before us. Really, we can hardly wonder if a public much immersed in its own affairs gives a confused and uncertain voice on each succeeding problem. At any rate, so it is, and we have to remember that the practical interpretation of confusion and uncertainty in politics is a negative. We could wish that the Government were sufficiently alive to this danger to their future.

As to the recent announcement, it is, of course, true that Mr. Asquith's personal opinion is unchanged. It is true that the suffrage, as he tells us, will not be proposed by the Government nor backed in the first instance by their authority. Nevertheless, it is easy to see that if the voting strength which it commands in the Commons remains unimpaired, and if it be free for the friends of the measure to introduce it into a Government Reform Bill, it will, as a result, be incorporated in that Bill in the Committee stage, and by the time that the Bill has received its third reading, women's franchise will form the pith of a Government measure, and will be part and parcel of the policy of the Liberal Party.

We need not for the moment examine very deeply into the causes of this momentous departure. It will be claimed as a triumph by both sections of political women, by the moderates, who will argue, with some reason, that it is their deputation to which Mr. Asquith has given way, that it is the value of the electoral work of Liberal women which turned the scale in his mind, and by the extremists, who will contend that he has yielded to the pressure exercised at bye-elections what years of peaceful persuasion could not achieve. Far more important to the convinced suffragist, whose real object is not to find excuses for attacking a Liberal Administration, but to secure political rights for women, is to weigh carefully the forces which will ultimately determine the success or failure of the promised Bill. She will have to bear in mind that women's suffrage is to be brought forward, not as an independent measure, but as part of a general abolition of electoral anomalies and disabilities affecting both sexes. For that mode of treatment we have already argued with some fulness in these columns. We need not repeat the reasons which we then advanced in detail, but we may remark that the line adopted by Mr. Asquith is a signal justification of those friends of women's suffrage who have steadfastly persisted that, when given, it should be on thoroughly democratic lines. Advocates of adult suffrage have for two years and more been denounced as covert enemies of the women's movement. They were accused of the Machiavellian design of admitting an unanswerable argument in the abstract and rendering it null and void by drawing a practical conclusion which no one would accept. They were told that to talk of adult suffrage or anything like it was to postpone the enfranchisement of women till the Blue Moon. In vain they pleaded that a democratic House of Commons would never sanction a limited franchise. They were emphatically assured that they did not mean what they said, and that, whether they did or did not, women would not listen to them. The event, so far, has vindicated their sincerity and justified their insight. Women's suffrage is to be accepted by the Government only as part of a general extension of popular government, and only on the essential condition that it is to be given on broad democratic lines. If the Lords propose a property franchise, it will be rejected.

The promise, of course, will not satisfy the Women's Social and Political Union, who, we may shrewdly suspect, would find some excuse for continuing their agitation, whatever the present Government might promise or perform, and who probably desire at least the enfranchisement only of a small propertied class. But the great mass of thoughtful women will take a very different view of the position. They will recognise that the battle is only half won. They have first to secure that the members who have been willing to vote for their Bills as long as the question was of the academic rank will be found in their places with equal assiduity when it is part of a reform which is seriously intended to become law. They have, what is still more essential, to consider what prospects the Bill will have of passing the ordeal of the House of Lords. As part of a Government Bill, and that a Bill for strengthening and widening the popular element in the Constitution, the suffrage will not come before the Peers precisely in the odour of what they take for sanctity. They will mutilate or reject it if they dare, and they will dare unless they are convinced that public opinion is so strongly set upon the Bill that its rejection would endanger their own position. More than ever, then, it becomes true that the fate of women's suffrage in the near future depends on the impression made by women in public life. Here, again, Mr. Asquith put his finger on a fundamental point. He showed that in the ordeal which awaits it the suffrage can only survive if it has the effective force of opinion, in particular the opinion of women, at its back. Now, as a force operating on opinion, the militant section has had its effect. It has shown that to many women, especially to many of the working class, the question is one of real and vital interest. This was substantially a "new fact." But it is a new fact no longer, and it may safely be said that, during the last twelve months, for one man or woman that has been attracted to the movement by the tactics of street sham-fights, three have been turned away. In particular among Liberals, on whose attitude, when it comes to a tussle on the point, everything will depend, the sense of absurdity has deepened into resentment as they have realised that there are women to whom in their fanaticism no cause is sacred. Fortunately for the movement, Liberals are reasonable enough to remember that a band of fanatics are not to be taken as fair representatives of a sex, and they retain the opinion that the average woman, like the average man, can in general be trusted to look at public questions on all sides, and not close her eyes systematically to every issue but one. But we would suggest to the suffragists that it becomes at times a little difficult, particularly as the fortunes of Liberalism become critical, to preserve this equable frame of mind. We would urge that the more they do in the next two years to give colour to the old contention that women are constitutionally unfit for public affairs, the more difficult it will be to secure the sustained energy and enthusiasm which will be necessary to force their Bill through the obstacles that beset all Liberal legislation. Of Liberals in turn it may very fairly be asked that they should swallow their very natural exasperation at the state of mind which in the pursuit of victory recks nothing of temperance, of education, or of social reform. They will do well to bear in mind the old contention of Mill that the suffrage is itself the greatest political educator, and to consider whether women's influence outside the recognised political system may not have injurious effects which responsibility would largely mitigate.

But there is a deeper consideration than this. Liberalism is rooted in democratic principle. That principle may be false. It may be that in following it for three generations we have been following a wrong track. Yet, notwithstanding all disappointments and disillusionments, a survey of the modern world gives no hope of improvement from any alternative system. But if the democratic principle be the best foundation of Government yet devised, how are we to escape from its logical application? What argument has all this controversy thrown up to show that the disqualification of sex is fundamentally unlike the old disqualifications of class against which Liberals fought and won? If there be one, we may say, in Hume's phrase, that we desire it to be produced. If there be none, we may fairly ask our friends to face the practical conclusion.

REMITTED TO THE CHURCHES.

THE Prime Minister suggested in closing the debate on the second reading of the Education Bill that, if the House of Commons were sitting not in the Palace of Westminster but in the Palace of Truth, there would be revealed an almost universal desire for a settlement of the educational controversy. We are afraid that if such a revelation took place, it might disclose something more or less than a passion for peace. It might show Mr. Balfour, for example, calculating with some closeness the effect of forcing the educational struggle once again on to the constituencies, and thereby achieving the double purpose of winning Lancashire, with its Anglican and Catholic vote, for Toryism, and depriving the Protectionists of the argument that a victory for the Opposition had been won on Tariff Reform, and on Tariff Reform alone. It might reveal the Protectionists, who, under Mr. Austen Chamberlain's lead, seemed to dwell apart, both in body and in mind, from their Balfourian colleagues, open to a precisely opposite set of calculations. It would conceivably exhibit the High Anglicans who follow Lord Robert Cecil anxious to banish Cowper-Templeism, and in face of that great gain to the Catholic view, prepared to chance the secular solution. And, on the other hand, it would assuredly display the moderate Churchmen keenly concerned to preserve undenominationalism if only as a formal check in their own schools and in the national institutions on the Catholic movement. Above all, this same disconcerting Mirror of Truth, if it were held up impartially among all sections and quarters of the House, would disclose the rather elementary fact that the average politician on both sides was thinking more of votes and seats and the general election than of religion or educational efficiency.

Here, therefore, would seem to be somewhat unpromising ground for a settlement. And there are other reasons for fearing that we must not be too sanguine. The Bill whose second reading was carried on Wednesday is not a popular measure, and the main reason for its unpopularity is the very concession to denominationalism which Mr. Balfour now denounces. No one likes contracting out. In London it would certainly dislocate the educational machinery. It seems to punish the children for the fault of the parents, or, rather, of the politicians and the theologians. It moves further away from the national solution than did the Bill of 1906. Such a measure, even if it passed intact through the House of Commons, would hardly go to the Lords with strength enough to ensure it acceptance. If its predecessor, backed by a united Ministerial party, including the Irish, was wrecked without thought or care for the consequences, what can be the fate of a less powerfully supported plan? It is possible that if London were excluded, and the terms slightly raised, a settlement might be nearly arrived at. But there must be some limit to the demands on the Treasury, and to the extent to which the Churches, Roman and Anglican, are to feed their schools from the national resources, and at the same time to cut themselves loose from the State machinery of control. And if the Bill is abandoned, what is the alternative? Where is the material of compromise? It seems to us that the answer to that question is fairly simple.

In the first place, time is running on, and the heads of the Anglican Church, who did nothing to avert the wreck of Mr. Birrell's Bill, seem at last conscious of the scandal of an open and continuous war on the schools question with Nonconformity, with the Labor Party, and with great masses of the population, Christian and non-Christian. They recognise that the Act of 1902 did not settle the question, a conclusion which Mr. Balfour himself does not rebut. And they must see their own special responsibility for the maintenance of a quarrel which has nothing to do with the true educational problem. They put forward the parents. But we and they know that the mass of English parents concern themselves little about the niceties of dogmatic teaching. These are mysteries, which the average man leaves to his spiritual guides, when he has any. It is the neo-Anglican theology, basing itself on a mystic sacramentalism, that has largely caused the set against "simple Bible teaching." The Anglican Church, therefore, blocks the way, and not only on religious grounds. It took too much from the Act of 1902. It fixed all its schools on the rates, but gave those ratepayers who did not agree with it little power, and no relief from the unfair situation in the single-school districts, where Nonconformist parents have to submit to special Church teaching and the general clerical control of the children. The Church, in a word, owes something, in fairness and honesty, to the nation and to its Nonconformist brethren, and the debt must be paid.

And, on the other hand, Nonconformists have an equal reason for desiring compromise. Their formula, "simple Bible teaching," is in many respects an admirable one. Christianity should surely be simple, if anything, and it is certainly founded on the Bible. But the phrase, in its accepted meaning, has been subject to a process of attrition. The idea of the whole Bible as "equi-pollent," to use Matthew Arnold's phrase, does not stand where it did. A more human, a more truly religious, spirit is constantly being applied to it. And, on the other hand, the Anglican tells you that that is not his conception of the interpreting, authoritative force in Christianity. It is useless to argue with him; for a Liberal, concerned with toleration for all forms of creed, it is rather difficult to argue with him, and to say, in spite of the High Anglican affirmation to the contrary, that "Cowper-Templeism" does give the essence, the spirit and temper, of the Christian religion. In other words, the argument for "facilities," such as Mr. Birrell's lamented measure provided, is more cogent than it was two years ago. There is a second point about the Nonconformist case as it stands to-day. It is strong, indeed unanswerable, in the single-school districts. It is far weaker in the areas where the alternative school exists. It is true that passive resistance has been extended so as to cover the whole question of rate-aid to voluntary schools wherever given. But as the wise speeches of Sir George White and Mr. Perks showed, the eyes of the Nonconformists are fixed on essentials, not on accidents, and they may soon be asked to accept a settlement dealing only with the districts where their grievance is really poignant. This is not exactly a case in which they are confronted merely with the resistance of the House of Lords. The trouble arises that England itself is divided into two camps of almost equal strength, and that neither section, whether it is temporarily in power or not, can force an extreme solution on the other.

The hope of educational peace, therefore, depends more on the statesmanship of the Churches than of the politicians. We think that Anglicans deceive themselves if they think that they have the nation behind them in any passionate adherence to religious teaching in the national schools at the cost of the State. Such an idea is quite against logic, against the old Nonconformist principle, against the tendencies of democracy. In the minds of the people, who, though deeply tinged with Christian ideas, as all modern peoples are, are not in great masses dogmatically Christian at all, the Churches are known by their works rather than by their faith, by their output of human goodness and charity. They have not impressed this rather sceptical, if good-natured, public opinion during the struggles of the last six years. But they have an opportunity of redeeming their character now that the Government have practically remitted to them the task of restoring peace where they have made war.

A MORAL FROM HOPS.

At Hastings in the Spring of 1892 Lord Salisbury discovered, in discussing the taxation of imports, that "there is a good deal to be said for hops," and the hop-growers in the audience cheered. But when a couple of years later (at Trowbridge) the same statesman was accused of proposing a duty upon corn, he said "I beg to nail that lie to the counter before it is uttered. I know that Free Trade is, and must be, the policy of this country. I know that Protection is dead and cannot be revived." Lord Salisbury never explained the inconsistency. But certain it is that hops and hop-growing have always succeeded in being regarded as privileged pursuits, deserving to be exempt from the ordinary rules of agriculture and commerce, and to receive special favour from the State. We can only explain it by the supposition that the glamour of beer attaches to the raw material. For years the malt duty was the stock-in-trade grievance of the old Tory Party. When in Opposition they always harped on the cruelty of the impost, and when in office the revenue was so convenient that they always forgot to repeal it; until at last, greatly to the disgust of the champions of agriculture, the malt duty was repealed, not by the farmer's friends but by Mr. Gladstone. What perplexes the ordinary citizen and what he wants to know at the present moment is why the Tariff Reform League has suddenly ordered its whole force of hired oratory to advocate a heavy import duty upon what is not merely a raw material of an industry, but a raw material of the industry, of the trade, par excellence, which all patriots delight to honor, cherish, and protect. That the hop agitation and the hop demonstration have been got up by the Tariff Reform League and heavily subsidised there appears to be no doubt. And it is equally certain that Tariff Reform as expounded by Mr. Balfour would leave raw materials free. A few weeks ago, at a dinner, when a well-known Parliamentary writer thanked him for providing so much raw material for the craft, Mr. Balfour said he was glad to find himself classed as raw material because it was the one thing they had all agreed not to tax. We are, therefore, entitled to ask whether Tariff Reformers have thrown over Mr. Balfour and whether, as they wish to protect the English hop-grower against American and Continental hops, raising the home price by means of a duty on all imported hops, they are equally prepared to protect the English wool-grower against the wool-grower of Australia, South Africa, and Argentina. And will they protect our farmers against the competition of foreign hides? The special interest of the question lies, of course, in this, that by protecting English hops, English wool, and English hides against the foreigner you are raising the cost of all the beer, cloth, and leather manufactured in England, so that the brewer, the woollen manufacturer, and the boot maker will all be compelled to raise the price of their products and will certainly suffer in their competition with the foreigner in neutral markets.

The hop demonstration should, therefore, serve as an object lesson in the scope and consequences of Protection. Nothing shows more clearly than this how insidious is the poison, and how impossible it is for the patient who begins with small doses to avoid taking larger and larger ones. The Tariff Reformers started with a few specialities. They proposed to save a few ruined industries at home and to encourage a few Colonial imports. They find now that the only practical thing for agitators to do is to promise Protection to everybody. If Mr. Amery had represented Wolverhampton in a Protectionist Parliament, he would have lobbied for all the Wolverhampton interests. The locksmiths of Wolverhampton would have been fostered at the cost of all who want to buy locks. Another member's business would have been to get a protective duty on the steel or other metal from which the locks are made, and so ad infinitum. The idea of exempting food or raw material is absurd, for the whole scheme of Protection in a representative democracy is that the representative should lobby and threaten and cajole in order to rig the tariff in the interests of his constituents. If the most active section of his constituents is chiefly interested in raising the price of a food or raw material, or perhaps that of an article like hops, which are possibly food and raw material, then the function of the M.P. is as plain as a pikestaff. He has simply to join in the scrimmage and snatch as big a tax as he can lay hands on. If his tax is less than that gained by another for a neighbouring constituency, he will lose the next election.

The hop agitation therefore (which seems to have been damped by the brewers) is serving a very useful purpose. It shows that Tariff Reformers, even where they are trying to persuade the country to take a small dose, find themselves gradually drawn further and further, until at last they suddenly appear as undisguised Protectionists of everything, from the most primitive agricultural products to the most finished forms of manufactured articles. All science has departed, and the business of the League has descended until it has become the humblest job. But there is another side to this hop-growers' grievance which deserves a little consideration, and that is the audacious hypothesis of its champions, who tell us that our hop-grower is being ruined by the wicked foreign hop-grower. The foreign hop-grower, and especially the hop-grower of the United States, is supposed to be flourishing at the expense of Kent, Sussex, and Worcestershire. It may be news to some people that the American hop industry is in a worse plight than ours. The "Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin" of New York, one of the most reliable and impartial journals in existence, estimates that the hop acreage in New York State will be reduced this year by from 8 to 10 per cent., that of Oregon by 10 per cent., and that of Washington by 30 to 40 per cent. But, adds our New York contemporary, "well-informed men do not hesitate to say that this reduction will not help toward placing the industry on a paying basis. It is stated by men whose ideas are by no means regarded as radical, that a 50 per cent. reduction would be none too much." An informant of the journal put the matter as follows: "There is no question but what the industry is in a bad way. Unless the grower goes ahead, regardless of others, and reduces his acreage to the lowest possible point, there are more hard times ahead." Another dealer called attention to the decreased consumption of beer as a result of the prohibition movement, and the consequent decrease in the consumption of hops by brewers. The "New York Journal" continues:—

> "It is perfectly clear that the industry is suffering from over-production, and we are asked to maintain this over-production by imposing a protective duty."

But the most curious touch of all is the peculiar conduct of a large firm which had exported hops to England. No clear reason could be given as to why this firm should actually have bought hops (as it did for a time) above the market price in order to ship them to England. On inquiry by our contemporary in New York, the mystery was solved as follows. The firm had been taken in by the press telegrams announcing the marvellous progress of Tariff Reform in England and the imminent breakdown of the Free Trade Ministry. It had thence concluded that, in a very short time, a heavy duty would be imposed on hops. Accordingly, hops were shipped to England, and stored there "in the hope that England will put a duty on imported hops, which would raise their value to a point sufficient to enable the owner to clear a handsome profit." What a deliciously ironical situation! The hop-growers have been ruined by their saviours. The dump was in anticipation of the tariff.

So much has been written about hops in the last week or two, and so many statistics have been sown over the field of argument, that we will only refer to one further obstacle that lies in the way of a hop tariff. It was Adam Smith, we think, who first pointed out that if a protective tariff is good for an Empire, it must be good for a kingdom, a county, or a town. And, as a matter of fact, history shows that the desire for local protection is very strong, and has often found expression in the most recondite forms. In the hop industry, local competition is far more terrible than that of the foreigner, because it is the habit of brewers, we understand, to mix a certain proportion of English hops with imported hops. Hence the demand of the brewers is not for the cheapest hops, but for the cheapest English hops. The competition is between the hops of Kent, Sussex, Worcestershire, and Hereford. In Mr. Belloc's amusing skit of the proceedings of the Tariff Reform Commission, a Kentish yokel is dragged before the court, over which Mr. Joseph Chamberlain presides, in order to give evidence against foreign hops. The witness, however, is under the impression that the Sussex men are foreigners, and, as they are the only competitors who have troubled him, he has to be carried out of the hall, struggling and crying out loudly against "them Sussex whops." We might, of course, carry the illustration into many other trades. It is not the competition of France or Germany that has closed so many woollen mills in the West of England during the last fifty years, but the competition of the West Riding of Yorkshire and of Scotland. But enough, perhaps, has been said to show that the hop agitation is a mirror in which many economic and moral lessons are reflected.

THE WASTE OF A CONTINENT.

A NEW kind of patriotism is developing in the United States to grapple with a new crisis, the third and greatest in American history. The War of Independence and the Civil War were both events of the first order. But in the evolution of that vast and unique democracy overseas it may well prove that their effects will ultimately be less momentous than the success or failure of the American people in solving the novel economic problem that now confronts them. That problem involves an issue no less gigantic than that of the gradual exhaustion or the gradual conservation of the natural resources of the country, their wasteful exploitation by private speculators or their protection and development in the interests and for the use of all the people. Many phases of Mr. Roosevelt's leadership will pass away and be forgotten. But the stand he has taken on a question which, as he has said, involves the final basis of national power and perpetuity, is likely to prove permanently productive. In this view the great conference of all the Governors of the Union which was held in Washington last week to discuss the ways and means of a policy of national economic self-defence will probably come to be looked back upon as the most important event in his Presidency. It was an essay in practical Socialism of a very far-reaching character. It symbolised the awakening of a new American consciousness, the focussing of the many impulses that are slowly pushing the American people in matters of economics as well as of Constitutional interpretation and of social and political development away from the disorder and waste of the old order. One discerns those impulses at work in many directions. The powers of the Federal Government are constantly being increased by the rulings of the Supreme Court that cannot, even if it would, evade the spirit of the age. The powers of the States are proportionately diminishing. In almost all matters that concern the rights and interests of labor, in the employment of women and children, in Factory Acts and Employers' Liability Acts, the United States lags some fifty years behind England. But she is arousing herself to her deficiencies; she is endeavouring, amid a hundred obstacles where we in Great Britain have only one, to make up the leeway; and every step she takes implies a progressive increase in the authority of the community over its individual members. At the same time, in a wider sphere, we see the central Government experimenting with a variety of plans for the more effective assertion of its control over the railways and the great industrial corporations.

It was inevitable that this new conception of what the national interests ought to possess and of what private interests ought to be made to surrender, should sooner or later extend to the problem of the natural resources of the country. In no department has the myopia of little men with little minds worked greater havoc. America is not fundamentally different in this respect from other countries. Anyone who will study the report of the recent Committee on Irish forestry will agree that we, at any rate, have no right to cast a stone at America. But the processes which have practically stripped Ireland of trees are operative in the United States over a far wider territory, on a yet more appalling scale and in connection with many other sources of national wealth. The size and magnificence of the American inheritance, and the rapidity and recklessness with which it is being squandered, are an almost incredible commentary on human folly. On no country, perhaps, had "affluent fortune emptied all her horn" in such varied and bountiful profusion, and no country could have shown itself more utterly ungrateful. The Americans have dealt with their resources, and deal with them to-day, in the pioneer spirit of sheer, wanton pillage. By fires and reckless cuttings and negligent replanting they have so denuded their forests that a timber famine is inevitable. Mr. Gifford Pinchot, indeed, the head of the United States Forest Service, declares that at the present rate of consumption the American supply of lumber will not last another thirty years. Four-fifths of the timber lands of the country are in private hands; the consumption of wood, probably owing to the demand for paper, increases twice as fast as the population; and the States by heavily taxing the owners of woodlands not only on the value of their land but on the value of the standing trees upon it, and the Federal Government, by selling as agricultural land tracts on which nothing but trees will grow to advantage—thus securing impoverished farms instead of flourishing forests—and, above all, by putting a prohibitive duty on the import of lumber from abroad, undo with one hand all the good they are seeking to do with the other, and end by placing an irresistible premium on forest destruction. A quarter of a century from now, unless the nation is roused from its indifference, the United States for all industrial purposes may be a treeless land.

Deforestation is not only a great evil in itself, but the cause of greater ones. If wood is wasted, water must be. Millions have been spent upon the American rivers yet they are less navigable to-day than they were fifty years ago and carry a smaller traffic. Year by year they are being filled up with silt and débris, floods increase, and hundreds of square miles of farming land are, in consequence, impoverished. It is said that the Mississippi alone carries yearly to the sea more than four thousand million tons of the richest soil within its drainage basin. Then, again, over-grazing has reduced over five hundred million acres one-third in value. Coal, too, supplies an even more striking instance of heedless waste. The Government coal experts declare that between three and four hundred million tons of coal were lost in the mining and marketing of the country's coal product in the single year 1906. Numberless mines, after the extraction of the best coal, have been abandoned though only half-worked out, or have caved in and thus been irreparably ruined. The stock of unmined anthracite, it is estimated, will not last another fifty years, and before a century has gone by the supply of bituminous coal will be similarly exhausted; while if the consumption of iron ore continues to increase in the same ratio as during the past twenty years, a couple of centuries will see the end of it. Mineral oil and natural gas have been equally abused; vast areas of public lands have been fraudulently diverted from the genuine settler to the predatory speculator; and the soil of the country has been so shamefuly mishandled—the Americans are, perhaps, the worst farmers in the world—that its crop-producing power is both actually and relatively on the decline.

And all this, be it remembered, has taken place in a land that is still three parts margin, still in the chrysalis stage of its growth, still Empire-building on a scale of unprecedented magnitude. No such spectacle has ever been presented to the world. By the side of it the moribund chaos of our own canal system and the egregious mismanagement of such woods as we possess seem petty misdemeanours. It may, of course, happen that new inventions will ward off the catastrophe that is shaping itself across the Atlantic. The time may come when pulp for the manufacture of paper will be raised in annual crops, when the main motive power of industry will be furnished by the rivers, and when reinforced concrete will take the place of structural steel. But it is not the part of statesmanship to take such possibilities into account, and President Roosevelt is right in not trusting to them. His policy of stimulating the Government's forestry, irrigation and reclamation services, of withdrawing the public domain from the grip of the speculator, of adopting the Australian system of leasing instead of selling it for private development, of vetoing private water Bills, and of encouraging all the States to agree upon a uniform plan of conservation for the benefit of posterity, is a policy which, whether it succeeds or fails, will always be remembered to his credit.

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN IN THE ABBEY.

Looking back but a few years, who would have predicted that of the group of men who were then prominent in the Liberal Party, Campbell-Bannerman would be the one to achieve the position of Premier, and after a brief tenure of office, and so premature a death, to be commemorated by a national monument in the Abbey?

Six years ago Harcourt and Morley in the House of Commons, and Spencer and Kimberley in the House of Lords, seemed to be far ahead of him in influence and prospects. But four years of courageous leadership in the Commons, thrust upon him by the withdrawal of others, the organisation of victory for the Liberal Party at the General Election, and two years of office as Premier, during which personal qualities in him unknown before were made known, have resulted in the unanimous vote of both Houses that the supreme honor of a national monument is due to him.

It may be probable that this would not have been accorded if it had not been that the late Premier practically died while in office. As pointed out by Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour, Parliament has not in the past established the rule that all who have been Premiers are to be thus honored. Of nineteen Premiers since the beginning of the last century, exclusive of those still alive, monuments of only eight have been erected in the Abbey by the votes of Parliament, namely, Pitt, Percival, Canning, Peel, Palmerston, Beaconsfield, Gladstone, and Salisbury. The monument of the Duke of Wellington is at St. Paul's, where also there is one to Melbourne erected by the subscriptions of his friends. No notice in this way was taken by Parliament of the death of Liverpool, Grey, Russell, or Derby. There are, indeed, busts in the Abbey of Aberdeen and Russell placed there by their friends.

However much we may hold Campbell-Bannerman in admiration and affection, we cannot but admit that he will not rank in history with Premiers in either of the above lists. If he had lived long enough to make effective use of the great political majority which he did so much to achieve, if he had completed the programme on which the Liberal Party was bent, if he had brought to an issue the conflict with the House of Lords and had settled a great constitutional question in a democratic spirit, on which he felt most strongly, or if he had been able to strike an effective blow against militarism, his position in history would have been more assured. As it was, his career as Premier was incomplete, and must be compared with that of Percival, Aberdeen, and Rosebery, rather than with any of those I have alluded to. It was, however, superior to those of Addington, Portland, Grenville, and Goderich, who flitted casually across the great stage only to be unnoticed in history.

The question arises where the monument thus decreed by Parliament is to find a place in the Abbey. It must be admitted that Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour are fully justified in their criticism that the Abbey is already overcrowded with monuments. A Royal Commission, appointed at my instance in 1890, reported, after full inquiry, that, even then, there was no further room in the building for monuments. In spite of this, several monuments have since been placed there with the result that the difficulty of overcrowding has been greatly increased. The additions have, for the most part, either detracted from the beauty of the Abbey or from the artistic effect of other existing monuments, or have been insignificant and inadequate as memorials of those intended to be thus honored.

Let me take as an illustration the North Transept, where the monuments of statesmen have for many years past found places. A few years ago one of the chief objects of historical interest and of artistic merit was the well-known group of the three Cannings, George Canning the statesman, Lord Canning, and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, of which the statue of Lord Canning by Foley, the gifted Irish sculptor, is one of the most beautiful in the Abbey. The statue of Peel stood at some distance from this group, and, between them, also detached, was that of General Sir John Malcolm, which might, with advantage, have been removed to some other position. With the addition of the statues of Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone, there is now a row of seven full-length figures giving the effect of an exhibition gallery of sculpture, and the effect of the group of Cannings is quite lost. The statue of Gladstone is also most unfortunately placed there. It is within a few feet of that of Peel, a most proper association in one sense. But Peel is depicted in a Roman Toga, with bare arms and feet in sandals. It is much above life size—a classical work of very high repute by Gibson. Gladstone is depicted in the robes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer —also a fine work of art. The contrast between the two statues is very unpleasing to the eye. That of Gladstone should, I think, have been placed on the opposite side of the Transept, fronting Peel. This, I know, was the intention of Dean Stanley, who reserved the place with this object, but I understand that the present officials of the Abbey objected to this from the point of view of the building arrangements. The present position of the Gladstone monument is, therefore, a proof of the overcrowding of the building. The monument to Lord Salisbury is to take the form of a recumbent statue. It is not yet in place. I understand that some existing monument will be shifted for the purpose of finding room for it.

The recent additions of smaller monuments are also open to grave objections. Tennyson lies buried in the South Transept. A bust of him has been placed on a bracket attached to one of the columns of the building. It is quite an inadequate memorial to so great a poet, and the arrangement of brackets with busts on the columns is, I think, everywhere a disfigurement to the building. This is especially noticeable in the busts of Longfellow and of Archbishop Tait. To appreciate this we have only to compare this treatment with that of the bust of Dryden hard by, placed on an architectural pedestal of excellent proportions, with the result that it is one of the most charming monuments in the building. The difference of treatment is most conspicuous. A careful survey of the Abbey will, I feel certain, convince everyone that there is absolutely no longer any standing place in any part of it for a full-length statue of the late Premier such as the statues of Peel, Gladstone, and others, still less for a recumbent statue such as that intended for Lord Salisbury, and which necessarily occupies more space. The only possibility is that of a bas relief, on one of the walls of the building, and this, I think, can only be effected by some rearrangement or displacement of an existing monument.

There seems to be a possibility of this kind at the end of the Nave next to and at right angles to the monument of Charles Fox. Affixed against the north wall there is here a huge slab of black marble, with an inscription, which can be deciphered with great difficulty, to Penelope Egerton. Who this lady was and what her claim was to a memorial in the Abbey does not appear. The guide-book says that her husband was buried in the Nave. This great slab might, I think, with advantage be moved to some remote corner of the building, or even to the cloisters, and a place might thus be found for a bas relief to the late Premier. Its juxtaposition to that of Fox would be appropriate, for, like Fox, Campbell-Bannerman earned a great part of his fame by leading the Liberal Party in opposition to an unnecessary war. Fox, on the death of Pitt, became Minister, not nominally the Prime Minister, but virtually so, and died within two years, as did Campbell-Bannerman.

Both Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour suggested that the monument to the late Premier must be the last of the kind, and that no more monuments, to Premiers at least, should be placed in the Abbey. We can accept this conclusion as regards the Abbey as it is, but it raises necessarily the question whether some addition should not speedily be made to the building, so as to enable the continuance of the roll of monuments absolutely unique of its kind. The Royal Commission of 1890, to which I have already alluded, reported:—

> "That the memorials illustrating the history of England for more than eight centuries which the Abbey contains are an inheritance of high national interest and value, and that the roll of such monuments ought to be maintained."

On the subject of displacement or re-arrangement of existing monuments they added:—

> "We are of opinion that no interference with existing monuments short of removal or rearrangement on a large scale, would provide adequate facilities for this purpose, and we do not think that even in individual cases monuments should be disturbed contrary to the wishes of the representatives of the dead."

They were unanimously of opinion that an addition should be made in the Abbey. Unfortunately, they were even divided as to what this should be—whether in the form of a monumental chapel in Old Palace Yard, connected with the Abbey by a cloister running under the buttresses of the Chapter House, or by a chapel in the cloisters on the site of the old Refectory. This difference of opinion has been the cause of the adjournment of the question for twenty years. It must now, I think, be faced and settled if we are to maintain unbroken the associations of the Abbey with the history of the country.

EVERSLEY.

Life and Letters.

THE BACKGROUND OF GLORY.

In speaking of war we use a conventional language that conceals reality as successfully as any legal convention can. Open a military history, such as Napier's, at almost any page, and you find some such sentence as this: "Nearly 50,000 men and 80 guns were disposable for offensive operations in the beginning of June." Take a received maxim of war, such as Napoleon's: "The strength of an army, like the power in mechanics, is estimated by multiplying the mass by the rapidity"; or, "The first aim of every system of operations should undoubtedly be to destroy the active forces of the enemy." Read any text-book on strategy or tactics, and you will find it entirely occupied with abstract and colourless terms—semi-permanent positions, attenuated lines, objectives of attack, lines of communication, counter attacks, influence of artillery, danger zone, effective fire, enfilading fire, field of fire, concentration of fire, and attacks driven home.

These are the algebraic signs and formulæ of warfare—a kind of military shorthand, invented, one must suppose, rather to save space than to obscure the underlying truth. It is a mere convention, but, like most conventions, it comes to be more thought of than the thing signified, and by aid of it people will talk of war as of a game of chess whose symbolic knights and castles are columns and cavalry brigades. To them the "50,000 men disposable" are a vague and abstract figure, a multiplication product, a component, the complement of a parallelogram. Granted the thing can move, can "operate," it has no more in common with mortal man than the resultant of two forces acting in a vacuum. War, on these terms, makes a charming pursuit—innocent as a field-day, inevitable as a fugue, a subject well adapted for the argument of bores.

In Sir Charles Napier's account of Corunna, there is a trifling incident not even mentioned in his brother's history. He tells how he was standing by Sir John Moore when a round shot tore off the leg of a 42nd man, "who screamed horribly, and rolled about so as to excite agitation and alarm among others. The General said: 'This is nothing, my lads; keep your ranks; take that man away; my good fellow, don't make such a noise; we must bear these things better.'" So, we may hope, the good fellow stopped making such a noise; and in a few minutes Moore himself received a round shot that tore away his shoulder, and certainly he bore these things better. There is the touch that pierces the formulæ of abstractions and makes reality of disposable forces.

The third volume of the official history of the Boer War, published last Wednesday (Hurst & Blackett) is a good type of military writing—clear, brief, and accurate. On its own lines, it could hardly be better done. It tells of various advances and operations—the great advance to Pretoria, the operations in the Western Transvaal, in the Orange River Colony, and so on. We are shown columns advancing, divisions operating, frontal movements, enveloping movements, clearings, and pursuits, so many men, so many guns, so many horses. With a good map and little blue and red flags on pins one could make quite a pretty and intelligible picture of it, and criticise the obvious mistakes of generals through all a summer's afternoon. It is admirably carried out, full of interest, beside, to anyone capable of delighting in the game of war. But before the minds of those who were there what a different picture rises as they read those quiet pages—a picture no more like the blue and red flags on pins than a map is like a country!

One may read, for instance, that the General made dispositions for a reconnaissance in force next day, and it is interesting to move the little red flag an eighth of an inch forward. But some of us remember that starlight morning, the rattle of the chains as the guns went by, the dull rumble of the wheels, the plodding tramp of fours upon a soft road, the checks, the grounding arms, the low voices of men going into action, the first streak of light that showed the long brown serpent winding over hills, the whir of the first shell that went right through a battery horse without bursting. Or we read that "the hostile artillery was not slow in development," and behind the words we see again the great white puff of smoke from a hill-top, men falling flat for shelter, the flare of blazing orange in the middle of the street, the Kaffirs applauding as at Crystal Palace fireworks, the front of the Scottish store suddenly blown out, making one remark how jolly it was to see shops open again.

